THE Volume now presented to the Public embraces the period from the Battle of Edge-hill, in October 1642, to the Meeting of the Parliament begun at Westminster, April the 25th, 1660, commonly called the CONVENTION PARLIAMENT, which was sitting at the return of Charles the Second, in the month of May following, and which voted his RESTORATION. As the Materials from which it has been compiled are drawn from the same sources as those of the preceding Volumes, it is almost unnecessary to say any thing by way of addition to what is therein stated: but, as the Editors of the Parliamentary or Constitutional History of England, in 24 volumes 8vo, published in 1751, conclude their labours with the Restoration, it may be proper again to state, that that masterly performance has, thus far, been made the ground-work of the present undertaking. The many Narratives of Battles Sieges, &c. with which the work just mentioned abounds, and which serve only as an incumbrance to the Reader, and a constantly intervening obstacle to his researches, have been purposely omitted; while, at the same time, every thing connected with the real Proceedings of Parliament, and that could, by possibility, be hereafter useful to the Historian or the Politician, has been most cautiously retained. The Journals of both Houses, those great fountains of authentic information, have, in every instance, been carefully consulted and followed: Many Notes, illustrating, from the Historians of the Times, the Characters of the principal Members of both Houses, and explaining, where necessary, the business before them, have been introduced: And, to the whole is subjoined, by way of Appendix, a very scarce and curious Tract, published in the Year 1660, almost immediately after the Dissolution of the Long Parliament, entitled, “ The MYSTERY OF THE GOOD OLD CAUSE briefly unfolded, in a Catalogue of such Members of the late Long Parliament, that held Places, both Civil and Military, contrary to the Self-Denying Ordinance: Together with the Sums of Money and Lands which they divided amongst themselves during their Sitting.”

THE Volume now presented to the Public embraces the period from the House of 1842, to the Meeting of the Parliament begun at Westminster, April the 25th, 1843, commonly called the Convention Parliament, which was elected in the month of January the preceding, in the month of May following, and which voted the first session. As the many subjects which have been brought forward from the same sources as those of the preceding Volume, it is almost unnecessary to say any thing by way of addition to what is there stated. But as the Editors of the For- mer of Constitutional History of England, in 24 volumes 8vo, published in 1831, containing such passages with the history, it may be proper again to say, that the Constitutional History has, thus far, been made the ground-work of the present History. The many Notes of Parliamentary History, &c. and which are now first mentioned, abundant, and which serve only as an introduction to the History of a constantly increasing class of his readers, have been carefully selected, and at the same time, in every to be compared with the History of the Constitution, and the Constitution, by possibility, be brought forward to the attention of the Constitution, but in more commonly arranged. The Notes of both History, those given in form of public information, have, in every instance, been carefully consulted and followed. Many Notes, illustrating, from the History of the Times, the Character of the principal members of both History, and explaining, where necessary, the passages before them, have been introduced. And, to the whole is subjoined, by way of Appendix, a very scarce and curious Times, published in the year 1840, shortly immediately after the Dissolution of the last Parliament, entitled, "THE MYSTERY OF THE "GOOD OLD CAUSE briefly unfolded, in a Catalogue of such Members "of the late long Parliament, that sold Places, both Civil and Military,
 "contrary to the Self-Denying Ordinance: Together with the Names of "Money and Lands which they divided amongst themselves during their "Tenure."

18 CHARLES I.—A. D. 1642.

PROCEEDINGS towards a Peace.] Oct. 29, 1642. Notwithstanding the military exhortations to the citizens of London which concluded our last Volume, it was this day moved in the house of lords, 'That it might be taken into consideration, how to prevent farther bloodshed between the two Armies, and to consider of some means to beget a Peace.'

Nov. 2. Both houses had been busy in making Orders for opposing sir Ralph Hopton's armament in the west of England, and the other in Wales, mentioned in Mr. Secretary Nicholas's Letter, which had been communicated to the citizens of London at Guildhall, by the earl of Pembroke, on the 27th of the last month. (See vol 2. p. 1474). These two newly raised armies appeared so formidable to the parliament, that, in all probability, it stirred up the above motion for settling a Peace, and brought on the further consideration of it this day. The result of which was, That to prevent the further effusion of blood, and to settle the present distractions of the kingdom, a conference should be held, in which the following Letter should be communicated to the commons, which the Committee of Safety had received from their lord-general, in answer to one written to him on this occasion :

" My lords and gentlemen ; I have received a Letter from you that mentions an humble Petition to be directed to his maj. to save the effusion of more blood. In the first place, I ought to acknowledge the favour of your desiring to hear from me before you send it. In the second place, to declare that an happy accommodation for the advancement of religion, the flourishing of this kingdom, with its antient rights, the saving the effusion of more blood, and the uniting his majesty to his parliament, none shall pray for more, nor receive with more joy than myself. If I had not, by the commands of the parliament, been here to govern this army, I should have given my attendance upon you ; and should have discharged my conscience, to the best of my abilities, honestly and clearly ; but, being absent, and not hearing the debates, nor from whence this hath risen, I must submit myself to their greater judgments ; and shall, with all obedience, submit both to what they shall do, and to obey their former commands to advance towards London, to interpose, with my utmost, between them and all dangers, Your, &c. Essex. Northampton, Nov. 1. 1642."

Notwithstanding the last mentioned military preparations, and the earl of Essex's declaration of his readiness to march towards London, both houses thought fit to proceed in their pacific measures ; and ordered a Petition to the king to be drawn up : but, previous to this, ' lest the affections of the people should grow cold,' as Mr. Pym expressed himself at the conference, a Declaration was to be published to this purport :

" Whereas the lords and commons have ordered, That it should be referred to the committee for the safety of the kingdom, to prepare heads for an humble Address to his maj. for composing the present differences and distractions, and settling the present peace of the kingdom, and to present it to the house : yet, to prevent all misconstructions or neglects, whereby our just defence may be hindered, we do declare, That the preparations of forces, and all other necessary means for the defence of the protestant religion, the privileges of parliament, and the laws and liberties of the subject, shall be prosecuted with all vigour."

Nov. 3. The Petition to the King was read by the lords, and agreed to by both houses, as follows :

" We your majesty's most loyal subjects, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, being affected with a deep and piercing sense of the miseries of this kingdom, and of the danger of his majesty's person, as the present affairs now stand; and much quickened therein with the sad consideration of the great effusion of blood at the late battle, (of Edgehill,) and of the loss of so many eminent persons: and further weighing the addition of loss, misery, and danger to your majesty and your kingdom, which must ensue, if both armies should again join in another battle; as, without God's especial blessing, and your majesty's concurrence with your houses of parliament, will not probably be avoided; we cannot but believe that a suitable impression of tenderness and compassion is wrought in your majesty's royal heart, being yourself an eye-witness of the bloody and sorrowful destruction of so many of your subjects; and that your maj. doth apprehend what diminution of your own power and greatness will follow; and that all your kingdoms will thereby be so weakened, as to become subject to the attempts of any ill-affected to this state.—In all which respects we assure ourselves, that your majesty will be inclined graciously to accept this our humble Petition, that the misery and desolation of this kingdom may be speedily removed and prevented; for the effecting whereof we most humbly beseech your majesty to appoint some convenient place, not far from London, where your majesty will be pleased to reside, until committees of both houses may attend your majesty, with some Propositions for the removal of these bloody distempers and distractions, and settling the state of the kingdom, in such a manner, as may conduce to the preservation of God's true Religion; your majesty's honour, safety, and prosperity; and to the peace, comfort, and security of all your people."

The houses next considered of the manner of delivering this Petition to the king; and, since the way they sent their last was so disagreeable to him, it was thought proper, that a committee of lords and commons should be sent with it. But, first, that a Letter be written to one of the secretaries of state, or some peer near his majesty, to desire a safe-conduct for these persons; and that a trumpet should be sent before the messenger, to desire a safe-conduct for the delivery of their Letter. Accordingly the lord Grey of Werk, Speaker of the house of lords pro tempore, wrote the following Letter, to lord Falkland, principal secretary to his majesty, or, in his absence, for Mr. Secretary Nicholas, or any of the lords attending his majesty:

"My lord, I am commanded by the lords the peers, and commons assembled in parliament, to address, by you, their humble desires to his majesty, that he would be pleased to grant his Safe-Conduct to a committee of lords and commons to pass and repass unto his maj. that are directed to attend him with an humble Petition from his parliament. I rest your, &c. GREY of Werk."

Nov. 5. Lord Grey received an Answer to the above Letter as follows:

"My lord; His majesty hath commanded me to signify to you, that he always hath been, and is still, ready to receive the humble Petition of either or both houses of parliament; and shall take order, that a committee of lords and commons may pass and repass to him, with the Petition of both houses, as is desired; so as the said committee consists of persons that have not been by his majesty either by name, declared Traitors; or otherwise in some of his Declarations or Proclamations excepted against by name, with his intention declaring to proceed against them as traitors; and so as the said committee come not with more than 30 persons in their company, and give notice before-hand of their coming: and for the said committee's better security, his majesty, upon the receipt of their names, will give a Safe-Conduct for them under his hand and signet. Your, &c. ED. NICHOLAS. Reading, November 4, 1642."

To this Letter, the lord Grey was directed to return the following Answer; but since this Answer, and the consequent Rejoinders, were the chief business of some days, we shall put them altogether, for the reader's greater ease in the perusal:

To the right hon. the lord Falkland, Principal Secretary to his Majesty, &c.

"My lord, I have received a command from the lords and commons in parliament to send you the names of two lords; that it is to say, Algernon earl of Northumberland, Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, and of four members of the house of commons, Mr. Pierrepont, the lord Wenman, sir John Evelin of Wilts, and sir John Hipposley, being the committees of both houses appointed to attend his majesty with an humble Petition directed from them to his majesty; desiring your lordship will be pleased to move his majesty to send a Safe-Conduct, to pass and repass, under his royal hand and signet, for the several persons aforementioned. I rest, &c. GREY of Werk, Nov. 5."

To the right honourable the lord Grey of Werk, Speaker of the House of Peers, pro tempore, &c.

"My lord, Your lordship's letter, of the 5th, I shewed his majesty, who hath expressly commanded me to return your lordship this Answer in these few words, That his majesty hath sent (which I have inclosed) a Safe-Conduct, under his royal hand and signet, for the earl of Northumberland and the earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Mr. Pierrepont, the lord Wenman, and sir John Hipposley; but hath not admitted sir John Evelin to attend him, as being included in the exception made by his majesty in the Letter sent by Mr. Secretary Nicholas to your lordship of the 4th, as by the inclosed Proclamation, proclaimed at his majesty's court at Oxford, and sent, with a writ sealed, into the county of Wilts, will appear. His majesty hath likewise commanded me to signify to your lordship, That in case the houses shall think fit to send any other person in the place of sir J. Evelin, that is not included in the exception made in Mr. Secretary's Letter beforementioned, his majesty hath commanded all his officers, soldiers and other subjects to suffer him as freely to pass and repass as if his name had been particularly comprised in this Safe-Conduct. I rest, &c. FALKLAND. Reading, Nov. 6."

His Majesty's SAFE CONDUCT.

"C. R. Our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby strictly charge and command all the officers and soldiers of our present army, and all our ministers and subjects whatsoever, to suffer our right trusty and right well-beloved cousins and counsellors Algernon earl of Northumberland, and Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, and our right trusty and right well-beloved cousin Tho. lord Wenman, and our trusty and well-beloved Wm. Pierrepont, esq. and sir John Hippesley, knight, (together with their attendants, not exceeding the number of 30) to pass and repass to and from us, they being now sent to attend us with a Petition from both our houses of parliament. This our Safe-Conduct under our royal hand and signet, we charge and command them, and every of them, punctually to observe and obey, as they will answer the contrary at their uttermost perils. Given at our Court at Reading this 6th of Nov. 1642."

The King objects to sir John Evelin's being one of the Committee for settling a Peace. Then was read the Proclamation, mentioned in lord Falkland's Letter, as a reason why the king excepted against sir John Evelin* as one of the commissioners; after which a debate ensued in the house of lords, and the question being put, Whether the lord Falkland's last Answer should be sent to the commons with the sense of this house upon it, or without it? it passed for the latter, and was sent down accordingly.

Both Houses send a Committee to acquaint the City of London, with the King's refusal of Peace. The commons sent up a Vote of their house, on the king's objection to sir John Evelin, to this purpose: Resolved, "That this house holds it to be a denial in his majesty, and a Refusal to grant a Treaty with the parliament, in excepting unto one of the messengers that were to present a Petition unto him from both houses, and denying to grant him a Safe-Conduct."—The question being put, by the lords, Whether this Safe-Conduct should be accepted upon these terms? It passed in the Negative.—After this a Committee of both houses were appointed to go into the city of London, to acquaint the common-hall with all the ways the parliament had used to procure a Treaty for a Peace, without being able to effect it; and to quicken them to a resolution of defending and maintaining their liberties and religion, with their lives and fortunes. Likewise, the committee of safety were ordered to prepare a Declaration, upon this denial of the king's to admit such members as were appointed by both houses to present their Petition; one of the heads of which was to be, the king's expressing a readiness to receive a Petition from the rebels in Ireland.

Nov. 8. Two members of the Committee from the Parliament to the City, on the above occasion, were the lord Brooke and sir Henry Vane, junior; whose Speeches at the Guildhall, being yet preserved, we here subjoin them in their own words as follows:

Lord Brooke said: "My lord mayor and aldermen, and the rest of the gentlemen here assembled; I am to deliver a message to you from the lords and commons, now assembled in parliament. What I have to say to you is this: I doubt not but you have heard some whisperings of an Accommodation; and no man that is an honest man, a religious man, a free man, that loves religion and the kingdom, but would have an Accommodation; for nothing is more miserable, and nothing is more distracting than war: But that an Accommodation should come upon terms ignoble and disadvantageous, that never was in the thought of either house, and I hope never will be; and, I am to tell you never shall be. I am at this time to intreat you, in the name of both houses of parliament, to go on courageously, and fight, and prepare yourselves for that that is at hand: we hear the enemies approach nearer every day, who aim at nothing else but to swallow up our religion, lives, liberties, and estates; and therefore it becomes you to labour to defend them all. I have more to say, but it is better said here in the Votes of the houses of lords and commons; I desire they should be read unto you, and therein you will fully understand what their sense is.—Monday, Nov. 7 1642. 'The question being put, Whether a Safe Conduct shall be accepted upon these terms? It past with the negative.'—This was, first, in the house of commons. The meaning of this Vote is, There was a Safe-Conduct sent by his majesty to 6 persons, two of the house of lords, and 4 of the house of commons; among these there was one sir John Evelin, of Wiltshire: the king would not let him have a Safe-Conduct, because he was one that was named, by him, a Traitor the day before; and that was done, as is thought, on purpose to take him off from being one; therefore the commons did look upon that as a Denial, in that he could not have a Safe-Conduct. This Vote of theirs was presented to the lords; and they concurred with it, viz. Resolved upon the question, [Here follows the Resolutions.] "Here is one thing more, gentlemen, that is worth your taking notice of: in the latter end you see there is a committee appointed to come hither to give you an account of the Reasons moving them on to this action; and to shew you all the ways they have used, if it were possible, to have procured a Treaty for a Peace. There is another thing in the end is very remarkable: His majesty will not, but upon terms altogether unfitting, accept of any Treaty from us; yet at the same time, is willing to receive a Petition from the rebels in Ireland. We are no rebels; but dutiful in all we do: they are rebels and traitors in the judgment of all men; and yet he will receive no Petition from us: but he will receive a Petition from them."

Sir Henry Vane spoke to this effect: "My lord mayor &c.; It is not unknown to you, with what difficulties, with what dangers, both houses of parliament have a long time conflicted, for to bring the liberties, and the religion, and the welfare of this kingdom into such a posture as might give all the inhabitants thereof full satisfaction. It is not unknown likewise, how busy the enemies of this great work have been, to cast scandals, to cast false aspersions, upon the proceedings, upon the carriage of parliament; they therefore thought fit (that they might undeceive all persons of the greatest malice, and of the greatest opposition to their endeavours) not long since to frame a Petition; a Petition full of humility, a Petition full of modesty, whereby they did desire his majesty that they might apply themselves to make such Propositions to him, as might effect this great work.—This Petition, that it might be delivered, they thought fit for to name six persons; 2 of the lords house, and 4 of the house of commons; men that they thought altogether without the least scruple, without the least exception, knowing that nothing in the carriage of these persons could render them liable to exception, but their duty and observance to the commands of both houses. When the names of these persons were sent to his majesty, for to have a Safe-Conduct, immediately, there came out a Proclamation against one of them, excepting him out of the grace and favour of his majesty, as it is termed, and laying him in the condition of a rebel and of a traitor against him, for his obedience to, and observance of, the commands of parliament. This being brought to both houses, they looked on it as a business of such great importance, that if they should suffer any one member, or any one person, that, through his dutifulness and observance of their commands, should lie under a cloud with his majesty, so as not be admitted to his presence but be looked at in such a condition, as this Proclamation put him in: They looked on it, I say, as the greatest indignity, and the greatest calumny that could befall a parliament; and the greatest discouragement that should lie upon all men to stand to a parliament, if they should not be defended and protected; Hereupon they resolved to declare, That the unwillingness lay not in them to make peace; but it lay in that ill-counsel, and that desperate counsel, that hath hemmed in his majesty; and will not suffer such points, will not suffer such Propositions as these, to take effect with him: but will labour to destroy all your estates and properties, and all that is near and dear to you in this kingdom. The commons, therefore, have thought it fit to acquaint you with these proceedings; to let you know how careful they are, by all good ways, and by all good means, to present their loyalty and duty to his majesty, to take care of themselves, and all that belongs to you: but, when they see all will not take effect, they doubt not but you will join cordially, and join resolutely, with your purses, and with your endeavours, and with all that lies in your power, to acquit yourselves like men; to defend yourselves, to defend them that have laboured in your work, in your cause and who are willing to spend their lives and blood in your service to the utmost man: therefore they desire this of you, that since they have taken this care, you will hearken to no reports that shall tend to the disparagement of their proceedings; but will unanimously concur to defend yourselves against that violence and oppression, that is now almost at your doors.—And this is that we have to recommend to you."

Then the Lord Brooke spoke again: Gentlemen; This hon. gentleman hath exprest so fully all that was in the message, that, truly, I should wrong him and myself too, if I should say any more; therefore, I shall now speak to you of another thing. It is not fit any thing that concerns you should be concealed from you. I came this day to this place, about another business, which I have already communicated to my lord mayor and the aldermen, and the committee. I think it will not be unfit you should know it. I have the consent of some, that understand this business very well, to what I now shall do. Gentlemen, the message was this, it was a message from his excellency; it is to let you know how near the danger is at hand, that so you may gird up the loins of your resolution, and act like men of courage. Gentlemen, citizens of London, (better than whom no man did in that army we had lately in the field) the enemies foot, as we understand, are very near Stains, their horse are about Kingston. We cannot say that all are there; but that there are both horse and foot, and it is certain our foot are going to them: so that the question is now, What is to be done? This is a certain truth among all soldiers, That you must keep evil as far off you as you can; you must not let it come near your doors: you must not think to fight in the sighs, and tears, and eyes, and distractions of your wives and children; but to go out and meet it valiantly as you have done.—God hath shewed himself a God of love and mercy, and truly we must give him all the honour of that day; certainly it is the greatest victory that ever was gotten; near 2000 (I love to speak with the least) on their side slain, and, I am confident, not 100 on our side, unless you will take in women and children, carmen and dogs; for they slew the very dogs and all. If you take in women, children, carmen, and dogs, then they slew about 200. But that 100 should be slain on one side, and 2000 on the other side, is a very miraculous thing. God that dealt so wonderfully heretofore, it were to distrust him, if we did not think he would do so again. Truly he hath a people among us, exceedingly beloved. What is it we fight for? It is for our religion, and for our God, and for our liberty, and all. And what is it they fight for? For their lust, for their wills, and for their tyranny; to make us slaves, and to overthrow all. Gentlemen, methinks I see your courage by your faces. I spy you ready to do any thing; and the general's resolution is, to go out to-morrow, and do as a man of courage and resolution; and never man did like him; for he was not only general, but common soldier; for he led up his own regiment, he led up his own troop in his own person; and when the left troops of horse deceived him, he brought up the right troops. He himself will go out again, and do again as much as he hath done; all this is for your sakes, for he can be a free man, he can be a gentleman, he can be a great man, he can go where he will; therefore it is only for your sakes he is resolved to go out to-morrow. His forces are weary, his forces are spent, some came but last night into town, some marched above 20 miles, which is a great march, as some that know what it is can tell; but, as weary as they are, he is resolved to go out; and if you will affect the cause, and join with him hand and heart and sword, he will take it as a favour; but if you will not, he doubts not but Gideon's sword will do the work alone. I speak not this that I doubt you, but that you would resolve, that when you hear the drums beat, (for it is resolved that the drums shall beat to-morrow; our drums shall beat to lead out our men, and the committee's drums shall beat to lead out their men) say not, I beseech you, I am not of the Trained Band, nor this, nor that, nor the other; but doubt not to go out to the work, and fight courageously, and this shall be the day of your deliverance.

Both Houses resolve, again, to send their Petition to the King.] Nov. 9. Mr. Pym brought up a Resolution, to which he desired their lordships concurrence, viz. Resolved, "That the Petition shall be sent to his majesty; and the reasons which induced the commons to make this Vote, he said, were these: 1. The great advantage which should be gained by a settled Peace; for, thereby, they should better attend to the war in Ireland; and it would unite the king and kingdom more closely, and prevent the loss of our religion and the liberties of the subject; for peace, upon other terms than these, they resolved never to accept: That, 2. The house of commons did, also, consider the danger the king's person was in at the last Battle; and the great mischiefs that war had already brought upon the common-wealth, which would be increased if it should be continued; so much blood being already spilt, and many of great quality slain; and that sir John Evelin should be left to his liberty to go along with the rest if he think fit."—To this pacific Vote the lords agreed; but a subsequent request came along with it; which was to desire the lords to join with them in ordering the Lord-General to draw out his Army the next morning; and that a Proclamation should go out that afternoon for all soldiers, on pain of death, to repair to their colours.

Ordinance for encouraging Apprentices to enlist.] This day the commons sent up the following Ordinance:

"Whereas, in times of common danger and necessity, the interest of private persons ought to give way to the public: It is ordained and declared, by the lords and commons in parliament, that such Apprentices as have been, or shall be, listed to serve as soldiers, for the defence of the religion and liberty of the kingdom, his majesty's royal person, the parliament, and the city of London; their sureties, and such as stand engaged for them, shall be secured against their masters, their executors, and administrators, from all loss and inconveniences, by forfeiture of bonds, covenants, enfranchisements, or otherwise: And that after this public service is ended, the masters of such Apprentices shall be commanded and required to receive them again into their service, without imposing upon them any punishment, loss, or prejudice for their absence, in defence of the commonwealth. And the lords and commons do further declare, That, if it shall appear that the masters of such Apprentices have received any considerable loss by the absence of their Apprentices, they will take care that reasonable satisfaction shall be made unto them, out of the public stock of the kingdom, according to justice and indifferency."

The commons, also, desired the lords to join with them in sending a committee of both houses again to the city, to acquaint them with the Reasons that moved the parliament to send this Petition to his majesty; and to let them know the Resolution of the parliament is, That they will not agree to any peace, but what shall be fully for the preservation of religion, the liberty of the subject, and the settling the quiet of the kingdom: that if this cannot effectually be done, both houses are resolved to spend their lives and fortunes in the maintenance thereof.—To this the lords agreed, and ordered, That the lord mayor should be desired to call a common-hall. A committee of 4 lords, with a proportionable number of commoners were appointed to go to the city on this occasion.

Both Houses return Thanks to the Earl of Essex.] This day, in the house of lords, a form of Thanks was drawn up to be presented to their Lord-General as follows:

"The lords and commons assembled in parliament having, upon mature deliberation, and assured confidence in the wisdom, courage, and fidelity of Robert earl of Essex, chosen and appointed him captain-general of the forces raised by the authority of parliament, for the defence of the true protestant religion, the king, the parliament, and kingdom, now in great and apparent danger; do find, That the said earl hath managed this service, of so high importance, with so much care, valour, and dexterity; as well as by the extremest hazard of his life, in a bloody Battle, near Keynton, in Warwickshire, as, by all the actions of a most excellent and expert commander, in the whole course of this employment, as doth deserve their best acknowledgment. We do, therefore, declare and publish, to the lasting honour of the said earl, the great and acceptable service which he hath, herein, done to the common-wealth; and shall be ready and willing, upon all occasions, to express the due sense which we have of his merit, by assisting and protecting him, and all others employed under his command, in this service, with our lives and fortunes, to the uttermost of our power. This to remain, upon record, in both houses of parliament, as a mark of honour to his person, name, and family, and for a monument of his singular virtue, to posterity."

But the commons were of opinion, that the earl of Essex deserved more than an Address of Thanks; for they resolved, That 5000*l.* be forthwith presented to his excellency from that house.

The King's Answer to the Parliament's Petition for Peace.] Nov. 12. The earls of Northumberland and Pembroke reported to the lords, That they had waited on the king, yesterday, who, to save time, had returned a full Answer, by them, to their Petition:

The King's ANSWER to the PETITION.

"We take God to witness how deeply we are affected with the miseries of this kingdom, which, heretofore, we have strove, as much as in us lay, to prevent; it being sufficiently known to all the world, that as we were not the first that took up arms, so we have shewed our readiness of composing all things in a fair way, by our several offers of treaty; and shall be glad, now at length, to find any such inclination in others: the same tenderness to avoid the destruction of our subjects, whom we know to be our greatest strength, which would always make our greatest victories bitter to us, shall make us willingly hearken to such propositions whereby these bloody distempers may be stopped, and the great distractions of this kingdom settled, to God's glory, our honour, and the welfare and flourishing of our people; and, to that end, shall reside at our own castle at Windsor, if the forces there shall be removed, till committees may have time to attend us with the same; which, to prevent the inconveniences that will intervene, we wish may be hastened, and shall be ready there; or, if that be refused us, at any place where we shall be, to receive such propositions as aforesaid, from both houses of parliament. Do you your duty, we will not be wanting in ours: God of his mercy give a blessing."

After the reading of this Answer, it was resolved to communicate the contents of it to the commons. Then the Lord-General stood up and desired he might receive directions from the house how he should order his forces during the time of this Treaty: for, if he should advance his quarters towards the king, it might be thought an act of hostility; and, if he should omit any thing, then he might be looked upon as remiss. Thereupon the house resolved to write a Letter to the king's secretary, to know his majesty's pleasure concerning a Cessation of Arms, during the time of this Treaty; and gave the Lord-General directions to forbear doing any act of hostility while further orders. The commons having given their concurrence, a Letter was sent to the secretary in these words:

"My lord; I am commanded by the lords and commons, in parliament, to signify to your lordship, that, with much joy, they received his majesty's gracious Answer unto their Petition; expressing his pious inclinations unto Peace. They do resolve, with all diligence, to send their humble Propositions unto his majesty, and, likewise, their Answer concerning Windsor Castle; in the mean time, they desire to know his majesty's pleasure, how the armies shall govern themselves, and whether he does not resolve on a cessation of all acts of hostility, upon the overture of a cessation of peace. Your, &c. GREY."

The house of commons, however, did not wait for any Answer from the king; for this day, they agreed to send a message to the Lord-General, to desire him to proceed according to his best advantages, notwithstanding the foregoing Letter, sent to the king by sir Peter Killigrew, or any proceedings thereon; in regard the other side had begun to act hostilities since that Letter was agreed upon. The General answered, That he did not intend to be amused by Treaties; but, since they have begun the acts of hostility, to pursue and see what they would do.

A Petition and Proposals from the City of London to the Commons.] Nov. 13. The commons being informed, That several citizens were at the Door, who desired to offer something to their consideration, they were called in: and one Mr. Shute, a merchant, in the name of the rest, addressed the house in a speech, which appears to have been a long one, by the following heads of it taken and entered in the Commons Journals: "That they did acknowledge, with all thankfulness, the continued and unwearied care and pains of this house, for the preservation of the true protestant religion, the liberty of the people, and the privileges of parliament. They have presented a petition of ten particulars; to which they expect an Answer in convenient time. They speak in the language of many thousands: that they fear they are bought and sold.—These things they present: 1. That in a case of so much danger, and so great concernment, that there should be but one army to rely upon. 2. That in all this time, the king's strength lying in horse, that the city should not appear in a considerable body of horse.—Though it has been offered, and not effectually yet put in a way, they do now again offer it. 3. That Windsor Castle should not be provided for, as it ought. 4. That colonel Hollis's regiment, men of that courage, and so considerable, should be exposed to a place of so imminent danger, lying next to the enemy's forces, and almost naked. 5. The point of Accommodation is another reason of their grief.—They are come to this Resolution; That they will man out every man his man, and make their own captains and officers, and live and die with the house of commons, and in defence thereof: and if there be any in the lords house, that do any way retard or hinder this public defence, they wish they would declare themselves; and that they were with the king. 6. Another matter of their grief was That the Sabbath Day should be so long profaned by public authority; and the Book that enjoins it, not yet burnt by the hands of the common Hangman. They observe, that this day they have so profaned, has been the day of their ruin.* 7. The Bloodshed of the Martyrs, in queen Mary's days, done by public act of parliament, and no expiation as yet made for it. 8. The officers in the army (though they must always mention my Lord-General with honour, as one in whom they absolutely confide) not so careful and diligent as they ought, nor all of them so trusty. 9. The numbers of the prisoners very great, and of dangerous condition; and the masters and keepers of those prisons not to be confided in. 10. The good ministers in time past silenced, and put out by the bishops.—You have our persons, purses, and estates, all at your command: you may do with us at your pleasure. We come in the name of the godly and active part of the city."

The citizens being withdrawn, the commons came to the following Resolutions: 1. "That the Book concerning injoining and tolerating of Sports upon the Sabbath day, be forthwith burnt by the hands of the common hangman, in the usual places. 2. That this house doth accept of this offer of the citizens, of furnishing horse and foot; and doth account it to be a service much importing the safety of the commonwealth; and doth return them public and hearty thanks."

The citizens being called in again, the Speaker, by the command of the house, told them, "They found, that what was said was expressed with a zealous and earnest care of the commonwealth; for which they return them public and hearty thanks. For the particular of horse and foot, they accept; and have appointed a particular committee to treat about it. The Book of Sports they have voted to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman."

* Alluding to the Battle of Edge-Hill, which was fought on a Sunday.

Mr. Shute having desired to speak again, said, "That the coming of the Lord General's Army into the city of London, and staying here so long as they did, is another thing troubles them; which they forgot to express before. Another thing is, That some present and more severe course might be taken with Malignants; and, amongst them, with the malignant ministers." And then the citizens withdrew.

The King's Message concerning his Marching to Brentford.] Nov. 14. A Letter from the King, directed to the Speaker of the house of lords, was read, commanding him to communicate the inclosed Paper to the house; the purport of which was this:

"Whereas the last night, being the 11th Nov. after the departure of the committee of both our houses, with our gracious Answer to their Petition, we received certain information (having till then heard nothing of it, either from the houses committee, or otherwise) that the earl of Essex had drawn his forces out of London towards us, which hath necessitated our sudden resolution to march with our forces to Brentford; we have thought fit hereby to signify to both our houses of parliament, that we are no less desirous of the peace of the kingdom, than we expressed in our aforesaid Answer, the Propositions for which we shall willingly receive, wherever we are; and desire, if it may be, to receive them at Brentford; this night, or early to-morrow morning, that all possible speed may be made in so good a work, and all inconveniences, otherwise likely to intervene, may be avoided."

The Citizens of London raise Light Horse and Dragoons: Mr. Skippon's Speech to them.] Nov. 15. The commons resolved to accept of an offer of the citizens of London, whereby they engaged to raise 1000 Light Horse and 3000 Dragoons, for the service of the parliament, to be commanded by the lord-general alone, and to be accountable to none but himself by the advice of both houses. They also recommended serjeant-major-general Skippon, who formerly had commanded the guard appointed to attend both houses, to command those horse and dragoons in chief under the lord-general; and col. Hurrey under Mr. Skippon. Whitlocke gives us the following Speech of the latter to his Soldiers; who, he says, were more taken with it than with a formal oration:

"Come my Boys, my brave Boys, let us pray heartily and fight heartily, I will run the same fortunes and hazards with you. Remember the cause is for God, and for the defence of yourselves, your wives, and children. Come my honest brave Boys, pray heartily and fight heartily, and God will bless us."

The Parliament's Answer to the King's last Message.] Nov. 16. The following Answer to the King's last Message, was read and agreed to by both houses:

"To your majesty's Message of the 12th Nov. we the lords and commons in parliament do make this humble answer, That this Message was not delivered to us till Monday the 14th. We thought it a strange introduction to peace, that your majesty should send your army to beat us out of our quarters at Brentford, and then appoint that place to receive our propositions; which yet it plainly appears your majesty intended not to receive, till you had first tried whether you could break through the army, raised for the defence of this kingdom and parliament; and take the city, being unprovided and secure in expectation of a fair treaty made to secure the city: if herein your majesty had prevailed, after you had destroyed the army and mastered the city, it is easy to imagine what a miserable peace we should have had; and whether those courses be suitable to the expressions your majesty is pleased to make, in your Answer to our Petition, of your earnestness to avoid any further effusion of blood, let God and the world judge.—As for our proceedings, they have, in all things, been answerable to all our professions: we gave directions to the earl of Essex to draw the army under his command, out of the city and suburbs, before we sent any Message to your majesty, so that part of it was quartered in Brentford before the committee returned with your Answer; and immediately upon the receipt thereof, that very morning, order was taken that the soldiers should exercise no acts of hostility against any of your majesty's people: we sent a Letter by sir Peter Killigrew to know your majesty's pleasure, whether you intended the like forbearance of hostility; but the fury of your soldiers, thirsting after blood and spoil, prevented the delivery of the letter; for coming, upon Saturday, in his way towards your majesty, as far as Brentford, he found them in fight there, and could pass no farther. God who sees our innocency, and that we have no aims but at his glory and the public good, will, we hope, free your maj. from these destructive counsels of some, who labour to maintain their own power by blood and rapine; and bless our endeavours, who seek nothing but to procure and establish the honour, peace, and safety of your majesty and kingdoms, upon the sure foundation of religion and justice."

The Parliament's Declaration on resolving to call in the Assistance of the Scots. Nov. 18. A Declaration was sent up from the commons, whereby one Mr. Pickering was authorized and required to deliver the same to the council of state in that kingdom, and otherwise to publish it as he should see occasion; and that instructions be sent to him to solicit the effects of it. It was also ordered, That the said Declaration should be delivered to the Scots commissioners residing here. To all which the lords agreed, and is as follows:

"We the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, considering with what wisdom and public affection our Brethren of the kingdom of Scotland did concur with the endeavours of this parliament, and the desires of the whole kingdom, in procuring and establishing a firm peace and amity between the two nations; and how lovingly they have since invited us to a nearer and higher degree of union, in matters concerning religion and church government, which we have most willingly and affectionately embraced and intend to pursue, cannot doubt but they will, with as much forwardness and affection, concur with us in settling peace in this kingdom, and preserving it in their own; that so we may mutually reap the benefit of that amity and alliance, so happily made and strongly confirmed betwixt the two nations. Wherefore, as we did about a year since, in the first appearance of trouble then beginning amongst them, actually declare, That, in our sense and apprehension of the national alliance betwixt us, we were thereby bound to apply the authority of parliament and power of this kingdom to the preservation and maintenance of their peace: and seeing now that the troubles of this kingdom are grown to a greater height, and the subtle practices of the common enemy of the religion and liberty of both nations do appear with more evidence, strength, and danger than they did at that time: we hold it necessary to declare, That in our judgment, the same obligation lies upon our Brethren by the aforementioned act, with the power and force of that kingdom to assist us, in repressing those amongst us who are now in arms and make war, not only without consent of parliament, but even against the parliament, and for the destruction thereof.—Wherefore we have thought good to make known to our Brethren, that his majesty hath given commission to divers eminent and known Papists, to raise forces and compose an army in the North, and other parts of this kingdom; which is to join with divers foreign forces intended to be transported from beyond the seas, for the destruction of this parliament, and of the religion and liberty of the kingdom. And that the prelatial part of the clergy, and their adherents, have likewise invited his majesty to raise another army; which, in his person, he doth conduct against the parliament and the city of London, plundering and robbing sundry well-affected towns within their power: and that, in prosecution of their malice, they are so presumptuous and predominant of his majesty's resolutions, that they forbear not those outrages in places to which his majesty hath given his royal word and protection. A great cause and incentive of which malice proceeds from the design they have to hinder the reformation of ecclesiastical government in this kingdom, so much longed for by all true lovers of the protestant religion.—And hereupon we further desire our brethren of Scotland, to raise such forces as they shall judge sufficient for the securing the peace of their own borders, against the ill-affected persons there; as likewise to assist us in suppressing the army of Papists and foreigners, which, as we expect, will shortly be on foot here; and, if they be not timely prevented, may prove as mischievous and destructive to that kingdom as to ourselves.—And though we seek nothing from his majesty, that may diminish his just authority or honour; and have, by many humble Petitions, endeavoured to put an end to this unnatural war and combustion in the kingdom, and to procure his majesty's protection and security for our religion, liberty, and persons, according to that great trust which his majesty is bound to by the laws of the land; and shall still continue to renew our petitions in that kind: yet, to our great grief, we see the papistical and malignant counsel so prevalent with his majesty, and his person so engaged to their power, that we have little hope of better success of our Petitions than we formerly had; and are thereby necessitated to stand upon our just defence, and to seek this speedy and powerful assistance of our brethren of Scotland, according to that act agreed upon in the parliament of both kingdoms, the common duty of Christianity, and the particular interests of their own kingdom: to which we hope God will give such a blessing, that it may produce the preservation of religion; the honour, safety, and peace of his majesty, and all his subjects; and a more strict conjunction of the counsels, designs, and endeavours of both nations, for the comfort and relief of the reformed churches beyond the seas." John Brown, Cler. Parl. Hen. Elsyng, Cler. Par. D. Com. Nov. 7. 1642.

The King's Answer, addressed to the Privy-Council of Scotland.] In Answer to the foregoing Declaration of Parliament, the king sent the following Message to the lords of his privy council of Scotland, some time after:

Right Trusty and Right Well-beloved Counsins and Counsellors, and Right Trusty and Well-beloved Counsellors, we greet you well;

"We have lately seen a Paper, presented to us by the earl of Lindsay, as a Declaration of the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, of the 7th of November, to our subjects of our kingdom of Scotland; which, after many high taxes of us and our government, very earnestly invites, and in a manner challenges, assistance from that our native kingdom, of men and arms for making a war against us; making a claim to that assistance, by virtue of the late act of Pacification, to the which (out of our desire to make a perpetual union between our two kingdoms, for the happiness of both, and by it the more firmly to establish our own greatness and just power) we cheerfully consented.—As we are at our soul afflicted that it hath been in the power of any factious, ambitious, and malicious persons, so far to possess the hearts of many of our subjects of England, as to raise this miserable distemper and distraction in this kingdom against all our real actions and endeavours to the contrary; so we are glad that this rage and fury hath so far transported them, that they apply themselves, in so gross a manner, to our subjects of Scotland; whose experience of our religion, justice, and love of our people, will not suffer them to believe those horrid scandals laid upon us; and their affection, loyalty, and jealousy of our honour, will disdain to be made instruments to oppress their native sovereign, by assisting an odious rebellion.—We have, from time to time, acquainted our subjects of that kingdom with the accidents and circumstances which have disquieted this; how (after all the acts of justice, grace, and favour performed on our part, which were, or could be, desired to make a people completely happy) we were driven, by the force and violence of rude and tumultuous assemblies, from our city of London, and our two houses of parliament: how attempts have been made to impose laws upon our subjects without our consent, contrary to the foundation and constitution, of this kingdom: how our forts, goods, and navy were seized and taken from us by force, and employed against us: our revenue and ordinary subsistence wrested from us: how we have been pursued with scandalous and reproachful language; bold, false, and seditious pasquils and libels publickly allowed against us; and been told, 'That we might, without want of modesty and duty, be deposed.'—Now, after all this, before any force was raised by us, an army was raised, and a general appointed to lead that army against us; with a commission to kill, slay, and destroy all such who should be faithful to us. That when we had been, by these means, compelled, with the assistance of our good subjects, to raise an army for our necessary defence; we sent divers gracious Messages, earnestly desiring that the calamities and miseries of a civil war might be prevented by a treaty, and so we might know the ground of this misunderstanding. How we were absolutely refused to be treated with; and how at last the army (raised, as was pretended, for the defence of our person) was brought into the field against us, gave us battle; and (though it pleased God to give us the victory) destroyed many of our good subjects, with as imminent danger to our own person and our children, as the skill and malice of desperate rebels could contrive. Of all which, and the other indignities which have been offered us, we doubt not the duty and affection of our Scots subjects will have so just a resentment, that they will express to the world the sense they have of our sufferings. And our good subjects of Scotland are not, we hope, so great strangers to the affairs of this kingdom, to believe that this misfortune and distraction is begot and brought upon us by our two houses of parliament; though, in truth, no unwarrantable action against the law can be justified even by that authority. They well know how the members of both houses have been driven thence, in so much that of above 500 members of the house of commons, there are not now there above 80, and of above 100 of the house of peers not above 15 or 16. All which are so awed by the multitude of Anabaptists, Brownists and other persons, desperate and decayed in their fortunes, in and about the city of London, that, in truth, their consultations have no

the freedom and privilege which belongs to parliaments.—Concerning any Commissions granted by us to Papists to raise forces, we must refer our good subjects to a Declaration, lately set forth by us upon the occasion of that scandal, which we send together with this; and for our own true and zealous affection to the protestant religion, (the advancement whereof our soul desires) we can give no other instance, than our constant practice, on which malice itself can lay no blemish, and those many Protestations we have made in the sight of Almighty God; to whom we know we shall be dearly accountable, if we fail in the observation.—For that scandalous imputation of our intention of bringing in foreign forces; as the same is raised without the least colour or shadow of reason, and solemnly disavowed by us in many of our Declarations, so there cannot be a clearer argument to our subjects of Scotland, that we have no such thought, than that we have hitherto forbore to require the assistance of that our native kingdom; from whose obedience, duty, and affection we should confidently expect it, if we thought our own strength here too weak to preserve us; and of whose courage and loyalty we shall look to make use, before we shall think of any foreign aid to succour us. And we know no reasonable or understanding man can suppose our good subjects of Scotland are obliged, or enabled by the late act of parliament in both kingdoms, to obey the invitation which is made to them by this pretended Declaration; when it is so evidently provided for by that act, ‘That as the kingdom of England shall not make war against the kingdom of Scotland, without consent of the parliament of England; so the kingdom of Scotland shall not make war against the kingdom of England, without the consent of the parliament of Scotland;’ and when they have always declared themselves so careful of our honour, safety, and just rights, which now undergo so great violation.—This we have thought fit to say upon occasion of this late Declaration, and do commend it to you the lords of our privy-council of our kingdom of Scotland, to be communicated and published to all our loving subjects there: and if the grave counsel and advice, which you derived hither by your act of the 22d of April last had been followed here, in a tender care of our royal person, and of our princely greatness and authority, then would not this face of confusion have appeared, which now threatens this kingdom; and therefore we require you to use your utmost endeavours to inform our subjects of that our kingdom of the truth of our condition; and that you suffer not the scandals and imputations laid on us by the malice and treason of some men, to make any impression in the minds of our people, to the lessening or corrupting their affection and loyalty to us; but that you assure them the hardships we now undergo, and the arms we have been compelled to take up, are for the defence of our person, and the safety of our life; for the maintenance of the true Protestant religion; for the preservation of the laws, liberties, and constitutions of this kingdom; and for the just privileges of parliament; and we look no longer for the blessing of Heaven, than we endeavour the defence and advancement of all these: and we doubt not a dutiful concurrence in our subjects of Scotland, in the care of our honours and just rights, will draw down a blessing upon that nation too.”

The King's Reply to the Parliament's last Answer.] Nov. 9. A Letter was read, directed to the lord Grey of Werk, as Speaker, from the lord Falkland, with his majesty's Reply, inclosed, to the Answer of both houses to his majesty's Message of the 12th instant, which was also read as follows:

“That his Message of the 12th, though not received by them till the 14th, was sent to them, first, upon the same day on which it was dated; and, meeting with stops by the way, was again sent upon the 13th, and taken upon that day, at ten in the morning, by the earl of Essex; and, though not to him directed, was by him opened; so the slowness of the delivery is not so strange, as the stop of that letter said to be sent by sir Peter Killigrew, which his majesty hath not yet received; but concludes, from the matter expressed to have been contained in that letter, (to wit, to know his pleasure, whether he intended the forbearance of hostility) and by the command of such forbearance, said to be sent to the lord of Essex's army, that no such forbearance was already concluded; and, consequently, neither had his majesty cause to suppose that he should take any of their forces unprovided and secure, in an expectation of a fair treaty; neither could any hostile act of his majesty's forces have been a course unsuitable to his expressions; much less could an endeavour to prepossess that place, (for so he hoped he might have done, which might have stopped the further march of these forces towards him; which, for ought appeared to him, might as well have been intended to Colebrook as Brentford; and, by that, the further effusion of blood) deserve that style.—His majesty further conceives, That the printing, so out of time, such a Declaration as their Reply to his Answer to theirs of the 26th of May, but the day before they voted the delivery of their Petition; and the march of the earl of Essex's forces to Brentford, so near to his majesty, when the committee at the same time attended him with a Petition for a treaty, (the earl of Essex being before possessed of all the other avenues to his army, by his forces at Windsor, Acton, and Kingston) was a more strange introduction to peace, than for his majesty not to suffer himself to be cooped up on all sides, because a treaty had been mentioned; which was so really and so much desired by his majesty, that this proceeding seems to him, purposely, by some intended to divert, which it could not do, that his inclination.—That his majesty had no intention to master the city by so advancing, besides his profession, which how meanly soever they seem to value it, he conceives a sufficient argument, especially being only opposed by suspicions and surmises, may appear by his not pursuing his victory at Brentford: but giving order to his army to march away to Kingston as soon as he heard that place was quitted, before any notice or further appearance of forces from London; nor could he find a better way to satisfy them before-hand, that he had no such intention, but that his desire of peace and of propositions that might conduce to it still continued, than by that Message of the 12th; for which care of his he was requited by such a reception of his Message and messenger, as was contrary at once both to duty, civility, and the very customs and the law of war and nations; and such as theirs, though after this provocation, have not found from him.*—His majesty wonders that his soldiers should be charged with thirsting after blood, who took above 500 prisoners in the very heat of the fight, his majesty having since dismissed all the common soldiers, and entertained such as were willing to serve him, and required only from the rest an oath not to serve against him. And his majesty supposes such most apt and likely to maintain their power by blood and rapine, who have got it only by oppression and injustice; that his is vested in him by the law, and by that only (if the destructive counsels of others would not hinder such a peace, in which that might once again be the universal rule, and in which religion and justice can only flourish) he desires to maintain it. And if peace were equally desired by them, as it is by his majesty, he conceives it would have been proper to have sent him such a Paper, as should have contained just propositions of peace, and not an unjust accusation of his counsels, proceedings, and person. And his majesty intends to march to such a distance from his city of London, as may take away all pretence of apprehension from his army, that might hinder them, in all security, from yet preparing them to present to him; and will there be ready either to receive them, or end the pressures and miseries which his subjects, to his great grief, suffer through this war, by a present battle."

When this was read, the earl of Northumberland informed the house, That he had received a packet of letters, taken about Mr. Murray, who brought this Reply from the king; and desired to be directed what to do with them. Hereupon the lords opened and perused the papers, and found a copy of the Reply, with a Declaration of his majesty, and a warrant sent to the king's printer to print them. Upon which a conference was resolved on with the other house, to desire them to join in appointing a committee, to consider what

Answer was fit to be given to this Reply of the king's; it being a business of so great consequence, that either a great deal of misery or a great deal of happiness would follow upon the resolution to be taken thereupon.

Farther Proposals from the Citizens of London.] Nov. 21. Mr. Shute, at the head of several citizens of London, appeared again before the commons. What he had to offer stands thus upon their Journals, "That he came to speak to them from the most active and the most religious part of the city, to acquaint the house they understood that an Accommodation was on foot; which grieved their hearts, considering what followed on the last. But if the Accommodation went not on, then to consider how monies might be raised, in such sort as that the whole charge might not lie upon the good and Godly party; but that the Malignant party might be forced to bear their share, fully, according to their abilities. Another thing which troubled them was an imputation cast upon the Godly party of the city, by the Malignant party, as if they desired an independent government should be set up in the church, which they desired might be wiped off."—After returning thanks to the citizens, the king's last Message was read; and the question being put, Whether the house would, forthwith, resolve itself into a committee to take it into consideration? it passed in the affirmative, by 75 against 65; when, after some debate on the Message, the question being again put, Whether the house should be resolved into a committee to-morrow morning to resume this debate? The house divided, when the numbers were 67 for the question and 66 against it.

Nov. 22. The commons being informed, That divers citizens were at the door, they were called in, and Mr. Shute, once more, told them, in the name of the rest, "That one thing, which exceedingly troubled them, was, the point of Accommodation of Peace, more to be feared than their power. If the Accommodation proceeded not, monies then to be raised. They would propound three ways: 1. Concerning plate in the halls of London. 2. Subscriptions in the several wards underwritten, not yet brought in. 3. Weekly subscriptions to be advanced. The means for saving of monies: 1. To cut off superfluous charges by unnecessary officers in the army. 2. That there may be due musters. 3. Indifferent honest men to be chosen in every ward, to raise and advance the subscriptions. Foreign merchants to be brought in, to give their assistance to the public."—Then they withdrew. And being again called in, Mr. Speaker, by command of the house, returned them thanks, as before.

Petition of both Houses, in Answer to the King's last Reply.] Nov. 23. A report was made to the lords of a conference held yesterday; in which Mr. Pym said, he was appointed by the commons to acquaint their lordships with some Votes passed by that house, in Answer to the king's Reply, to which they desired the lords concurrence. These were divided into two parts: "1. That, in the Answer to his majesty's Message, the houses should desire the king to return to his parliament; to the end that religion, laws, and liberties may be secured by the advice of parliament; that the process and justice of parliament, being the supreme court of judicature, might have its free course, and be executed on delinquents; and that they might not be protected and kept from justice by force. In particular, that the lord Digby and Mr. Henry Wilmot, be, presently, delivered over to the justice of parliament. That the commons remember what misfortune lately befel the two regiments, at Brentford, upon the last Treaty; therefore they now think fit to declare, That both armies shall be left to take all advantage they can, on both sides, in the mean time. 2. Concerning the Challenge; the commons say, They think it strange that the king of England should send a challenge and invitation to a battle with his own subjects, seeing, heretofore, his majesty seemed to decline the effusion of blood, and professed using all means to prevent the same: therefore the commons resolve to be in readiness; but if his majesty will withdraw himself from his cavaliers and the army, he shall be received; if not, they will not decline, if he has a mind to give a battle, the time and place being first appointed. These are the Heads the commons have resolved on; which, if their lordships should concur with, they desired that committees of both houses might be appointed to put them into a form fit to be sent to his majesty."

This report being made, the lords ordered, That the consideration of this matter should be put to a committee of their whole house then present; and immediately the house was adjourned during pleasure, the lords going into the Prince's Lodgings to debate it. And, in the afternoon, the earl of Holland, one of the committee, delivered in a draught of a Petition, to be presented to the king, in which they thought fit to leave out the whole relating to the Challenge, and only to send the following:

"May it please your majesty; It is humbly desired by both houses of parliament, That your majesty would be pleased to return to your parliament with your royal, not your martial, attendants: to the end that religion, laws, and liberties, may be settled and secured by their advice; finding, by a late and sad accident, that your majesty is invironed by some such counsels, as do rather persuade a desperate division, than a joining and a good agreement with your parliament and people; and we shall be ready to give your majesty assurances of such security, as may be for your honour and the safety of your royal person. Or else we shall, in convenient time, consider of fit Propositions to be sent to your majesty, such as may be for the preservation of God's true religion, your majesty's honour, safety, and prosperity, and to the peace and happiness of this and your other kingdoms."

The lords agreed to this Petition, and ordered it to be sent down to be communicated to the commons at another conference.—Next day a report of this conference was made in the lords, That the commons said they differed somewhat in opinion, about the conference last night, on the last Petition intended to be sent to his majesty. That they agreed to the first; but had resolved, That the latter part, beginning with the words, 'or else, &c.' should be left out. To this the lords consented; and also to another vote of that house, to send to the lord-general, the earl of Essex, to desire him to go on, notwithstanding, with all advantages, in prosecuting the war. Accordingly, the former part of the Petition was sent in a letter to the lord Falkland, to be by him presented to the king.

Nov. 24. The question being propounded in the commons, Whether Mr. Jessy, the king's servant, should have Mr. Speaker's warrant to go to the king, to carry him stockings, and other necessities; it passed in the affirmative by 26 against 18, but this on condition of Mr. Wheeler's undertaking, that Mr. Jessy should carry nothing else.

Speeches of the Earl of Manchester and Mr. Pym to the Citizens of London, on proposing an Assessment.] Nov. 25. An order had been made, the day before, for sending to the lord mayor to call a Common Hall, and this day a committee of five lords, with a proportionable number of commoners, were appointed to go thither. At this meeting the earl of Manchester,* one of the committee, and Mr. Pym another, were the mouths of the rest; whose speeches will best explain the errand they were sent upon.† And first,

The Earl of Manchester said:—"My lord mayor and gentlemen; I am commanded to come hither upon an errand, that I know, in the general, is never pleasing; which is, to express wants and necessities; but I know very well to whom I speak, it is to the worthy, the generous, and the loyal citizens of London; who have exceeded all story, in their care for the life and preservation both of the parliament and the whole kingdom; therefore it would imply a distrust of your present care to make a supply, if I should use any arguments to you: I shall only say this, That if there be not an enlargement of yourselves in some measure at the present, I shall be very unwilling to express the condition that I fear our army will be reduced to: this is all that I shall say, that if there be a present supply, I do not doubt but the army will move with that effect, as it will prevent all those barbarous and savage plunderings of the forces that are now under the command of those officers of the king. I confess the burthen hath lain very heavy upon the city of London only; but you shall have the grace and the honour of the preservation both of religion and the laws and liberties of this kingdom.—This gentleman, that is by me, will let you know that it is already in proposition, and I do not doubt but it will speedily have the concurrence of the lords with it) to take that care, that the future burthen shall not lie upon those here in the city of London, that have been careful to make supplies, even to the exhausting of themselves; but that it shall go generally to all those that have shrouded themselves under a kind of neutrality here in London; and that it shall go generally throughout all the counties of England; that so the common calamities shall be prevented, or supported by the common burden laid upon the whole kingdom.”

Then Mr. Pym spoke to this effect:—“ My lord mayor and gentlemen; We come not to tell your lordship and these worthy citizens only our wants and dangers, but we come to speak the thanks of the parliament to you, for that which you have already done; that you have shewed so much affection to the public, and that it hath produced so good effects throughout the whole kingdom, as that now you have an army raised, most out of this city, able to defend (with God’s blessing) the religion and liberty of the kingdom, if it may be upheld: and we come not only to give you thanks for that which you have done, but to stir you up to join with us in giving thanks to God that hath given such a blessing: to our endeavours, that when, by letters sent into all parts almost, they did presume before-hand to triumph in the ruin and plundering of this city, God prevented it, and hath kept you safe; kept your houses, your walls, your suburbs safe from that that was intended against you; and truly as we have sought for this blessing, by fasting and by prayer, so it is fit that we should testify our thanksgiving for it, and this is a necessary part of our errand which we are sent about: and that we may be servicable to God’s providence still, as he hath stirred up your hearts to do so much already, so that he would stir you up still to continue to do that which is fit to be done for the future; and that you will do it in such a way as may be most pleasing to yourselves.—We come not hither that, by any consent here in public, you should bind yourselves in particular; but we come to let you know the dangers of the kingdom, the sense the parliament hath of it, and of the city especially, that you may not lose that which hath been already done; but that you may go on still chearfully to do the full work. And we come to tell you, that the parliament doth intend the burden shall not lie upon you that are well affected and come in voluntarily; but that they have thought upon a way, and have begun it already, and I hope, within 2 or 3 days at the most, it shall be published to you, that all that are indisposed shall be forced to do that, which, out of readiness and chearfulness to the public good, they will not do of themselves: neither limit we it to the city and suburbs; but we are in a course to draw in all the counties of the kingdom, that as the burden is universal, so the aid may be universal; for this is the thoughts of the parliament.—If it please God to bless your forces that are already raised and continued, we hope you shall not only see peace again in the kingdom, and security for your religion, but see that the burden shall lie upon those who have been the engines and actors of the mischiefs and troubles that are come upon us, that they shall recompence the charges you have been at already.—This is the intention of the parliament, only for the present do somewhat; every man, as God shall enable him, do somewhat that may meet the present necessities: and prevent the dangers that require a present subsistence, and present supply of the army; without which what is it will follow, but the danger of the city, the ruin of the countries about, the stopping up of the river which is almost taken from you, and the loss of the sea coasts? You cannot have better hearts than you have; God hath enabled many of you with purses, I hope it will be so readily disposed that we shall have a full joy in the recompence of it, and the retribution; which we shall all pray God to bring to pass.”

The result of this was, that the citizens desired a committee of both houses might be sent to them, with a power to call some citizens and others to their assistance, and then they hoped this request of parliament would prove successful.

An Ordinance passed, for Assessing Non-Contributors to the Parliament’s Army.] The want of money to carry on the war being now so very urgent, the following Ordinance was sent up this day from the commons, for Assessing Non-Contributors upon the Propositions for lending Money and raising of horse and arms:

persons, there is no probable way, under God, but by the army raised by authority of parliament; which said army so raised cannot be maintained without great sums of money; yet for raising such sums, by reason of his majesty's withdrawing himself from the advice of the parliament, there can be no act of parliament passed with his majesty's assent, albeit there is great justice that the said money should be raised; the lords and commons in parliament having taken the same into their serious considerations, and knowing that the said army, so raised by them, hath been hitherto, for the most, maintained by the voluntary contributions of divers well-affected persons, who have freely contributed according to their abilities:—But considering there are divers others within the cities of London and Westminster, and the suburbs of the same, and also within the borough of Southwark, that have not contributed at all towards the maintenance of the said army; or if they have, yet not answerable to their estates, who, notwithstanding, receive benefit and protection by the said army, as well as others; and therefore it is most just that they should, as well as others, be charged to contribute to the maintenance thereof: Be it therefore ordained by the lords and commons in parliament assembled, and by authority thereof, That Isaac Pennington, lord mayor of London, sir John Woolaston, knight and alderman, aldermen Towes, Warner, Andrews, Chambers, and Fowke, Sir Tho. Soame, knight and alderman; Samuel Vassal, John Ven, Morris Thompson, and Rd. Warring, citizens, or any 4 of them, shall hereby have power and authority to nominate and appoint, in every ward within the city of London, 6 such persons as they or any 4 of them, shall think fit; which said 6 so nominated, or any 4 of them, shall hereby have power to enquire of any that shall remain, or be within the said several wards, that have not contributed upon the Propositions of both houses of parliament, concerning the raising of Money, Plate, Horse, Horsemen, and Arms, for defence of the king and both houses of parliament, and, also of such as are able men, that have contributed, yet not according to their estates and abilities.—And the said 6 persons so nominated, or any 4 of them, within their several and respective wards and limits, shall have power to assess such person and persons, as are of ability and have not contributed, and also such as have contributed, yet not according to their ability, to pay such sum or sums of money, according to their estates, as the said assessors, or any four of them, shall think fit and reasonable, so as the same exceed not the 20th part of their estates, and to nominate and appoint fit persons for the collection thereof.—And if any person so assessed shall refuse to pay the money assessed upon him, it shall be lawful to and for the said assessors and collectors, or any of them, to levy the said sum so assessed by way of distress and sale of the goods of the person so assessed, and refusing.—And if any person so distrained shall make resistance, it shall be lawful to and for the respective assessors and collectors, or any of them, to call to their assistance any of the Trained Bands of the said city of London, or any other his majesty's subjects, who are hereby required to be aiding and assisting to the said assessors and collectors in the premises.—And it is hereby further ordained, That the respective burgesses of Westminster and Southwark, together with the several committees appointed for the subscriptions of Money, Plate, Horse, Horse-Men, and Arms within the said city and borough, shall respectively have power hereby to nominate assessors for the same city and borough, in such manner as the lord mayor, &c. hath for the city of London; and the said assessors, or any 4 of them, to name collectors as aforesaid; which said assessors and collectors shall have the same power respectively, within their respective limits, as those to be nominated within the said city of London have hereby limited to them.—And for the suburbs of London and Westminster, the respective knights of the shire where the said suburbs are, shall have hereby the like power to name assessors; and they so named, or any 4 of them, and the collectors by them to be nominated, or any of them within their respective limits, shall have the like power respectively, as the assessors and collectors for London have by virtue of this Ordinance.—And be it ordained, That the sums so assessed and levied as aforesaid, shall be paid in at Guildhall, London, to the hands of sir John Woolaston, John Warner, John Towes, and Tho. Andrews, aldermen, or any two of them; and the assessors and collectors, to be nominated by virtue hereof, shall weekly report to the committee of the house of commons for the Propositions aforesaid, what sums of money have been assessed and what sums have been levied weekly, according to the purport hereof; and the said monies so levied and paid in, shall be issued forth in such sort, as the other monies raised upon the Propositions aforesaid, and not otherwise."

In consequence of this Ordinance the parliament proceeded to raise money by an assessment: but meeting with some difficulties in the collection thereof, they made another Ordinance to explain the first; whereby it was ordained, That if the collectors could not find sufficient assets to distrain upon the refusers, they had power to enquire what rents, tithes or debts were owing to them, and to demand the same of their respective tenants or debtors. This was followed by a third Ordinance, for the speedy execution of the first. Soon after came out another, empowering the collectors to break open any chests, trunks, boxes, doors, or other things, whereby to take a distress for the sums assessed. But all these not answering the urgent necessities of the parliament a fourth Ordinance was made; whereby, in such cases where the collectors should certify that a sufficient distress was to be had, but they could not come at it without opposition, two colonels and three captains, named in the said Ordinance, and such captains, lieutenants, officers, and soldiers as they should appoint, were authorized to search for the refusers of such assessment; and bring them before the committee of the house of commons for examinations, who had power given them, by this last Ordinance, to imprison the refusers in such places of the kingdom, and for so long time, as they should appoint and order; and that the families of all such persons, so imprisoned, should no longer remain within the cities of London and Westminster, the suburbs, and the counties adjacent. But at the same time that the parliament took such effectual care to raise this assessment upon the subjects at large, they made an Ordinance, That the several and respective assessors shall not assess any of the members of either of the houses of parliament, or the assistants of the house of peers; any thing in the preceding Ordinances, or any of them, to the contrary notwithstanding: but that the members of either house shall be assessed by that house whereof they are members, and the assistants of the peers by the house of peers.* This last Ordinance, however, for empowering the members to tax themselves, was carried in the house of commons by a majority of only 43 voices against 40.

The King's Answer to the said Ordinances.]

In consequence of these Ordinances the king published the following Declaration, addressed to all his loving subjects:

"It would not be believed (at least great pains have been taken that it might not) that the pretended Ordinance of the Militia, (the first attempt that ever was to make a law by Ordinance without our consent) or the keeping us out of Hull, and taking our arms and munition from us, could any way concern the interest, property, or liberty of the subject; and it was confessed by that desperate Declaration itself of the 26th of May, 'That if they were found guilty of that charge of destroying the title and interest of our subjects to their lands and goods, it were indeed a very great crime.' But it was a strange fatal lethargy which had seized our good people, and kept them from discerning, that the nobility, gentry, and commonalty of England, were not only stripped of their pre-eminences and privileges, but of their liberties and estates, when our just rights were denied us; and that no subject could, from thenceforth, expect to do well at home, when we were driven from our houses and our towns.—It was not possible that a commission could be granted to the earl of Essex, to raise an army against us; and, for the safety of our person and preservation of the peace of the kingdom, to pursue, kill, and slay us, and all who wish well to us; but that in a short time, inferior commanders, by the same authority, would require our good subjects, for the maintenance of the property of the subject, to supply them with such sums of money as they think fit, upon the penalty of 'being plundered with all extremity of war;' as the style of sir Edw. Baynton's warrant runs against our poor subjects in Wiltshire) and by such rules of unlimited arbitrary power, as are inconsistent with the least pretence or shadow of that property it would seem to defend.—If there could be yet any understanding so unskillful and supine to believe, that these disturbers of the public peace do intend any thing but a general confusion, they have brought them a sad argument to their own doors to convince them: after this Ordinance and Declaration it is not in any sober man's power to believe himself worth any thing, or that there is such a thing as law, liberty, or property left in England, under the jurisdiction of these men; and the same power that robs them now of the 20th part of their estates, hath, by that, but made a claim, and intitled itself to the other 19, when it shall be thought fit to hasten the general ruin.—Sure, if the minds of all men be not stubbornly prepared for servitude, they will look on this Ordinance, as the greatest prodigy of arbitrary power and tyranny that any age hath brought forth in any kingdom: other grievances, and the greatest, have been conceived intolerable, rather by the logic and consequence, than by the pressure itself; this, at once, sweeps away all that the wisdom and justice of parliaments have provided for them. Is their property in their estates, (so carefully looked to by their ancestors, and so amply established by us against any possibility of invasion from the crown) which makes the meanest subject as much a lord of his own, as the greatest peer, to be valued or considered? Here is a 20th part of every man's estate (or so much more as four men will please to call the 20th part) taken away at once; and yet a power left to take a 20th still of that which remains; and this to be levied by such circumstances of severity, as no act of parliament ever consented to. Is their liberty, which distinguishes subjects from slaves, and in which this free-born nation hath the advantage of all Christendom, dear to them? They shall not only be imprisoned in such places of this kingdom, (a latitude of judgment no court can challenge to itself in any cases) but for so long time as the committee of the house of commons for examination shall appoint and order; the house of commons itself having never assumed, or, in the least degree, pretended to a power of judicature; having no more authority to administer an oath, (the only way to discover and find out the truth of facts) than to cut off the heads of any of our subjects; and this committee, being so far from being a part of the parliament, that it is destructive to the whole, by usurping to itself all the power of king, lords, and commons.—All who know any thing of parliaments, know that a committee of either house ought not, by the law, to publish their own results; neither are their conclusions of any force without the confirmation of the house, which hath the same power of controlling them, as if the matter had never been debated: but that any committee should be so contracted (as this of examination, a style no committee ever bore before this parliament) as to exclude the members of the house, who are equally trusted by their country, from being present at their counsels, is so monstrous to the privileges of parliament, that it is no more in the power of any man to give up that freedom, than of himself to order, that, from that time, the place for which he serves shall never more send a knight or burgess to the parliament; and, in truth, is no less than to alter the whole frame of government, to pull up parliaments by the roots, and to commit the lives, liberties, and estates of all the people of England, to the arbitrary power of a few unqualified persons; who shall dispose thereof according to their discretion, without account to any rule or authority whatsoever.—Are their friends, their wives and children (the greatest blessings of peace, and comforts of life) precious to them? Would their penury and imprisonment be less grievous by those cordials? They shall be divorced from them, banished, and shall no longer remain within the cities of London and Westminster, the suburbs and the counties adjacent: and how far those adjacent counties shall extend no man knows.—Is there anything now left to enjoy but the liberty to rebel, and destroy one another? Are the outward blessings only of peace, property, and liberty, taken and forced from our subjects? Are their consciences free and unassaulted by the violence of these firebrands? Sure the liberty and freedom of conscience cannot suffer by these men. Alas! all these punishments are imposed upon them, because they will not submit to actions contrary to their natural loyalty, to their oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and to their late voluntary Protestation, which obliges them to the care of our person, and our just rights.—How many persons of honour, quality and reputation, of the several counties of England, are now imprisoned without any objections against them, but suspicion of their loyalty? How many of the gravest and most substantial citizens of London, by whom the government and discipline of that city was preserved, are disgraced, robbed, and imprisoned, without any process of law, or colour of accusation, but of obedience to the law and government of the kingdom; whilst Anabaptists and Brownists, with the assistance of vitious and debauched persons of desperate fortunes, take upon them to break up and rifle houses, as public and avowed ministers of a new invented authority? How many godly, pious, and painful divines, whose lives and learning hath made them of reverend estimation, are now slandered with inclination to popery: discounted and imprisoned, for discharging their consciences, instructing the people in the Christian duties of religion, and obedience; whilst schismatical, illiterate, and scandalous preachers fill the pulpits and churches with blasphemy, irreverence, and treason, and incite their auditory to nothing but murder and rebellion?—We pass over the vulgar charm, by which they have captivated such who have been contented to dispense with their consciences for the preservation of their estates; and by which they persuade men, chearfully, to part with this twentieth part of their estates to the good work in hand; for whoever will give what he hath, may escape robbing: They shall be repaid upon the public faith, as all other monies lent upon the Propositions of both houses. It may be so; but men must be condemned to a strange unthriftiness who will lend upon such security. The public faith indeed is as great an earnest as the state can give, and engages the honour, reputation, and honesty of the nation, and is the act of the kingdom; it is the security of the king, the lords, and commons, which can never need an executor, can never die, never be bankrupt; and therefore we willingly consented to it for the indemnity of our good subjects of Scotland (who we hope will not think the worse of it, for being so often and so cheaply mentioned since); but that a Vote of one or both houses should be an engagement upon the public faith, is as impossible as that the committee of the house of commons for examinations should be the high court of parliament.—And what is or can be said, with the least shadow of reason, to justify these extravagancies? We have not lately heard of the old fundamental laws which used to warrant the innovations; this needs a refuge even below those foundations. They will say, They cannot manage their great undertakings without such extraordinary ways. We think so too; but that proves only they have undertaken somewhat they ought not to undertake: not that it is lawful for them to do any thing that is convenient for those ends.—We remembered them long ago, and we cannot do it too often, of that excellent speech of Mr. Pym: The law is that which puts a difference betwixt good and evil, betwixt just and unjust; if you take away the law, all things will fall into confusion, every man will become a law unto himself; which in the depraved condition of human nature, must needs produce many great enormities; lust will become a law, and envy will become a law; covetousness and ambition will become laws; and what dictates, what decisions, such laws will produce, may easily be discerned. It may indeed, by the sad instances over the whole kingdom: but will posterity believe, that, in the same parliament, this doctrine was avowed with that acclamation, and these instances after produced? That, in the same parliament, such care was taken that no man should be committed, in what case soever, without the cause of his imprisonment expressed, and that all men should be immediately bailed, in all cases bailable: and, during the same parliament, that alderman Pennington, or indeed any body else but the sworn ministers of justice, should imprison whom they would, and for what they would, and for as long a time as they would? That the king should be reproached with breach of privilege for accusing sir John Hotham of high treason, when, with force of arms, he kept him out of Hull, and despised him to his face; because in no case, a member of either house might be committed or accused, without leave of that house of which he is a member: and yet that, during the same parliament, the same alderman should commit the earl of Middlesex, a peer of the realm, and the lord Buckhurst, a member of the house of commons, to the Counter, without reprehension? That to be a traitor (which is defined, and every man understands) should be no crime; and to be called a Malignant (which nobody knows the meaning of) should be ground enough for close imprisonment? That a law should be made, That whosoever should presume to take Tunnage and Poundage, without an act of parliament, should incur the penalty of a premunire; and, in the same parliament, that the same imposition should be laid upon our subjects, and taken by an Order of both houses, without and against our consent? Lastly, That in the same parl. a law should be made to declare the proceedings and judgment upon Ship-Money to be illegal and void; and during that parliament, that an Order of both houses shall, upon pretence of necessity, enable four men to take away the 20th part of their estates from all their neighbours, according to their discretion.—But our good subjects will no longer look upon these and the like results, as upon the counsels and conclusions of both our houses of parliament, though all the world knows even that authority can never justify things unwarrantable by law; they well know how few of the persons trusted by them are present at their consultations; of above 500, not 80; and of the house of peers, not above a fifth part; that they who are present enjoy not the privilege and freedom of parliament; but are besieged by an army, and awed by the same tumults, which drove us and their fellow-members from thence, to consent to what some few seditious, schismatical persons amongst them do propose.—These are the men who, joining with the Anabaptists and Brownists of London, first changed the government and discipline of that city; and now, by the pride and power of that city, would undo the kingdom, whilst their lord mayor (a person accused and known to be guilty of high treason) by a new legislative power of his own, suppresses and reviles the Book of Common-Prayer, robs and imprisons whom he thinks fit, and, with the rabble of his faction, gives laws to both houses of parliament; and tells them they will have no accommodation: whilst the members, sent and entrusted by their counties, are expelled the house, or committed, for refusing to take the oath of Association to live and die with the earl of Essex, as very lately sir Sidney Montague. These are the men who have presumed to send ambassadors, and to enter into treaties with foreign states, in their own behalf; having, at this time, an agent of their own with the states of Holland, to negotiate for them upon private instructions. These are the men who, not thinking they have yet brought mischief enough upon this kingdom, at this time invite and solicit our subjects of Scotland to enter this land with an army against us. In a word, these are the men, who have made this last devouring Ordinance to take away all law, liberty and property from our people; and have, by it, really acted that upon our people, which, with infinite malice, and no colour or ground, was laboured to be infused into them, to have been our intention by the Commissions of Array.—We have done. What power and authority these men have, or would have, we know not: for ourself we challenge none such; we look upon the pressures and inconveniences our good subjects bear, even by us and our army (which the army first raised by them enforced us to levy in our defence, and their refusal of all offers and desires of treaty enforceth us to keep) with very much sadness of heart: we are so far from requiring a 20th part of their estates, (though for their own visible preservation) that, as we have already sold or pawned our own jewels, and coined our own plate, so we are willing to sell all our own land and houses for their relief; yet we do not doubt but our good subjects will seriously consider our condition, and their own duties, and think our readiness to protect them with the utmost hazard of our life, deserves their readiness to assist us with some part of their fortunes; and whilst other men give a 20th part of their estates, to enable them to forfeit the other 19, that they will extend themselves to us in a liberal and free proportion for the preservation of the rest; and for the maintenance of God's true religion, the laws of the land, the liberty of the subject, and the safety and very being of parliament and of this kingdom; for if all these ever were, or can be, in manifest danger, it is now in this present rebellion against us.—Lastly, we will and require all our loving subjects of what degree or quality soever, as they will answer it to God, to us, and to posterity, by their oaths of allegiance and supremacy; as they would not be looked upon now, and remembered hereafter, as betrayers of the laws and liberty they were born to; that they, in no degree, submit to this wild pretended Ordinance; and that they presume not to give any encouragement, or assistance, to the army now in rebellion against us: which if, notwithstanding, they shall do, they must expect from us the severest punishment the law can inflict, and a perpetual infamy with all good men."

The King's Answer to the Petition of both Houses, of the 21th.] Nov. 28. The king's Answer to the Parliament's last Petition to him, was read in the house of lords as follows:

"We expected such Propositions from you, as might speedily remove and prevent the misery and desolation of this kingdom; and that, for the effecting thereof, (we now residing at a convenient place, not far from our city of London) committes from both our houses of parliament should attend us; for you pretended, by your Message to us at Colebrooke, that those were your desires: instead thereof (and thereby let all the world judge of the design of that overture) we have only received your humble Petition, 'That we would be pleased to return to our parliament, with our royal, not our martial attendance.' All our good subjects that remember what we have so often told you and them upon this subject, and what hath since passed, must, with indignation, look upon this Message, as intended by the contrivers thereof for a scorn to us; and thereby designed by that Malignant Party (of whom we have so often complained, whose safety and ambition is built upon the divisions and ruins of this kingdom, and who have too great an influence upon your actions) for a wall of separation betwixt us and our people. We have told you the reasons why we parted from London; how we were chased thence, and by whom: we have often complained that the greatest part of our peers, and of the members of our house of commons, could not, with safety to their honours and persons, continue and vote freely among you; but, by violence and cunning practices, were debarred of those privileges which their birth-rights, and the trust reposed in them by their counties, gave them; the truth whereof may sufficiently appear by the small number of those that are with you. We have offered to meet both our houses in any place free and convenient for us and them, but we could never receive the least satisfaction in any of these particulars, nor for those scandalous and seditious pamphlets and sermons which swarm amongst you. That is all one you tell us: 'it is now for our honour, and for the safety of our royal person, to return to our parliament.' But herein your formerly denying us a negative voice gives us cause to believe, that, by giving yourselves that name without us, you intend not to acknowledge us to be part of it. The whole kingdom knows that an army was raised under pretence of Orders of both houses, an usurpation never heard of before in any age; which army hath pursued us in our own kingdom, gave us Battle at Keynton, and endeavoured to take away the life of us and our children; and yet (these rebels being newly recruited, and possessed of our city of London) we are courteously invited to return to our parliament there; that is, into the power of this army. Doth this signify any other thing, than that, since the traiterous endeavours of those desperate men could not snatch the crown from our head, (it being defended by the providence of God, and the affections and loyalty of our good subjects) we should now tamely come up and give it them; and put ourselves, our life, and the lives, liberties, and fortunes of all our good subjects into their merciful hands? Well, we think not fit to give any other Answer to this part of your Petition: but as we impute not this affront to both our houses of parliament, nor to the major part of those that are now present there, but to that dangerous Party we and the whole kingdom must cry out upon; so we shall, for our good subjects sake, and out of our most tender sense of their miseries and the general calamities of this kingdom, which must, if this war continue, speedily overwhelm this whole nation, take no advantage of it. But, if you shall really pursue what you presented to us at Colebrooke, we shall make good all we then gave you in Answer to it, whereby the hearts of our distressed subjects may be raised with the hopes of peace; without which religion, the laws, and your liberties, can no way be settled and secured. Touching the late and sad accident you mention, if you thereby intend that of Brentford, we desire you, once, to deal ingenuously with the people; and to let them see our last Message to you, and our Declaration to them, concerning the same; (both which we sent to our press at London, but were taken away from our messenger, and not suffered to be published) and then we doubt not but they will be soon undeceived, and easily find out those counsels, which do rather persuade a desperate division, than a good agreement betwixt us, our two houses, and people."

An Ordinance for fitting out Ships to cut off all Supplies from the King.] Nov. 29. An Ordinance of parl. was made, For the speedy setting forth certain Ships, in all points furnished for war, to prevent the bringing over soldiers, money, ordnance, and other ammunition from beyond the sea, to assist the king against the parliament of England. By this Ordinance it was declared, That all adventurers in this enterprise should have and enjoy all ships, goods, money, plate, arms, ammunition, victuals, pillage, and spoil, which should be seized or taken, as their own proper goods.

Sir S. Montague, a Member, committed to the Tower, for refusing to assist the Earl of Essex.] December 3. The question for adhering to the earl of Essex in this cause, for the maintenance and preservation of the true protestant religion, the king's person, the laws of the land, the peace of the kingdom, the liberty and property of the subject, and the rights and privileges of parliament, was this day read to sir Sidney Montague, (member for Huntingdonshire) and his vote demanded: and he gave his negative voice unto it. Hereupon the commons resolved, by a majority of 48 voices against 45, 1. "That he be disabled for continuing any longer a member of this house, during this parliament. 2. That his person be forthwith secured. And, 3. That he be forthwith committed prisoner to the Tower." Sir Sidney was then called to the bar, and, kneeling there, Mr. Speaker pronounced sentence against him accordingly, for not yielding his consent to assist the earl of Essex in the maintenance of religion, the king's person, the liberty of the subject, the rights and privileges of parliament; and giving for his reason, That the king had declared such traitors, as should adhere unto the said earl in this cause; and pulled a Declaration out of his pocket, and thereby seemed to lay an imputation upon all the members, and others, that had declared to assist the said earl in this cause: the house thinking it a great crime, that any member should be guided by Declarations from abroad, and not by his own judgment in giving his vote.

State of the Kingdom at this time.] After the late rencounter at Brentford, the king withdrew his army over Kingston-Bridge to Oatlands; and from thence, by Colebrooke and Reading, to Oxford. At the same time the earl of Newcastle had associated all the counties North of Yorkshire, for the king; on which commissions were sent down from the parliament, to the lord Fairfax and others, to associate the last-named county with all the midland counties up to North-Wales. However, the earl marched forward, with an army of Northumbrians, &c. towards York. At Piersbridge, a pass over the river Tees, he was opposed by a party of lord Fairfax's horse, commanded by capt. Horham, whom the earl dispersed, and marched strait to York; where he published a Declaration, setting forth the reasons for his taking up arms for the king.—The parliament had also brought several counties, in the West of England, into an association; and some matters are entered in the Journals, for the encouragement of this project. In the South the event was various; Farnham castle, in Surry, was taken by the high sheriff, for the king; which sir Wm. Waller soon after retook for the parliament. But this loss was made up by the king's forces taking the town of Marlborough by storm, under the command of lords Digby, Grandison, Wilmot, Wentworth, &c. so that now the kingdom was in a flame, from one end to the other.

Some Citizens of London complain of an intended Petition for an Accommodation.] Dec. 9. Two Petitions to parliament being on foot, at the same time, in the city of London, but widely different in their contents, Mr Shute appears again in the Journals of the commons, declaring, "That, with all thankfulness, the Godly Party acknowledged the open care of that house to all their desires: that they did subject their money and lives, to the last drop of blood in their veins, to be disposed of by parliament: But they desired to clear themselves from an imputation cast upon them by the Malignants, 'That they petition against Peace.' This, he said, was far from their intentions; but their desires were for an honourable and secure peace: that the Malignant Party went about to get hands to a Petition to procure a Treaty, that the enemy might gain time to recollect their broken strength; well knowing that they are so, and that they want powder and ammunition." He then presented a copy of the adverse Petition, which was read; but after returning thanks to Mr. Shute and the rest of the citizens, for this fresh mark of their esteem, the further consideration of this Petition was deferred to another time: and, a day or two after, Mr. Shute, it seems, growing too bold in addressing the house, two of the members were ordered to acquaint him, That the commons resented some expressions used by him, and admonished him how to demean himself hereafter, when he came to give information to them.

A Letter from Devonshire, giving an Account of the State of Affairs in the West.] As the history of this Intestine War will be best known by the Letters of Intelligence, which were sent to the parliament, from different parts of the kingdom, the insertion of them, in their proper order of time, will not only illustrate several passages in the course of this work, but open many scenes of importance, hitherto concealed from the public. We shall begin with a letter from Devonshire, which was, on the 13th of this month, presented to the lords, by the commons, at a conference. It was addressed to the lords, and others, of the Committee for the Safety of the Kingdom, at Westminster:

"Right honourable; According to our duty and trust reposed in us, we have used our best endeavours for the preservation of this county; and although little assistance hath been afforded us by the people here, to what we expected, yet God, that never fails those that go on in his way, and rest upon his power and goodness, hath so blessed us now in this time of straits, that he hath done great things for us by small means: to him therefore be the glory and the praise. Upon Tuesday the 29th of Nov. capt. Thompson and capt. Pym, by command of colonel Ruthen, went to Plimpton, to keep that town, with their troops and about 70 dragoons and 200 foot, if they saw it might have been kept without great hazard; but, the next day, hearing the enemies were marching from Tavistock, with (as was related to us) 3000 horse and foot, and 8 pieces of ordnance; and finding the town of Plimpton not to be kept without as great a force as should come against it, by reason the town lies so scattering, and several villages so near it; and so, lest the enemy should come between them and Plymouth, they drew forth towards the enemy; but, night coming on, they could not come to give them charge, without hazard and damage one of another in the dark; they then went to Plymouth. The day after, being Thursday, colonel Ruthen, with 4 troops of horse and the aforesaid dragoons, went to Plimpton to view the town, and to see the motion of the enemy; and, finding the town as was related to him, he then drew towards Plymouth, and stood upon the Lary for the space of 3 hours; forcing the enemy, who attempted one charge to have drawn us to their ambuscades, to fly presently; and durst not (with all their force, which we judge was at least 2500 horse and foot then left, for many ran away the night before) give us a charge upon fair ground; but that night they went to Plimpton, where they continued till the 7th of this month. Colonel Ruthen, with the aforesaid 4 troops of horse and about 100 dragoons, about 3 of the clock in the morning, marched from Plymouth over Rubart Downs, being a bye-way to Modbury; where were gathered together, by the sheriff's commands, 3 or 4000 men, some with arms, and some without; and we came so privately that they did not discover us until we were within a mile of the town; which did so amaze them, that after sir Ralph Hopton drew up all the men he could presently get, he, with sir Nich. Slanning, ran away and escaped: and after a small skirmish with those that stood to it, we took prisoners, the sheriff sir Edm. Fortescue, and his brother; sir Edw. Seymour, knight of the shire for Devonshire, and his son; Mr. Basset, capt. Pomeroy, capt. Wood, capt. Penrose, lieut. Barnes of Exon, and many others. —From thence we marched that day, a long march of 16 hours on horseback, with our prisoners, to Dartmouth, to the gladding of the hearts of the good people there; for, while we were upon our march towards Modbury, one Mr. Tho. Leigh was in treaty with sir Ralph Hopton, about the delivery up of the town, as we were informed; and, by his own confession since, he had got a warrant to free his house from plundering; this Mr. Leigh we have also taken, and, with the rest of the prisoners, have sent to Plymouth, this morning, in a frigate called the Crescent, by one capt. Plunket. We ran a great hazard in this service, as your honours may judge, for the enemy lay on both sides with all their forces; part at Plimpton and part at Totness: but the Lord carried us along in our way, and delivered the enemies of his truth and of our liberties, into our hands, and made many more to fly before us: the prisoners col. Ruthen hath ordered to be sent from Plymouth, with the first fair wind, to London; and we now lie here, expecting some force from Exon to join with us; and, if we can have but 1000 dragoons, we hope to do the enemy much damage. We hear, this day, that since our coming hither the enemy is advanced with the greatest part of their force to Totness; what are left at Plimpton we know not. If speedy supply comes not of men, money, and arms, we fear they will plunder most of the good towns in this county; and what it may grow to, if God doth not mightily work for us, we know not. Your honours know of what great concernment the keeping of this county is, and we doubt not but the great need of assistance will be sufficient to move your honours to take into consideration the premises; which that your honours would be pleased to do, is the humble petition of Your, &c. WM. RUTHEN, ALEX. PYM, GEO. THOMPSON, ANTH. ROUSE, LEWIS DICK. Dartmouth, Dec. 9, 1642."

Mr. Hollis appointed Commander in Chief in the West.] At the foregoing conference the lords were informed, That, upon occasion of this Letter, the Commons had passed these Votes following, wherein they desired their lordships' concurrence; "1. That Mr. Hollis be desired to command the forces in the Western parts in chief. 2. That my lord general be desired to grant a commission to Mr. Hollis accordingly. 3. That a committee of lords and commons may recommend to the city the state of the Western counties, and earnestly move them, in regard of the importance of those counties, to assist the setting forth of a considerable strength to be sent into those parts; that the Letter from Dartmouth be communicated to the city of London; and that those committees of both houses may be a standing committee, to take care of the furtherance and sending away such supplies as are resolved to be sent." The lords agreed to all these Votes, and the following peers were appointed to be committees to join with a proportionable number of the commons, viz. the earls of Pembroke and Bolingbroke, the lord Say and Sele, the lords Grey de Werk, Brooke, and Wharton.

Thanksgiving for the taking of Winchester.] Dec. 16. A message came from the lord general, with a relation that the parliament's forces had taken the castle and city of Winchester, with the lord Grandison and 24 other commanders prisoners, 700 soldiers, 600 horse, and 600 arms, with the loss of a few men only. For which victory the lord general intended to give public Thanks to God, the next Lord's day, at Windsor, for this great success without loss of blood. His lordship desired the lords would give order that a public Thanksgiving might be observed the same day in London and Westminster. On which the house ordered, That the lord mayor be desired to cause public Thanks to be given within the said city and liberties; the justices of peace for Westminster and Middlesex were also ordered to do the same, and every where to express their joy, by ringing of bells, &c. for this victory.

Lord Fairfax's Account of the State of the Northern Counties.] At the same time a Letter from lord Fairfax, was read, giving an Account of the State of Affairs in the Northern counties. It was addressed to the Speaker of the house of peers pro tempore: viz.

"May it please your lordship; Upon Saturday last, I received a Declaration of parliament, with a commission from his excellency the earl of Essex, to command in chief over the forces of the North, and other adjacent counties; which great honour and trust, far above any ambition or merit, by your lordships conferred on me, I shall exercise with all care and fidelity; not doubting but that your lordships will enable me therein, with such other supplies as the necessity of the service shall require, and that represented from hence. The State of Affairs in these parts, since my last dispatch of the 1st of this month, stands in this manner: The earl of Newcastle is come to York, and joined his forces to the earl of Cumberland, making in all, as I am informed, about 8000 men, horse and foot, of which there is about 2000 horse and dragoons; a strength far too potent to be resisted by the small power which I have here, whereof I send a List inclosed: Our strength was once estimated by ourselves far greater than now it appears; for upon the earl of Newcastle's coming over the Tees, sir Edward Loftus with all the Richinondshire men, and sir Henry Anderson with all the Cleveland men and the rest of the North-Riding, which were estimated at 1000 men, did all return to their own houses, save about 130 men brought hither by sir Matthew Boynton, some other gentlemen, and one troop of horse raised by sir Henry Foulis, and about 40 horse more brought hither by captain Anderson. Besides this defect, our numbers are decreased by sir Hugh Cholmley, to whom I have sent divers orders to march Northward, to join with captain Hotham and the rest, in resisting the earl of Newcastle's entry, before he came into Yorkshire; and, since his entry, to come to me and the rest of the army at Tadcaster, but he found such impediments as he could do neither; and now I hear he is gone to Scarbrough, and taken his forces with him, which were about 700 men; col. Boynton, whose regiment consisted of 800 foot, is likewise marched towards Hull, although I sent him divers orders to march up hither to assist the forces at Tadcaster, giving me neither reason of his not coming to me, nor of his march towards Hull. I understood that sir John Gell had raised 800 men in Derbyshire, and sent unto him to march hither to our succour; but I have received an answer from him, that he is not able yet to stir from thence: from sir Anthony Irby, nor the Lincolnshire men, I hear nothing, though I have sent to them express messengers: so our whole strength here (upon return of the former sent into the North) consisting of 21 companies of foot, and seven troops of horse, and one company of dragoons, we did send, of them, 2 companies of foot to secure Selby, and one company to secure Cawood castle; and quartered the rest, part of them at Wetherby, under command of captain Hotham, whom I have nominated to be lieut. general of the army, and the rest at Tadcaster, under my own command.—Upon Tuesday receiving intelligence that the earl of Newcastle, with his whole forces, intended to fall upon our quarter at Tadcaster, I sent to capt. Hotham to bring up the forces at Wetherby; which being done, and the earl of Newcastle's army come in sight, we drew our men into the uttermost part of our quarter, where we had raised some breast-works for our musqueteers: there the fight began about 11 of the clock, and so continued, in sharp dispute, until about 4 of the clock in the evening; in which time there was at least 40,000 musquet-shot discharged on both sides, and great numbers of cannon shot.—The enemy had once won part of the town and beaten our men, and placed some of their companies in two or three houses, which did much endanger us; but in the end our men, with great courage, forced them out again, recovered and burnt the houses, and killed many of the enemy's men that were there placed; and, in conclusion, forced the whole army to retreat, leaving very many of their men dead, and very great numbers wounded: the certain numbers, nor qualities of the persons we could not take, but it is generally said by the country people that there were, at least, 100 found killed and burnt, and we took 17 prisoners in the fight: on our part we lost 6 men, and captain Wm. Lister, a valiant and gallant gentleman, who was shot with a musquet bullet in the head; we had about 20 more wounded, but lost not one prisoner in the battle; though divers of our men, being negligent of their duty, stayed behind us when we quitted the quarter; and so were taken there by the enemy, the next day, and made prisoners. In this fight our men behaved themselves with very great resolution, far beyond expectation, in so much, as I conceive, we might have maintained the place still, if we had been furnished with powder and shot; but having spent in a manner all our whole store of bullet, match, and powder, I advised with the commanders, and, by general consent, it was thought fit to rise with our forces, and to march to Cawood and Selby, to secure those places; and there to receive supplies of ammunition and men: this was accordingly done, and now I am at Selby with part of the army, and the rest with capt. Hotham at Cawood. Yesterday I sent my son, sir Tho. Fairfax, with 5 companies of foot, and 2 troops of horse to Leeds; intending he should continue there to secure that place, and the other clothing towns, against the earl of Newcastle's forces, if it were possible; but the enemy's forces were laid so strong in the way, as he could not pass, so he only beat up a quarter of the enemies in a small village, took 5 prisoners, and retreated to Selby.—Thus, my lord, I have briefly represented the condition of the army at present; which, I must confess, I fear will very suddenly grow worse, if not utterly broken up; and that especially for want of money, I having not above a week's pay provided before-hand, and no visible means left to raise maintenance for them, unless I should give the soldiers free quarters upon the country: a cure, in my conceit, as dangerous as the disease, and peradventure not possible to be effected if the enemy be still masters of the field, and cut off our men as they go abroad to levy sustenance; which they may do, and yet not able to beat up our quarters. I have hitherto supported this army by the loans and contributions, for the most part, of the parishes of Leeds, Halifax, and Bradford, and some of the small cloathing towns adjacent; being the only well-affected people in the country, who, I much fear, may suffer by this Popish army of the North; merely for their good affection to religion and the public liberty. Of the rest of the country I was not able to draw any considerable help, the enemy having garrisons in so many places, who threaten to ruin any that should assist the parliament and their cause, with money or other helps.—My lord, in sum, the state of the country is thus: The enemy is mighty, and master of the field, plentifully supplied from his majesty, and the Popish and Malignant Party, with monies and all other necessities. The well-affected party, as now it is divided, not considerable; the aid from Lincolnshire, Derbyshire, and other counties, very uncertain; the want of money here such as will force us to disband within ten days. If the enemy become once absolute masters of Yorkshire, they will force contributions and succours from the country, which will raise a very formidable army, and put the whole cause in peril, if God do not miraculously defend it.—I beseech their lordships seriously to consider of it, and send such speedy supplies of men and money, as may enable me to go forward in the service; which I shall not fail to do with a constant fidelity. Their lordships have, heretofore, assigned 2000*l.* for our succour; but the most part of it is still at London, where it lies for want of exchange or convoy: and therefore what shall now be sent must come either by sufficient convoy of forces by land, or else by sea to Hull, and so hither to me. The Scots officers came hither yesterday; but now we are so straitened that we have no men to resort to us to put under their command, nor have we any money to pay them. The further relation of these affairs I leave to capt. Hatcher, who follows these letters purposely to give true relation to the house of these affairs; he hath been an eye-witness to most of the passages in this country, from the first of raising of arms; to his further expression I shall leave it, with this addition only, That if the country or cause suffer, their lordships will discern, by this relation, in whom the fault hath been, and impute it accordingly; for nothing hath been omitted, possible to be effected, by Your, &c. FRED. FAIRFAX. Dec. 10, 1642, from Selby."

Dec. 19. The Lords went again on the Propositions for Peace, and a great debate ensued thereupon. The third Article, concerning Delinquents, was read, and put to the question, Whether the house shall make this proposition to the king, That all which are impeached by the house of commons, at this time, shall be left to take their trial by parliament? It passed in the negative.

A Petition from several Citizens of London to Parliament for Peace: which is ill received. This day the city of London, by an order of common council, presented a Petition to both houses, in which was inclosed another to his majesty; which, after their approbation, they desired might be conveyed to him. At the same time was presented another Petition from many citizens and inhabitants of that city. Both these were for peace and a speedy agreement: upon the former the commons passed two votes, to which the lords consented, declaring their great approbation thereof, and that it was fit this Petition to the king should be presented to him. The other met with a different reception. Neither of them are mentioned in the Collections of the times; but we meet with a copy of the latter in the Lords Journals:

"To the right hon. the Lords and Commons assembled in parliament: The Humble PETITION of divers Citizens, Inhabitants of the City of London and Liberties thereof, with the Inhabitants of the Borough of Southwark and places adjacent,

"Sheweth, That the present sense of our miseries, and the apprehension of the inevitable ruin both of the church and commonwealth, make us become suitors to this honourable assembly, the likeliest means, under God, for our relief; to consider our distressed estate, and provide a speedy remedy for our present and future evils; earnestly to desire you to weigh the care and judgment of your predecessors, who, by a known law, settled and preserved our Protestant religion, our liberties and properties, with a right understanding between king and subject, which produced peace and plenty in our estates; and to reflect, with serious thoughts, upon our present distempers, violating religion by Papists and Sectaries, engaging our nation in a civil and destructive war, invading our laws and liberties, endangering all our lives, and utterly disabling us to relieve our distressed brethren in Ireland.—We beseech you likewise to consider the effects of a Civil War, as the destruction of Christians, and the unnatural effusion of blood; fathers against sons; brothers by brothers, friends by friends, slain; then famine and sickness, the followers of a continued war, making way for a general confusion and invasion by a foreign nation; whilst our treasure is exhausted, our trade lost, and the kingdom dispeopled: these things, weighed and enlarged, by your wisdoms, we doubt not will be as strong a motive in you to labour, as in us to desire, a speedy Peace and happy Accommodation. Wherefore we humbly crave that, not lending ear to any the fomenters of the present war, under what pretence soever; or remembering ought that may increase jealousies or continue divisions between his majesty and the houses of parliament; you will tender his maj. according to his royal intimations, such Propositions for Accommodation as he may, with honour and safety to the whole kingdom, accept; for the effecting whereof we shall be ready to assist you with the best and utmost of our abilities; and whilst you endeavour for peace, we shall send up our prayers to Heaven for the blessing of peace upon you and all that desire it."

The petitioners withdrew, and the house took into consideration what Answer to give to their Petition; and, after debate, the gentleman-usher was commanded to let those that brought this Petition know, That their lordships have received a complaint against this Petition from the commons, and will take the same into consideration: and a committee was appointed to consider of, and to take examinations about, the managing and procuring of this Petition.—The lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city, upon presenting their own Petition to the commons, protested against this latter, saying, They had damned it by a public act; and did desire that when hereafter any Petition came to parliament, in the name of the city of London, and was not attested by the hand of the town-clerk, it might be rejected, and not esteemed as a Petition from their city.

The Lords resolve to except some Delinquents from Trial by Parliament.] Dec. 20. Although a vote had passed yesterday concerning Delinquents, That they were not all to be included in their designed Propositions to the king for Peace, the house of commons had got that Order over-ruled in some measure: for though a committee of lords had been appointed to consider of the naming of such Delinquents as were to be excepted out of their act of grace, who this day brought in their opinion, That those only who had been impeached before the 1st of Jan. last, should be proceeded against in parliament; yet the lord Digby, particularly, though he had been impeached since that time, was left to the judgment of parliament.—Then the committee proceeded to name such persons as were fit to be removed from the king; as, the marquis of Hertford to lose his office about the prince; the earl of Bristol, the lord Herbert of Ragland (eldest son of the earl of Worcester), Mr. Piercy, Mr. Jermyn, and Mr. Wilmot, to be removed from court. And, after a long debate, the following Question was put: "Those that are of opinion to agree with the committee, That, at this time, such as the committee have named to be impeached by the commons, should be left to the trial of parliament, omitting the rest of those which are impeached, say Content;" and it passed affirmatively.

A Protest thereupon.] On which the following lords entered their Dissent; and, after repeating the two last questions of yesterday and to-day, carried against them, they proceeded to say,

"We whose names are subscribed, do conceive that the demanding, by this house, of some to be left to justice, and leaving out of others, who are under the like impeachment of high treason, and have been, by force of arms, protected from being brought to a trial, in the highest court of judicature, is an example of very ill consequence: because we conceive that it is not proper for this house to move the house of commons, in the stopping of their proceedings upon impeachments; and that it doth not only give encouragement to a king to attempt the like stoppage of justice by force, and, from this precedent, to stand upon the protecting of persons impeached; but to subjects also, who may be induced to undertake any thing in hopes of impunity, even from the desires of this house; which hath not demanded any one of those to be left to trial, who, since his majesty's going to York, have been impeached of high treason, for actual levying war against the king and kingdom. Upon these, amongst other reasons, we have demanded our right of Protestation; and do now accordingly enter it, to clear ourselves from any inconveniences that may follow from these Votes; which are, in our opinion, very prejudicial to the privileges of parliament and the liberty of the subject. WARWICK, PETERBOROUGH, MANCHESTER, SAY and SELE, WHARTON, BOLINGBROKE, WILLUGHBY of Parham, BROOKE, GREY de WEREK."

Next was read the whole of the Propositions for Peace, which were agreed on by the lords, and ordered to be sent down to the commons.

Dec. 22 Petitions came up from different parts of the kingdom to the lords, all crying loudly for peace. To which the lords returned this answer: "That they approved of their desires for peace and agreement between the king and parliament, which was always desired and endeavoured by that house; and that they were then about it, and hoped for good success."—This day a letter from the earl of Stamford was read, giving an account of the securing of Bristol to the parliament; and that he was raising a considerable number of forces in those parts.

A Subscription in the H. of Lords, for Maintenance of the Parliament's Army.] Dec. 31. A new Subscription, for the further Maintenance of the Army, was warmly promoted in the house of lords. The peers underwritten subscribed their names and sums, as follows: earl of Warwick 500*l.* earl of Manchester 300*l.* earl of Bolingbroke 200*l.* lord visc. Say and Sele 100*l.* lord Brooke 200*l.* lord Fielding 500*l.*—It was ordered, also, That the Speaker should move, on the first of Jan. next, to know the Answer of those lords who have not subscribed to the Maintenance of the Army, as well as the assistants also attending this house.—That the parliament was driven to great straits for want of money at this time, is also evident from a message sent to the house of commons, this day, importing, That there was a great necessity for money, and that the city of London was willing to make a further Subscription, if the members of parliament would set a good example in that particular. That divers lords had already subscribed to this purpose, and the Speaker was ordered to know the Answers of those who have not; and others were appointed to take the Subscriptions of the assistants this afternoon; therefore the commons were desired to take the same course with their members, that it may be recommended, with all expedition, to the city of London to do the like.—Thus ended the calendar year 1642.

The king at this time kept his court at Oxford, his army being quartered conveniently in the neighbouring towns, this season not being proper for action. Hither great numbers of both houses of parliament had resorted to him, insomuch that, in a short time, they constituted a kind of separate house of lords and commons of themselves; as will be seen hereafter.

Letter from Lord Fairfax concerning the Proceedings of the two Armies in Yorkshire. Jan. 4. The commons sent up a message to the lords, and with it a Letter they had just received from their general, the lord Fairfax, in the North. It was addressed to one of their members, as follows:

“ I address this Relation to you, not doubting but it shall be imparted to both houses of parliament and to the committee for the safety of the kingdom; that the affairs of this country being known to them all, they may be provided for as their wisdoms shall see convenient. I have, formerly, advertised that the earl of Newcastle's army have seized upon Leeds, where they plundered the well-affected party, and raised a very great sum of money out of those that they could draw to compound for their securities. From Leeds they marched, on Sunday the 18th of this month, with 5 troops of horse, 6 companies of dragoons, 200 foot, and two drakes of the earl of Newcastle's army; besides sir Wm. Saville, and divers other gentlemen of Yorkshire and their forces, that joined themselves with them. They came to Bradford about 10 in the morning, intending to surprize the town in time of prayer; but the town having scouts abroad, had notice of their coming, and gave the alarm to the country, who came in to their succour from the parts adjoining; yet they had not in all above 80 muskets, the rest being armed with clubs, and such rustick weapons, with which small force they put the cause to trial with the great strength of the enemy; who planted their drakes, and discharged each of them 17 times upon the town, until a town's man, with a fowling-piece, killed one of the cannoneers; and then they all, with great courage, issued from the town upon the enemy, killed many of them, took about 30 prisoners, and forced the rest to retreat; leaving 40 of their muskets and a barrel of their powder, with much other provisions, behind them; and this with the loss of but 3 Bradford men.—In this victory the hand and power of God was most evident, the town being open on all sides, and of itself not being defensible; assaulted on every side by a malicious and bloody enemy, and defended by a few half-naked men; there being in the town not above 80 muskets before they got 40 more by the spoils of the enemy; so that the slaughter was, for the most part, with clubs, and scythes mounted on poles, when they closed and came to hand-blows. With this defeat the enemies are so enraged, that they threaten utter ruin to Bradford; whereupon the town's men sent to me for succour of men and arms, and I have sent my son, with sir Henry Foulis, to them with three troops of horse and 120 dragoons. These are safely arrived there, and received with great joy and acclamation of the country who flock to him, and offer themselves most willingly to serve against the Popish enemies, if arms could be furnished to them. He hath already surprized some victuals sent in, upon warrants, to the enemy at Leeds, by the over-awed country; and he hath sent capt. Mildmay with his troop of horse and some dragoons into Craven, to stop the raising of money and forces in that country; which is attempted by the earl of Cumberland, who is lately retired from York to Skipton.—The earl of Newcastle proceeds in raising money, by all the illegal and oppressive ways that can be devised; and, both by the Commission of Array, and by Presses made in the churches, raiseth all the men he can. This being attempted in Cleveland by certain of the disaffected gentry, their expectation was prevented; the resort and appearance of the people stopped, and the commissioners themselves forced to fly, by sir Hugh Cholmley, to whom I sent special order for that end. I hear he hath also been at Malton, and there surprized both the receiver and the monies raised out of the country thereabouts, by those warrants. I cannot hear, certainly, what monies or men the earl of Newcastle hath raised since he came into this country; but he grants commissions to sundry convict recusants to raise troops of horse: and I hear daily complaints of horrible plunders and spoils done by that army, and those by special order, and in such manner, as, if they be not speedily restrained, and this Popish army expelled the country, they will not only utterly ruin all trade and commerce, but discourage and disable all husbandry; and so bring poverty and famine upon the land.—I have formerly represented to the committee the extreme want of money here, and how impossible it is to raise any, the enemy being master of the field. I have sent to sir J. Hotham, sir Edw. Rhodes, sir Hugh Cholmley, and capt. Hotham; but they all alledge great necessities of their own, and help me with none; so that I am put upon such straits, as seldom happen, to retain an army together, and withal serve against a more potent enemy; having neither money to pay them, nor free quarters to give them. If a speedy supply of money do not come, I much fear the soldiers will steal away and desert the service.—I have just now received your letters, signifying that the house hath designed us 10,000*l.* to be presently sent, and will take further care for all necessities to be supplied; for this, I beseech you, return my humble thanks, and assure them that there shall want no care nor fidelity in me to advance the service, so highly concerning the laws and religion of the land. Your affectionate friend and servant, FERD. FAIRFAX. Selby, Dec. 29, 1642.”

After the reading of this Letter, an Order was made to send to the lord Fairfax a supply, and to trust to his known justice and faithful service for the due management of it.

Remarkable Divisions on the Propositions for Peace. Jan. 10. A circumstance occurred in the house of commons, which though trivial in itself, it may not be improper to notice. In one of the debates relating to the Propositions for Peace, the house divided on the question; when the tellers came to make their report of the numbers, they could not agree upon it, three being of one opinion, and the fourth of another. The house then divided again, and all who were not present at the first telling were required to withdraw. The tellers reported the numbers to be 33 on each side: but one member present at the first division and telling, yet came not in upon the second telling, till the numbers were given in and reported by Mr. Speaker, was desired to be counted; a debate arose whether he should or not, coming not in till the report was made: the house divided again on this question; but, before it was told, the Noes yielded, and that member, being added to the Yeas, made their number 34.

Relation of the Manner of presenting a Petition from the City of London to the King at Oxford.] Jan. 12. A Relation was read in the house of lords, sent up by the commons, concerning the carrying and delivery of a Petition from the city of London, to the king at Oxford. This Relation was made by the city's commissioners appointed for that purpose; and, since the consequences of it are somewhat curious, it is worthy of insertion. The Petition is not entered in the Journals, being a work of common council only; but we have met with a printed copy of it, and the king's Answer to it, with some speeches made by a committee of both houses, sent to attend the reading of them in the Guildhall, which we shall give; and first, the Relation stands thus in the Journals:

"At this Common Council sir George Garret, sir George Clark, knights and aldermen, Mr. Peter Jones, Mr. Geo. Henley, Mr. Rd. Bateman, and Mr. Barney Reames, committees lately appointed by this court to make their Address unto his majesty, with an humble Petition, in the name of the mayor, aldermen, and commons of this city, did make their Relation in writing, which followeth in these words:—On Monday the 2nd of Jan. we came to Oxford, between one and two o'clock in the afternoon; where, though we could get no lodgings before night, yet presently we dispatched one to give the lord Falkland notice of our coming. About 3 o'clock we did all of us attend his lordship, at his lodgings in New College; with whom we sent one also to the court, to receive his majesty's order for admission into his presence; who returning unto us, and bringing us word, that his majesty would receive the Petition at 5 o'clock, we accordingly all of us came to the court. After some small time of attendance we were admitted unto his majesty in his withdrawing-chamber, and the Petition publicly read in his majesty's presence; unto which his majesty presently made Answer unto this effect, 'That he was glad of the occasion this Petition would give him, to let the city know some of his Declarations;

'which, although he had already caused them to be put in print, yet he doubted might be kept from the knowledge of his people in the city: that he doubted the petitioners promised more than they could perform, to wit, To defend his majesty from tumults; when, as he heard, they could not maintain peace and quiet among themselves; that his Answer should be full, which he would expect should be published and made known to all his people in the city.' And he added this Question, 'Whether they had petitioned the parliament also, to remember them of their duty to his majesty?' To this it was presently answered, That we were only messengers of this Petition, and could give no answer to that question. On Tuesday we had no audience, and only attended our Answer; but on Wednesday, we addressed ourselves for our dispatch, by a message unto the lord Falkland, and received his majesty's order to attend at 3 o'clock that afternoon, which we did accordingly; and, being called in, his majesty gave us a Paper, which, he said, was his Answer to the Petition; and so delivered it into the hands of a gentleman called Mr. Heron standing by him; who, he said, should go with us, and see it done accordingly. And having demanded which was the greater assembly, a Common Council or a Common Hall; and it being answered, That a Common Hall was the greater assembly, his majesty twice expressly commanded us that this his Answer should be published at a Common Hall; that there might be fair play and above-board, and that the people of the city might be disabused, and know the truth.—This done his majesty dismissed us, as we thought; but presently we were recalled, and his majesty said, 'He would send some persons to be amongst us in the city, to inform the city and him of the truth; whom he would expect they should protect, seeing they did protect persons ill-affected to his majesty; and that he should see by that, how they were able to protect his majesty.' This Relation we make according to our best remembrance."

The foregoing Narrative being read, it was declared, That the house of commons held it very necessary, if their lordships shall so please, that some committees of both houses be present at the Common Hall, to hear what shall be read from his majesty by Mr. Heron: and if it should prove to be the same that is printed, which contains matters very scandalous to the parliament, dangerous to the city and whole kingdom, seeming purposely designed to stir up mutiny in the city, that then they might be ready to take off the aspersions laid upon the proceedings of both houses; and to shew their confidence in the loyalty, wisdom, and good affection of the city, that they will not be misled nor distempered by any such scandals and aspersions: and if it prove not the same, but do contain any other aspersions, they might likewise clear the honour and justice of their proceedings as they shall see cause; and the house of commons desires their lordships to join with them in this also, that whatsoever the message did appear to be, they should yet clear the two houses of parliament, notwithstanding all the taxes laid upon them by that book; having done nothing but agreeable to their duty to the king and kingdom; and that the loyalty and modesty of the city, expressed in their Petition to his majesty, were to be commended.

The said Petition read at the Guildhall.
Jan. 13. This day the whole affair was transacted at the Guildhall, and a particular account taken of it, and printed by order of the house of commons, with an Introduction and Remarks upon it, as follows:*

The INTRODUCTION.

"That observation, 'Man's extremities are God's opportunities,' was never more abundantly and experimentally made good than in these latter days; and in none of these more than on Friday the 13th of Jan. 1642, in and toward the city of London, where his majesty's unexpected Answer to an humble Petition, presented to his majesty at Oxford, from the lord mayor and common-council of that honourable city, made many sad hearts; not only in regard that all the unwearied and loyal endeavours of parliament and city, with other parts of the kingdom, have made no deeper impression upon his majesty's heart, the greatest treasure for which they have contended; but also in some doubtful expectation what advantage such spirits might have made of it, at least to the unsettling of the peace, and disuniting the spirits of the city, who steer all their actions by that maxim of policy, 'Divide et impera,' divide and do what you will: the rather when they observed that the counsel of some not so well-wishers, certainly, to the public safety, as to their own private interests, had prevailed with his majesty that his answer should be published at a Common Hall, by his majesty's express order for that purpose, when as the Petition was humbly tendered to his majesty from a common council. To avoid all inconveniences, it pleased the wisdom and goodness of Heaven to direct the parliament to chuse an honourable committee of lords and commons to be present at the reading thereof; and the governors of the city to order that all the companies should first meet at their several halls, and then come in their City Habits to the Guildhall, where his majesty's Answer was to be read: when the committee of both houses, with the lord mayor, aldermen, and such a confluence of liverymen as hath not been seen there in the memory of the oldest man in the city, being met, the lord mayor commanded the town clerk to read, in the audience of that great assembly, the City's Petition which here follows:

* Published, with the licence of Mr. Elsynge, clerk of the house of commons, by Peter Cole, the printer of the other speeches at the Guildhall, which are already given in this work.

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty: The Humble PETITION of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London,

"Sheweth; That the petitioners, your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, being much pierced with the long and great divisions between your majesty and both your houses of parliament, and with the sad and bloody effects thereof, both here and in Ireland, are yet more deeply wounded by the misapprehension which your maj. seemeth to entertain of the love and loyalty of this your city, as if there were some cause of fear or suspicion of danger to your royal person, if your maj. should return hither; and that this is made the unhappy bar to that blessed reconciliation with your great and most faithful council, for preventing that desolation and destruction, which is now most apparently imminent on your majesty and all your kingdoms:—For satisfaction therefore of your majesty, and clearing of the petitioners' innocence, they most humbly declare, as formerly they have done, That they are in no way conscious of any disloyalty, but abhor all thoughts thereof: and that they are resolved to make good their late solemn Protestation and sacred vow made to Almighty God, and, with the last drop of their dearest bloods, to defend and maintain the true Reformed Protestant Religion; and, according to the duty of their allegiance, your majesty's royal person, honour, and estate; (whatever is maliciously and most falsely suggested to your maj. to the contrary) as well as the power and privileges of parliament, and the lawful rights and liberties of the subject; and do hereby engage themselves, their estates, and all they have, to their uttermost power, to defend and preserve your maj. and both houses of parliament from all tumults, affronts, and violence, with as much loyalty, love, and duty, as ever citizens expressed towards your majesty, or any of your royal progenitors in their greatest glory. The petitioners therefore, upon their bended knees, do most humbly beseech your maj. to return to your parliament, accompanied with your royal, not your martial, attendance; to the end that religion, laws, and liberties may be settled and secured; and whatsoever is amiss in church and commonwealth reformed by their advice, according to the fundamental constitutions of this kingdom; and that such a peace may thereby be obtained, as shall be for the glory of God, the honour and happiness of your maj. and posterity, and the safety and welfare of all your loyal subjects; who (the petitioners are fully assured, whatsoever is given out to the contrary) do unanimously desire the peace herein expressed. And the petitioners shall ever pray, &c. MICHELL."

The King's Answer to it.] This being done, the king's messenger (Mr. Heron) being wished to read his majesty's Answer to that Petition, made some apology to be excused; partly willing to intimate that his commission was but to deliver the Answer to the lord mayor, (which seemed very strange to standers by, who were ready to conclude, that if his majesty's command had been of no larger extent, the trouble of a common-hall might well have been spared) and partly pleading the inaudibleness of his voice in such a vast assembly; but being deemed the fittest for that service by the honourable committee, the lord mayor and his brethren, he then read his majesty's Answer, which here follows:

"His majesty hath graciously considered this Petition, and returns this Answer: That his maj. doth not entertain any misapprehension of the love and loyalty of his city of London. As he hath always expressed a singular regard and esteem of the affections of that city, and is still desirous to make it his chief place of residence, and to continue and renew many marks of his favour towards it; so he believes much the better and greater part of that his city is full of love, duty, and loyalty to his majesty; and that the tumults which heretofore forced his majesty, for his safety, to leave that place, though they were contrived and encouraged by some principal members thereof, (who are since well known, though they are above the reach of justice) consisted more of desperate persons of the suburbs, and the neighbouring towns, who were misled by the cunning and malice of their seducers, than of the inhabitants of that city. He looks on his good subjects there as persons groaning under the same burden which doth oppress his majesty, and awed by the same persons who begat these tumults, and the same army which gave battle to his majesty: and therefore as no good subject can more desire, from his soul, a composure of the general distractions; so no good citizen can more desire the establishment of the particular peace and prosperity of that place by his majesty's access thither, than his majesty himself doth.—But his maj. desires his good subjects of London seriously to consider what confidence his maj. can have of security there, whilst the laws of the land are so notoriously despised and trampled under foot; and the wholesome government of that city, heretofore so famous over all the world, is now submitted to the arbitrary power of a few desperate persons of no reputation, but for malice and disloyalty to him: whilst arms are taken up not only without, but against, his consent and express command; and collections publicly made, and contributions avowed, for the maintenance of the army which hath given him battle, and therein used all possible means, treason and malice could suggest to them, to have taken his life from him, and to have destroyed his royal issue; whilst such of his majesty's subjects, who, out of duty and affection to his majesty, and compassion of their bleeding country, have laboured for peace, are reviled, injured, and murdered, even by the magistrates of that city, or by their directions.—Lastly, 'What hope his maj. can have of safety there, whilst alderman Pennington, their pretended lord mayor, (the principal author of those calamities which so nearly threaten the ruin of that famous city) Ven, Foulke, and Mainwaring, all persons notoriously guilty of schism and high treason, commit such outrages in oppressing, robbing, and imprisoning, according to their discretion, all such his majesty's loving subjects whom they are pleased to suspect but for wishing well to his majesty: and his majesty would know whether the petitioners believe that the reviling and suppressing the Book of Common Prayer, (established in this Church ever since the Reformation) the discountenancing and imprisoning godly, learned, and painful preachers; and the cherishing and countenancing of Brownists, Anabaptists, and all manner of Sectaries, be the way to defend and maintain the true Reformed Protestant religion? That to comply with, and assist persons who have actually attempted to kill his majesty? and to allow and favour libels, pasquils, and seditious sermons against his majesty, be to defend his royal person and honour according to the duty of their allegiance? Whether to imprison men's persons, and to plunder their houses, because they will not rebel against his majesty, nor assist those that do? Whether to destroy their property, by taking away the 20th part of their estates from them; and, by the same arbitrary power, to refer to four standers by of their own faction, to judge what that 20th part is, be to defend the lawful rights and liberties of the subject? And if they think these actions to be instances of either, whether they do not know the persons before named to be guilty of them all? Or whether they think it possible that Almighty God can bless that city, and preserve it from destruction, whilst persons of such known guilt and wickedness are defended and justified amongst them, against the power of that law by which they can only subsist?—His maj. is so far from suffering himself to be incensed against the whole city, by the actions of these ill men, though they have hitherto been so prevalent as to make the affections of the rest of little use to him; and is so willing to be with them and to protect them, that the trade, wealth, and glory thereof (so decayed and eclipsed by these public distractions) may again be the envy of all foreign nations; that he doth, once more, graciously offer his free and general pardon to all the inhabitants of that his city of London, the suburbs, and city of Westminster, (except the persons formerly excepted by his majesty) if they shall yet return to their duty, loyalty, and obedience. And if his good subjects of that his city of London shall first solemnly declare, That they will defend the known laws of the land, and will submit to, and be governed by, no other rule: if they shall first manifest, by defending themselves, and maintaining their own rights, liberties, and interests, and suppressing any force and violence unlawfully raised against those and his majesty, their power to defend and preserve him from all tumults, affronts, and violence: Lastly, if they shall apprehend, and commit to safe custody, the persons of those four men who enrich themselves by the spoil and oppression of his loving subjects, and the ruin of the city, that his majesty may proceed against them by the course of law, as guilty of high treason, his maj. will speedily return to them with his royal, and without his martial, attendance; and will use his utmost endeavour that they may, hereafter, enjoy all the blessings of peace and plenty; and will no longer expect obedience from them, than he shall, with all the faculties of his soul, labour in the preserving and advancing the true reformed protestant religion, the laws of the land, the liberty and property of the subject, and the just privileges of parliament.—If, notwithstanding all this, the art and interest of these men can prevail so far, that they involve more men in their guilt, and draw that his city to sacrifice its present happiness and future hopes to their pride, fury, and malice; his majesty shall only give them this warning, That whosoever shall, henceforward, take up arms without his consent; contribute any money or plate, upon what pretence of authority soever, for maintenance of the army under the command of the earl of Essex, or any other army in rebellion against him; or shall pay tonnage and poundage, till the same shall be settled by act of parliament; every such person must expect the severest punishment the law can inflict; and, in the mean time, his maj. will seize upon any part of his estate within his power, for the relief and support of him and his army, raised and maintained for the defence of his person, the laws, and this his kingdom: and since he denies to his maj. the duty and benefit of his subjection, by giving assistance to rebels, which, by the known laws of the land, is high treason, his maj. shall likewise deny him the benefit of his protection; and shall not only signify to all his foreign ministers, that such person shall receive no advantage by being his subject, but shall, by all other ways and means, proceed against him as a public enemy to his maj. and this kingdom.—But his maj. hopes and doubts not but his good subjects of London will call to mind the acts of their predecessors, their duty, affection, loyalty, and merit towards their princes; the renown they have had with all posterity from, and the blessings of Heaven which always accompanied, those virtues; and will consider the perpetual scorn and infamy, which unavoidably will follow them and their children, if infinitely the meaner part in quality, and much the lesser part in number, shall be able to alter the government so admirably established, destroy the trade so excellently settled, and to waste the wealth, so industriously gotten, of that flourishing city; and then they will easily gather up the courage and resolution to join with his maj. in defence of their religion, laws and liberties, which hitherto hath and only can make themselves, his maj. and his kingdom happy.—For concurring with the advice of his two houses of parliament, which, with reference to the commonwealth, may be as well at this distance, as at Whitehall; his maj. doubts not but his good subjects of London well know how far, (beyond the example of his predecessors) his maj. hath concurred with their advice in passing of such laws, by which he willingly hath parted with many of his known rights, for the benefit of his subjects, which the fundamental constitutions of this kingdom did not oblige him to consent to; and hath used all possible means to beget a right understanding between them; and will therefore apply themselves to those who, by making just, peaceable, and honourable propositions to his majesty, can only beget that concurrence.”

Speeches of the E. of Manchester and Mr. Pym to the Citizens, on this Occasion.] After the King's Messenger had read this once upon the hustings, in the audience of those honourable persons, he was, for the help of the lowness of his voice, and the advantage of the great multitudes in the hall, willed to read the same a second time in the clock-house, in the audience of the body of that assembly: among whom, after he had finished his work, an inconsiderable company near the door made some offers towards an acclamation; but finding no expected echo to answer their shout, they wound up in a little modesty and a great deal of silence; upon which,

The Earl of Manchester delivered his speech as followeth:—“ My lord mayor, and you gentlemen of the city of London; This assembly can never be looked upon by any members of both houses of parliament, but there must be some offering of gratitude made to you; of thanks and acknowledgments for your former large-hearted expressions of affection and care for the preservation both of the parliament and kingdom: the occasion why my lords and these gentlemen of the house of commons are come hither is this, They have read an Answer to an humble Petition of the lord mayor and common council and citizens of London to his majesty; in which they find many wounding aspersions cast upon persons of very eminent authority in your city, and upon others of very great fidelity and trust among you: This Answer they do find, as it is printed, to agree with that which the gentleman from his majesty hath here read; and they owning themselves equally interested (in all things that concern you) with you, have commanded this gentleman to make some Observations by way of vindication, both of the proceedings of both houses of parliament, and of the proceedings of the city; with this assurance, that they will never desert you, but will stand by you with their lives and fortunes, for the preservation of the city in general, and those persons in particular, who have been faithful, and deserved well, both of the parliament and kingdom; and they will pursue all means, both with their lives and fortunes, that may be for the preservation of this city, and for the procuring of safety, happiness, and peace to the whole kingdom."

The Speech of this noble lord being entertained with loud expressions of joy and thankfulness by the commons; and, after some time, silence being made,

Mr. Pym gave the sense of both houses upon the several passages in his majesty's Answer, in the following speech:

"My lord mayor, and you worthy citizens of this noble and famous city of London; I am commanded by the lords and commons to let you know, that in this Answer, which hath been published to you, they do observe many things of great aspersion upon the proceedings of parliament, very scandalous and injurious to many particular members of this city; whereupon they think that it becomes them, both in tenderness of their own honour, and respect to you, to take away all those aspersions; and to let you know the truth of their proceedings, which have been full of honour and justice, as they stand in relation to their own duty; and full of humility and obedience towards his majesty, and of care for the common good, and so shall ever be: and they have commanded me to let you know the true Answer to most of those things that are imputed either to the parliament, or to the city, by observing some particulars of this book which hath been read to you; and to let you know the proceedings in their own native condition, clear from those misrepresentations which make them appear in a quality much different from the truth: which before I enter into, I am to declare, as the sense of both houses, that your Petition was so full of loyalty, humility, and obedience, that you might well have expected an Answer of another kind.—The first Observation I am to make to you is this, that it is said here, 'That his majesty was enforced, by tumults, to leave the parliament, and to go from Whitehall, and to withdraw himself into those courses which now he hath taken.' In Answer hereunto, I am commanded to tell you, That there was no occasion given by any tumults rising out of this city, or the suburbs, which might justly cause his majesty's departure; and you may very well remember, that after his violent coming to the commons house of parliament in that unusual and unheard-of manner (which was the beginning of these unhappy differences) that the very next day his majesty came into the city without any guard; that he was present in the common council, dined at the sheriffs, and returned back again, with manifold evidences of fidelity on the part of the city, and without any such expressions as were unbecoming the majesty of a king, or the duty of subjects; that he resided divers days at Whitehall, and afterward at Hampton-Court, Windsor, and places adjoining, with small forces about him, and yet never any attempt made which might give him any apprehensions of fear; by all which it is manifest, that this is an unjust aspersion cast upon this city, that any tumultuous carriage of yours was the occasion of his majesty's leaving the parliament, and withdrawing himself to remoter parts.—It is affirmed, 'That the government of your city hath been managed by a few desperate persons, and that they do exercise an arbitrary power.' In answer to which, the two houses of parliament give you this testimony, That you have, in most of the great occasions concerning the government of the city, followed their direction; and that direction, which they have given, and you have executed, they must and will maintain to be such as stands with their honour in giving it, and your trust and fidelity in the performance of it.—It is objected in the third place, 'That Contributions have been publickly made, for the maintenance of that army which did join battle with the king, and did, by all the means that treason and malice could suggest, endeavour to take away his life, and destroy his issue.' To this I am commanded to say, That the design of bringing up the English armies, the gathering together of the cavaliers about Whitehall, the violent coming to the house of commons, the king's going into the North and raising armies there, are clear evidences that violence was first intended, and divers practices were made against the parliament, before they took any course, or made any preparation to take up arms for their defence; for the danger of his majesty's person they were sorry for it, and did, by divers humble Petitions, labour to prevent it; and as touching the royal issue, they have sufficiently declared to the world, their good affections towards them, by the care they have taken both for the safety and maintenance of those who are left here.—It is further expressed in this Answer, 'That the king demands the lord mayor, Mr. Alderman Fowke, cols. Ven and Manwaring to be delivered up as guilty of schism and high treason.' Concerning which I am commanded to tell you, as the sense of both houses of parliament, That this demand is against the privilege of parliament, two of them being members of the commons house; most dishonourable to the city, that the lord mayor of London should be subjected to the violence of every base fellow, be assaulted, seized on, without due process or warrant, which the law doth afford every private man; and that you should be commanded to deliver up your chief magistrate, and such eminent members of the city to the king's pleasure, only because they have done their duty in adhering to the parliament, for the defence of the kingdom; and that it is against the rules of justice, that any men should be imprisoned upon such a general charge, when no particulars are proved against them; and this you are to take notice of, as the Answer to those scandals, and to that disgrace upon my lord mayor, and the other members of the city.—And I am further to tell you, That there is little cause for his maj. to make this demand, considering that he himself doth, by force, keep away many accused in parliament; as my lord Digby, and many more impeached of high treason, besides divers other great delinquents, that stand charged there for heinous crimes; all which, by force, are kept from due proceedings and legal trial of parliament.—It is alleged in this answer, 'That my lord mayor, and those other persons named, are countenancers of Brownists and Anabaptists, and all manner of Sectaries.' To this I am commanded to say, that hereof there is no proof: it doth not appear that they give any such countenance to Sectaries of any kind whatsoever; and if it did, his majesty hath little reason to object it, while, notwithstanding the profession he hath often made, 'That he will maintain the Protestant reformed religion,' he doth in the mean time raise an army of Papists; who, by the principles of their religion, are bound, if power be put into their hands, to destroy and utterly to root out the Protestants, together with the truth which they profess.—It is affirmed, 'That men's persons have been imprisoned, and their houses plundered, because they will not rebel against his majesty.' To this I am commanded to declare, That no men's houses have been plundered by any direction of the parliament, but that they have been very careful to restrain all such violent courses, so far as they were able; and that they have never committed any man, but such as, by due information, they conceived to be seditious persons, and like to trouble the peace of the state.—It is objected further, 'That the property of the subject is destroyed, by taking away the 20th part by an arbitrary power.' To this they say, That in that Ordinance it doth not require a 20th part, but doth limit the assessors that they shall not go beyond a twentieth part; and that this is done by a power derived from both houses of parliament; the lords, who have an hereditary interest in making laws in this kingdom; and the commons, who are elected and chosen to represent the whole body of the commonalty, and trusted for the good of the people, whenever they see cause to charge the kingdom. And they say further, That the same law, that did enable the two houses of parliament to raise forces to maintain and defend the safety of religion, and of the kingdom, doth likewise enable them to require contributions, whereby those forces may be maintained; or else it were a vain power to raise forces, if they had not a power likewise to maintain them in that service for which they were raised.—And to this point I am commanded to add this further Answer, That there was little reason for this to be objected on his majesty's behalf, when it is well known that, from the subjects which are within the power of his army, his majesty doth take the full yearly value of their lands, and in some cases more; that not only particular houses, but whole towns, have been plundered by command and design; and that, by Proclamations, men are declared to forfeit all their estates, because they will not obey arbitrary commands; and this is commonly practised by his majesty, and on his part: and, therefore, there was little reason to charge the parliament with so necessary and moderate a contribution as the twentieth part.—It is declared, 'That the king expects to be kept from tumults and affronts.' Upon which I am commanded to observe, That his majesty's expressions, in his Answer, tend to the making of a division in this city, and to the raising of a party which may make some disturbances in that orderly government which is now established; both which will certainly prove, equally destructive to him and both houses of parliament; and more prejudicial to his quiet abode here, than any thing that hath ever been acted by the houses of parliament, or the present governors of the city.—They observe further, that in this Answer, 'His majesty doth profess that he will seize upon the estates of all that shall contribute any thing towards the maintenance of the parliament's army, and will put them out of his protection; and, by his ministers in foreign states, will take such course that they may be proceeded against as enemies;' that is, destroyed and spoiled. To which the lords and commons do declare, That this is an excess of rigour and injustice beyond all example, that particular men should lose their private estates here without law or judicial proceeding; and that our prince, who owes protection to the kingdom as well as to particular persons, should suffer the wealth thereof to be robbed and spoiled by foreign states: upon due consideration whereof, they hope his majesty will be induced by better counsel to forbear the execution, than that by which he hath been persuaded to publish such a resolution.—Besides these Observations out of the Answer, I am to observe one out of a Narrative that was received from the Common-Council, that the king did declare, 'That he would send some messengers here to observe your carriage in the city, and what was done amongst you.' The parliament have just cause to doubt, that these will be messengers of sedition and trouble; and therefore desire you to observe them and find them out, and that they may know who they are.—I am, for a conclusion, to commend to your considerations, that you see, by the proceedings to which the king is drawn by the ill counsel now about him, that religion, the whole kingdom, this glorious city, and the parliament, are all in great danger; that this danger cannot be kept off, in all likelihood, but by the army that is now on foot; and that the lords and commons are so far from being frightened by any thing that is in this Answer, that they have, for themselves and the members of both houses, declared a further contribution towards the maintenance of this army; and cannot but hope and desire, that you that have shewed so much good affection, in the former necessities of the state, will be sensible of your own, and of the condition of the whole kingdom; and add to that which you have already done some further contribution, whereby this army may be maintained for all your safeties." [At the end of every period of this speech, the applause was so great, that he was fain to rest till silence was again made; and, at last, (the company ready to be dissolved) after some pause and consultation with the committee of lords and commons then present, and by their direction, silence being made, he closed all with the words following:] "Worthy citizens, you have understood the sense of both houses of parliament, concerning my lord mayor here, and those worthy members of your city, that are demanded; you have heard the parliament declare, That they will protect them in that which they have done by direction of both houses; and they expect that you should express it yourselves likewise, that if any violence be offered to them, you will secure and defend them with your uttermost force; and you shall always find, that this protection of the parliament shall not only extend to these, but to all others that have done any thing by their command."

"Which words were no sooner uttered, but the citizens, with one joint harmony of minds and voices, gave such an acclamation as would have drowned all the former, if they had been then breathing; which, after a long continuance, resolved itself into this more articulate and distinct voice, 'We will live and die with them, We will live and die with them,' and the like.—So that in the managing of this day's work, God was so pleased to manifest himself, that the well affected went away not strengthened only, but rejoicing; and the Malignants (as they have been called) some convinced, others silenced, many ashamed, it fully appearing how little power they had to answer their desires of doing mischief: whilst, instead of dividing the city, they were exceedingly united; instead of a dissipation, thousands were unexpectedly brought, as it were, into an unthought of association, to live and die in the defence of these zealous and honourable assertors of their peace and liberties: all which we may sum up in that triumph of the Man of God, In the thing wherein they dealt proudly, God was above them."

The King's Letter to the Sheriffs of London, requiring them to publish his foregoing Answer. [The ill reception the king's Answer to the City of London's Petition met with at the common-hall, occasioned his majesty to send, a few days after, the following Letter and Declaration to the Sheriffs;

"Trusty and well beloved, we greet you well; We received a Petition lately from the aldermen and common council of our City of London, by the hands of persons entrusted by them for the delivery, who found such a reception from us as well manifested our regard to that body which sent them: though we well knew by whom that Petition was framed, and where perused and examined before it was approved by those from whom it seemed to be sent, yet we were so willing to enter into a correspondence with that our city, and to receive any address and application from them, according to that invitation we had given by our late Proclamation; and were so glad to find that there was yet some hopes they would look to the peace and happiness of that city, and at last sever themselves from any faction or dependence, which might insensibly involve them in those calamities they did not foresee; that we returned such a gracious Answer thereunto, so full of candour and affection that the meanest inhabitant of that our city, if he carefully consider the same, will find himself concerned in it, and that we have had an especial care of his particular.—With this Answer of ours we sent a servant of our own, in the company of those who had been so well used here, to require and see that it might be communicated to the whole body of that our city; not doubting but that both it, and the bringer, should receive such entertainment there, as might manifest their due regard of us, and of our affection to them: but, to our great wonder, we find that, after ten days attendance, and suffering ridiculous pamphlets to be published in our name, as if we retracted our former resolutions, (which Pamphlet we have caused to be burned by the hand of the hangman, as we also require you to see done) instead of that admission we expected to our messenger and message, guards of armed men have been brought to keep our good subjects, to whom that our Answer was directed, from being present at the reading thereof; and Speeches have been made by strangers, (who have been admitted to the city councils, contrary to the freedom and custom of those meetings) to blast our said Answer, and to dishonour and slander us; which if our good subjects there shall suffer, we shall be much discouraged in our desired correspondence with that our city; and so, by the cunning and power of those incendiaries, mentioned in our Answer, alderman Pennington, (who to shew his great loyalty to us, and his fitness to be chief magistrate of such a city, being informed that a desperate person there said, 'That he hoped shortly to wash his hands in our blood,' refused to send any warrant, or to give any direction to any officer, for his apprehension) Ven, Fowke, and Manwaring, who have plunged that our city into such unspeakable calamities, in which they would still keep it to cure their own desperate condition, our good subjects there are not suffered to receive our gracious Answer to that Petition.—We have therefore thought fit to write these our Letters to you, requiring you the sheriffs of our said city, to take care for the publishing that our Answer (which we herewith send you) to our good subjects of that our city: and our pleasure is, that you the masters and wardens of the several companies of our said city forthwith summon all the members of your several companies, with all the freemen and apprentices (whose hopes and interests are so much blasted in these general distractions) belonging thereunto, to appear at their several halls; where you shall cause our said Answer, together with these our Letters, to be publicly read; that all our good subjects may clearly understand how far we have been from begetting, how far we are from continuing or nourishing, these unnatural civil dissensions; and how much it is in their own power to remove the present pressures, and to establish the future happiness and glory of that famous city; and may seriously weigh every part of that our Answer, as well that which carries caution in it for the future, as pardon for what is past: for assure yourselves, for the time to come, we shall proceed with all severity against such who shall incur the penalty of the law in those points, of which we have given them so fair a warning in our said Answer: and whosoever shall not behave himself like a good subject in this our kingdom, shall not, if we can help it, receive the benefit and advantage of being our subject in any other; but all foreign princes shall know, that as such person hath parted with his loyalty to us, so he must not hope for any security by us; and, to that purpose, we shall henceforward have a very inquisitive eye upon the actions of all our subjects, that some example may be made, how easy it is for us to punish their disloyalties abroad, who, for a time, may avoid our justice at home.—And to the end that none of our good subjects of that our city may think themselves bound to obey any of the orders or commands of the pretended lord mayor, whom we have and do still accuse of high treason, and conspiring to take our life from us, it is well known to those citizens, who understand the charter of that city, (so amply granted by our royal progenitors, and so graciously confirmed by us, and of which we presume our good subjects there do still desire to receive the benefit) that the said Isaac Pennington was never regularly elected, or lawfully admitted to the office of lord mayor of that our city; that in truth alderman Cordwell was, by the plurality of voices chosen; and that this man was never presented to, or admitted by us, in such manner as is prescribed by their charter; neither had that judge, who presumed to swear him, any more colour of law or authority to administer such an oath to him, than he hath to do the same to-morrow to any other alderman of the city: and we do therefore hereby declare the said Isaac Pennington not to be mayor of that our city of London, and to have no lawful authority to exercise the same; and that our good subjects of that our city, ought not to submit to any orders, directions, or commands, which shall issue from him as lord mayor of that our city; but that the same are void, and of none effect. And we do once more require you the sheriffs of our said city, and all other the magistrates of the same, in which all our good subjects of that city will assist you, that you cause the said Isaac Pennington, Ven, Fowke, and Manwaring, to be apprehended and committed to safe custody; that we may proceed against them as guilty of high treason, and as the principal authors of those calamities which are now so heavy upon our poor subjects of that city; which, if not suddenly remedied, will in a short time utterly confound a place and a people, lately of so flourishing an estimation in all the parts of Christendom.—And whereas we are informed, that one Brown, a woodmonger, Titchborne, a linendraper, and one Harvy, a silkman, have exercised great insolencies and outrages in that our city; and when many of our good subjects there have assembled together, in a peaceable and modest manner, to consult about the peace and welfare of that city, the said mutinous and seditious persons have presumed to lead multitudes of armed men against them; and, by such force, have beaten, wounded, and killed our good subjects: our will and pleasure is, That if the said Brown, Titchborne, and Harvy, or either of them, shall so far neglect our gracious offer of pardon, as still to engage themselves in those unwarrantable and seditious courses, you do raise power to suppress the said force; and that you, and all our ministers of justice, use your utmost means to apprehend the said persons, and to bring them to condign punishment: and we do hereby declare, That it shall be lawful for any of our loving subjects to resist and oppose the said persons, if they shall hereafter, in such a warlike manner, endeavour to molest them, as they would do rebels and traitors.—And we hope that all our good subjects of that our much-injured city of London do take notice of our grace and favour towards them, in our so freely passing by and pardoning the offences there committed against us, as we have offered by our Proclamation and our late Answer; and of our very earnest desire to be with them, and to reside amongst them for their comfort, support, and protection; if they shall, by first providing for their own security, in such manner as we have directed them in our late Answer, give us an instance that we may be safe there too; and that they do likewise observe, that, being by such violence kept from them, we have done our utmost endeavour to continue and advance the decayed trading of that our city, by permitting and encouraging all resort and traffick thither; and therefore if, by the stopping of carriages, and seizing commodities by other men, the commerce and correspondence be broken between that place and our good subjects of other counties, they will impute that mischief to the true authors of it, and look upon us only as not able to help them. Do but your duties, and this cloud, which threatens a present confusion, will quickly vanish away; and you will enjoy all the blessings of a happy nation, to the which no endeavour of ours shall be wanting. Given at our Court at Oxford, Jan. 17, 1642.”

The Sheriffs having acquainted both houses of their receipt of the foregoing Letter, the several companies were forbid to assemble at their halls according to his majesty's order, and the lord mayor and sheriffs were desired to take special care to prevent the same: and some masters of companies, that were chief promoters in opposing this Order of parliament, were taken into custody.

The King's Reasons for adjourning the Term to Oxford.] About this time the king having issued a Proclamation for adjourning all the courts of justice, the next term, from London and Westminster to Oxford; this was thought so prejudicial to the public, that the parliament forbade the officers belonging to the said several courts to obey this Proclamation, or the king's Letters sent to the principal persons concerned in them. However, at the same time, they thought fit to send a Petition to his majesty, offering Reasons against the said removal, and praying that the king would revoke his orders therein: to this the lords received an Answer to this effect:

"His majesty hath seriously weighed the Reasons, presented unto him by both houses, to induce him to revoke his late Proclamation for the adjourning of the Term; and returns this Answer: That the lord keeper of the great seal being, in regard of his majesty's most important affairs, necessarily to attend his majesty; his majesty hath likewise appointed his high court of Chancery to be held in the place where his maj. resides; that so his subjects may have their causes determined by the supreme judge of that court: but is well content that the masters of the chancery, that are assistants to the house of peers, shall, notwithstanding his said Proclamation, continue their attendance upon that house where they are assistants.—For his Court of Wards, upon which so essential a part of his majesty's revenue depends, it concerned him to draw the same to him; since, being at London, it will prove of no advantage or supply to his maj.'s occasions, by reason of the stops there of all money from coming to him: and therefore he shall expect the presence of the council of that court here, the time of the Term being so short that they may speedily return again to the service of the houses, who have not used to deny their members leave, for so short a time, to attend his majesty's service, to which by law they are bound; besides that his maj. doubts not but he may, for a convenient time, upon pressing and urgent occasions, especially for the discharge of another necessary duty, dispense with a peer's attendance upon the house without any breach of privilege; seeing it hath not been denied in former parliaments.—For the Danger of his majesty's subjects in their passage by reason of the several armies, his majesty doth not know that they are to pass through more armies to his city of Oxford, than they must to his city of London; or that the courts of justice cannot proceed with the same freedom and liberty where his majesty's army is, as where there is an army against him; but his maj. will take care that his good subjects shall no way suffer by his army here, which he can, by no means, undertake for the other army at London.—For the Records of the several Courts, his majesty expects and requires obedience from the officers thereof, according to his Proclamation; as no doubt his subjects will take care for the particular evidences that concern themselves; and for the safe carriage and conveyance of both, that they suffer not, in the least degree, by his majesty's army, his maj. will surely provide; neither can the prejudice be great to his subjects, the courts of equity being no further removed from the courts of law.—The Reason of his majesty's adjournment of the courts of law till Crastino Purificationis, is for the great danger his good subjects must undergo by passing through the armies: and his maj. much fears his good subjects will have little benefit by their legal proceedings, whilst his maj. and the law are no better able to defend one another.—For these Reasons, and those expressed in his Proclamation, his majesty can, by no means, revoke his said Proclamation; but it being his undoubted right to adjourn or remove the terms to what place he pleases, if he hath yet any undoubted right, his maj. expects obedience to his said Proclamation and to every part thereof."

Ordinance of Parliament, forbidding Obedience to the King's Proclamation for adjourning the Term to Oxford.] This Answer of the king's was ordered to be communicated to the commons; and, a few days after, both houses passed the following Ordinance, to justify their conduct in not suffering the adjournment of the courts to Oxford.

"The lords and commons having taken into their serious consideration a Proclamation, dated at Oxford the 27th Dec. last, for the adjourning of the court of Chancery, the court of Wards and Liveries, the duchy of Lancaster, the court of Requests, the receipt of his maj.'s Exchequer, and of the First Fruits and Tenths, from the city of Westminster unto the city of Oxford; and for adjourning the courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, unto the return Crastino Purificationis, found it to tend much to the prejudice of the commonwealth to remove the said courts and receipts to Oxford, where the body of an army, raised against the parliament and the authority thereof, now resides; and therefore, in performance of the duty and trust reposed in them by the kingdom, whom they represent, did exhibit their humble Advice and Petition to his majesty, with the Reasons inducing them thereunto, to revoke the said Proclamation; and, with all humility, desired that the said courts and receipts might be kept at their several usual places and times, and not at Oxford: but his majesty, giving still more credit to the suggestions of those wicked and malignant persons that yet encompass him, than to his highest and most faithful council, returned his negative Answer, and expressly denied to repeal this Proclamation:—Now, the lords and commons clearly discovering the great inconveniences and mischiefs that necessarily must happen to his majesty's most faithful and best affected subjects, in case those courts and receipts be removed to Oxford; where such of them as have occasion to attend, cannot, with any safety to their persons and estates, repair; his maj. having, in effect, declared all persons that have contributed any thing in aid or defence of the parliament, and the privileges thereof, to be guilty of high treason; and, in pursuance thereof, by the force and power of the army there remaining, have seized upon many of their persons, where they are detained prisoners, and some proceeded against as traitors; having nothing laid to their charge but their assisting the parliament, and opposing that army raised to destroy it and the kingdom: and finding that divers, both judges and others, whose attendance upon the said courts and receipts will be necessary, consist of persons that are members and assistants to both houses of parliament, whose presence at this time cannot be spared; and that if the Records, necessary to be used in the said courts, should be removed from the usual places towards Oxford, in a time when two armies are residing near thereabouts, it would endanger the miscarriage of them; which might ruin many of his maj.'s subjects, whose estates depend thereupon: and that so long a distance between the said courts of law and equity, which have necessary dependance one upon another, would prove exceeding prejudicial to many, thought it their duty, in discharge of the trust reposed in them by the commonwealth, as much as in them lieth to prevent the said inconveniences: and therefore do hereby declare and order, That no judge, minister, or other person belonging to any of the said courts or receipts, shall repair to the said city of Oxford; or do or execute any thing belonging to the said offices and employments, but in places usual for the doing and executing thereof: and that no member of, or assistant to, any of the two houses of parliament, that have any place, office or employment, about any of the said courts or receipts, shall presume to depart from their attendance on parliament, without the special leave of that house whereof they are members or assistants: and that no person shall remove, or cause to be removed, any records or writings of any of the said courts or receipts to or towards the city of Oxford: and the lords and commons do declare, That if any person shall disobey this Order, they will proceed against them as wilful contemners of the authority of parliament, and disturbers of the peace of the kingdom.—And it is further declared and ordered by the said lords and commons, That no judgment, decree, order and proceedings whatsoever, that shall be given, made, or had, by or in any of the said courts or receipts, out of the usual places where the said courts and receipts have been accustomed to be held and kept, shall bind any person that shall or may be concerned therein, without his own voluntary consent: and that the said lords and commons will, by the authority of both houses, protect and keep indemnified all judges, officers, and other persons from any damage or inconvenience, that may or can happen to them for yielding obedience to this Ordinance."

The Parliament's Propositions for Peace, presented to the King at Oxford.] Feb. 1. The following Propositions were presented to the King at Oxford, by the parliament's commissioners appointed for that purpose. Their titles and names were, the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Sarum, and Holland; the commons, the lords Wenman and Dunbar, sir John Holland, sir Wm. Litton, the hon. William Pierpoint, Bulstrode Whitlocke, Edm. Waller, and Rd. Winwood, esqrs.

The HUMBLE DESIRES and PROPOSITIONS of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled, tendered unto his majesty, Feb. 1, 1642.

"We your majesty's most humble and faithful subjects, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, having in our thoughts the glory of God, your majesty's honour, and the prosperity of your people; and being most grievously afflicted with the pressing miseries and calamities which have overwhelmed your two kingdoms of England and Ireland, since your majesty hath, by the persuasion of evil counsellors, withdrawn yourself from the parliament, raised an army against it, and, by force thereof, protected delinquents from the justice of it; constraining us to take arms for the defence of our religion, laws, liberties, privileges of parliament, and for the sitting of the parliament in safety; which fears and dangers are continued and increased by the raising drawing together, and arming of great numbers of papists under the command of the earl of Newcastle; likewise by making the lord Herbert of Ragland, and other known papists, commanders of great forces; whereby many grievous oppressions, rapines, and cruelties have been, and are daily exercised upon the persons and estates of your people; much innocent blood hath been spilt, and the papists have attained means of attempting, with hopes of effecting, their mischievous design of rooting out the Reformed Religion, and destroying the professors thereof. In the tender sense and compassion of these evils, under which your people and kingdom lie, (according to the duty which we owe to God, your majesty, and the kingdom for which we are trusted) do most earnestly desire that an end may be put to these great distempers and distractions; for the preventing of that desolation which doth threaten all your majesty's dominions; and as we have rendered, and still are ready to render, to your maj. that subjection, obedience, and service which we owe unto you; so we most humbly beseech your maj. to remove the causes of this war, and to vouchsafe us that peace and protection which we and our ancestors have formerly enjoyed under your maj. and your royal predecessors, and graciously to accept and grant these our most humble desires and propositions: I. That your maj. will be pleased to disband your armies, as we likewise shall be ready to disband all those forces which we have raised; and that you will be pleased to return to your parliament. II. That you will leave delinquents to a legal trial, and judgment of parliament. III. That the papists may not only be disbanded, but disarmed according to law. IV. That your maj. will be pleased to give your royal assent unto the bill for taking away superstitious innovations: To the bill for the utter abolishing and taking away of all archbishops, bishops, their chancellors and commissaries, deans, sub-deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, canons, and prebendaries, and all chaunters, chancellors, treasurers, sub-treasurers, succentors, and sacrists; and all vicars choral, choiristers, old vicars and new vicars of any cathedral or collegiate church, and all other their under-officers out of the church of England: to the bill against scandalous Ministers: to the bill against Pluralities: and to the bill for Consultation to be had with godly, religious, and learned divines: that your maj. will be pleased to promise to pass such other good bills for settling of church-government, as, upon consultation with the assembly of the said divines, shall be resolved on by both houses of parliament, and, by them, be presented to your majesty. V. That your maj. having expressed, in your Answer to the Nineteen Propositions* of both houses, an hearty affection and intention for the rooting out of Popery out of this kingdom; and that if both the houses can yet find a more effectual course to disable Jesuits, Priests, and Popish Recusants, from disturbing the state or eluding the laws, that you would willingly give your consent unto it; that you would be graciously pleased, for the better discovery and speedier conviction of Recusants, that an oath may be established by act of parliament, to be administred in such manner as by both houses shall be agreed on; wherein they shall abjure and renounce the Pope's supremacy, the doctrine of transubstantiation, purgatory, worshipping of the consecrated Host, Crucifixes and Images; and the refusing the said oath, being tendered in such manner as shall be appointed by act of parliament, shall be a sufficient conviction in law of recusancy. And that your majesty will be graciously pleased to give your royal assent unto a bill for the Education of the children of Papists, by Protestants, in the Protestant Religion. That for the more effectual execution of the laws against Popish Recusants, your maj. will be pleased to consent to a bill for the true levying of the penalties against them; and that the same penalties may be levied and disposed of in such manner as both houses shall agree on, so as your maj. be at no loss. And likewise to a bill, whereby the practice of papists against the state may be prevented, and the laws against them duly executed. VI. That the earl of Bristol may be removed from your majesty's counsels; and that both he and the lord Herbert, eldest son to the earl of Worcester, may likewise be restrained from coming within the verge of the court; and that they may not bear any office, or have any employments, concerning the state or commonwealth. VII. That your maj. will be graciously pleased, by act of parliament, to settle the Militia, both by sea and land, and also the forts and ports of the kingdom, in such a manner as shall be agreed on by both houses. VIII. That your maj. will be pleased, by your letters patent, to make sir John Brampton chief justice of your court of King's Bench; Win. Lenthall, esq. the now Speaker of the commons house, master of the Rolls; and to continue the lord chief justice Bankes chief justice of the court of Common Pleas; and likewise to make Mr. serjeant Wylde chief baron of your court of exchequer; and that Mr. justice Bacon may be continued, and serjeants Rolle and Atkins made justices of the King's Bench; that Mr. justice Reeves and Mr. justice Foster may be continued, and Mr. serjeant Pheasant made one of the justices of your court of Common-pleas; that Mr. serjeant Creswell, Mr. Samuel Brown, and Mr. John Puleston may be barons of the Exchequer; and that all these, and all the judges of the same courts for the time to come, may hold their places, by letters patent under the great seal, quamdiu se bene gesserint; and that the several persons, not before named, that do hold any of these places before mentioned, may be removed. IX. That all such persons as have been put out of the commission of peace, or oyer and terminer, or from being Custodes Rotulorum, since the first of April, 1642, other than such as were put out by desire of both or either of the houses, may again be put into those commissions and offices; and that such persons may be put out of those commissions and offices as shall be excepted against by both houses of parliament. X. That your maj. will be pleased to pass the bill now presented, to vindicate and secure the privileges of parliament from the ill consequence of the late precedent, in the charge and proceeding against the lord Kimbolton, now earl of Manchester, and the five members of the house of commons. XI. That your majesty's royal assent may be given unto such acts, as shall be advised by both houses for the satisfying and paying the debts and damages, wherein the two houses of parliament have engaged the public faith of the kingdom. XII. That your maj. will be pleased, according to a gracious Answer heretofore received from you, to enter into a more strict alliance with the states of the United Provinces, and other neighbour princes and states of the protestant religion, for the defence and maintenance thereof against all designs and attempts of the Popish and Jesuitical faction to subvert and suppress it; whereby your subjects may hope to be free from the mischiefs which this kingdom hath endured, through the power which some of that party have had in your councils, and will be much encouraged, in a parliamentary way, for your aid and assistance, in restoring your royal sister and the prince elector to those dignities and dominions.

ions which belong unto them, and the relieving the other protestant princes who have suffered in the same cause. XIII. That in the General Pardon which your maj. hath been pleased to offer to your subjects, all offences and misdemeanors committed before the 10th of Jan. 1641, which have been, or shall be, questioned or proceeded against in parliament, upon complaint in the house of commons, before the 10th of Jan. 1643, shall be excepted; which offences and misdemeanors shall, nevertheless, be taken and adjudged to be fully discharged against all other inferior courts. That likewise there shall be an exception of all offences committed by any person or persons, which hath, or have, had any hand or practice in the rebellion of Ireland; which hath, or have, given any counsel, assistance, or encouragement to the rebels there, for the maintenance of that rebellion; as likewise the exception of William earl of Newcastle, and George lord Digby. XIV. That your maj. will be pleased to restore such members of either house to their several places of services and employment, out of which they have been put since the beginning of this parliament; that they may receive satisfaction and reparation for those places, and for the profits which they have lost by such removals, upon the petition of both houses; and that all others may be restored to their offices and employments, who have been put out of the same upon any displeasure conceived against them for any assistance given to both houses, or obeying their commands; or forbearing to leave their attendance upon the parliament without licence; or for any other occasion arising from these unhappy differences betwixt your maj. and both houses, upon the like petition of both houses.—These things being granted and performed, as it hath always been our hearty prayer, so shall we be enabled to make it our hopeful endeavour, that your maj. and your people may enjoy the blessings of peace, truth, and justice; the royalty and greatness of your throne may be supported by the loyal and bountiful affections of your people; their liberties and privileges maintained by your majesty's protection and justice; and this public honour and happiness of your maj. and all your dominions, communicated to other churches and states of your alliance; and be derived to your royal posterity and the future generations in this kingdom for ever."

Mr. Whitlocke, one of the commissioners abovementioned, gives us the following particulars relating to this remarkable embassy: "They had their first access to the king in the garden of Christ-Church, where he was walking with the prince, and divers other lords attending him: all of them kissed his hand, not as they were ranked in the safe-conduct, but according to their several degrees. Mr. Pierpoint before the knights, he being an earl's son; and Mr. Winwood before Mr. Whitlocke, he being the eldest knight's son; and Mr. Waller the last: the king said to him, 'Though you are the last, yet you are not the worst, nor the 'least in my favour.' The discovery of a Plot then in hand in London, to betray the parliament, wherein Mr. Waller was engaged with Chaloner, Tomkins, and others, which was then in agitation, did manifest the king's courtship to Mr. Waller to be for that service. After they had all kissed the king's hand, the prince gave them his hand to kiss. The earl of Northumberland read the Propositions to the king, with a sober and stout carriage; and being interrupted by the king, he said smartly, 'Your majesty will give me leave to proceed?' The king answered, 'Ay, ay,' and so the earl read them all through."

The King's Answer.] Feb. 6. The lords commissioners, at their return to the house, made the following Report of this whole proceeding; that when they presented the Propositions to the king, he made them this short Answer:

"My Lords; I was always for peace, and am more concerned in it than any, being the father of the country next under God. I cannot chuse but speak, though I thought to have said nothing. I confess I am surprized, though I have seen somewhat of this, yet I believed them not to be such as these are. They that principally contrived and penned them, had no thoughts of peace in their hearts, but to make things worse and worse; yet I shall do my part, and take as much honey out of the gall as I can. I will think of them, and take time to give you my Answer."

Two days after, the king sent for them again, and told them, That he had considered of the Propositions, presented unto him from both houses of parliament, and had returned this Answer, which he commanded the earl of Holland to read:

"If his majesty had not given up all the faculties of his soul to an earnest endeavour of a peace and reconciliation with his people, or if he would suffer himself, by any provocation, to be drawn to a sharpness of language, at a time when there seems somewhat like an overture of accommodation, he could not but resent the heavy charges upon him in the preamble of these Propositions; and would not suffer himself to be reproached with protecting of delinquents, by force, from justice; (his majesty's desire having always been, that all men should be tried by the known law, and he having been refused it) with raising an army against his parliament; and to be told that arms have been taken up against him, for the defence of religion, laws, liberties, privileges of parliament, and for the sitting of the parliament in safety; with many other particulars in that preamble, so often and so fully answered by his majesty, without remembering the world of the time and circumstances of raising those arms against him, when his maj. was so far from being in a condition to invade other men's rights, that he was not able to maintain and defend his own from violence; and without telling his good subjects that their religion, (the true Protestant religion, in which his maj.

was born, hath faithfully lived, and to which he will die a willing sacrifice) their laws, liberties, privileges and safety of parliament, were so amply settled and established, or offered to be so, by his majesty, before any army was raised against him, and long before any raised by him for his defence; that if nothing had been desired but that peace and protection which his subjects and their ancestors had, in the best times, enjoyed under his majesty, or his royal predecessors, this misunderstanding and distance between his majesty and his people, and this general misery and distraction upon the face of the whole kingdom, had not been now the discourse of Christendom: but his maj. will forbear any expressions of bitterness, or of a sense of his own sufferings; that, if it be possible, the memory thereof may be lost to the world; and therefore, though many of the Propositions, presented to his majesty by both houses, appear to him very derogatory from, and destructive to, his just power and prerogative, and no way beneficial to his subjects; few of them being already due to them by the laws established (and how unparliamentary it is by arms to require new laws, all the world may judge); yet, because these may be waved or mollified, and many things that are now dark and doubtful in them cleared and explained upon debate, his maj. is pleased (such is his sense of the miseries this kingdom suffers by this unnatural war, and his earnest desire to remove them by an happy peace) that a speedy time and place be agreed upon for the meeting of such persons as his maj. and both houses shall appoint, to discuss these Propositions, and such others here following, as his majesty doth propose to them: I. That his majesty's own revenue, magazine, towns, forts, and ships, which have been taken or kept from him by force, be forthwith restored unto him. II. That whatsoever hath been done or published contrary to the known laws of the land, or derogatory to his majesty's legal and known power and rights, be renounced and recalled; that no seed may remain for the like to spring out of for the future. III. That whatsoever illegal power hath been claimed and exercised by or over his subjects, as imprisoning their persons without law, stopping their Habeas Corpus, and imposing upon their estates without act of parliament, &c. either by both or either house, or any committee of both or either, or by any persons appointed by any of them, be disclaimed; and all such persons so committed, forthwith discharged. IV. That as his maj. will readily consent, having done so heretofore, to the execution of all laws already made, and to any good acts to be made for the suppressing of Popery, and for the firm settling of the Protestant Religion now established by law; so he desires that a good bill may be framed for the better preserving the Book of Common Prayer from the scorn and violence of Brownists, Anabaptists, and other Sectaries, with such clauses for the ease of tender consciences as his maj. hath formerly offered. V. That all such persons as, upon the Treaty, shall be excepted out of the General Pardon, shall be tried per pares, according to the usual course and known laws of the land; and that it be left to that, either to acquit or condemn them. VI. And to the intent this Treaty may not suffer interruption by any intervening accidents, that a cessation of arms, and free trade, for all his majesty's subjects may be first agreed upon.—This offer and desire of his maj. he hopes will be cheerfully entertained, that a speedy and blessed peace may be accomplished. If it shall be rejected, or by insisting upon unreasonable circumstances be made impossible, (which he hopes God in his mercy to this nation will not suffer) the guilt of the blood which will be shed, and the desolation which must follow, will lie upon the heads of the refusers. However his majesty is resolved, through what accidents soever he shall be compelled to recover his rights, and with what prosperous success soever it shall please God to bless him, that by his earnest constant endeavours to propagate and promote the true protestant religion, and by his governing according to the known law of the land, and upholding the just privileges of parliament, according to his frequent protestations made before Almighty God, which he will always inviolably observe, the world shall see that he hath undergone all these difficulties and hazards for the defence and maintenance of those; the zealous preservation of which his majesty well knows is the only foundation and means for the true happiness of him and his people."

Upon the reading of this Answer, the lords resolved to communicate it to the commons, as a matter of great and serious consideration, and to desire them to take it into their utmost care and thought.

Lord Fairfax's Letter concerning his taking of Leeds.] The following Letter, from the Lord Fairfax, in the North, was delivered to the lords, by the commons, at a conference, and read in that house on the first of this month. The Letter was addressed to the Speaker:

"Sir; It is most necessary that I continue my Relation to you of the state and condition of the Affairs in this country, that they may be made known to both houses; and provision made for succours to be sent us, which have hitherto come very slowly, though they have made large expressions of their care. We have been long destitute of money to pay the army, and to supply that want, I have used all possible industry, by taking up money upon exchange, and by calling upon the country to supply me for the present upon the public faith. The want of money doth so perplex the part of the army here, as I imagine the house will not expect any considerable matter to be done by us; though, God be thanked, the forces I send from hence, and are raised by the country in other places, are daily acting something to advance the public service. As in the North-Riding, where sir Hugh Cholm-

ley hath carried himself very bravely, giving several defeats to the enemy near Malton; and on Monday the 16th of this month, joining his forces to sir Matthew Boynton, they fell upon col. Slingsby at Gisbrough, where they defeated him and 600 horse and foot with him, that had done much spoil in the North-Riding; they wounded and took col. Slingsby himself, with 140 other prisoners; killed a great many, and recovered 200 arms with the place. Amongst the prisoners taken by sir Hugh Cholmley at Malton, and here at Gisbrough, it is found that a great number are Papists; and indeed the strength of the enemies will be found to consist much of Papists, and popishly affected, the earl of Newcastle granting his commissions, for raising men, to Papists for the most part. I have heard, of late, of commissions granted to 12 recusants of these parts, whose names I send inclosed; and it is not to be doubted he walks the same ways in other places, as well as here; which courses have so advanced Popery, as I hear, that in York where many recusants are settled, mass is ordinarily said in every street; and such affronts offered to the Protestants and the ministry, as few dare resort to church. In other parts of the country, I am informed, that for many miles together, the religious ministry are all either fled, or imprisoned; which persecutions, if they be not timely repressed, will extirpate or much depress the Protestant religion in these parts.—About Bradford and Halifax, God hath blessed my son and those small forces with good success against the enemy, in several light skirmishes: on Monday was se'nnight, he seized on the lord Saville's house at Howley, and put about 100 musqueteers into it; and on Tuesday, I sent sir Wm. Fairfax and his officers, with some arms, to raise his regiment in those parts; and for his convoy, I sent what horse and dragoons I could spare from hence, directing them to stay with my son to assist him in his design against Leeds.—Yesternight I received letters from him, wherein he relates to me, that on Monday last, he drew his forces out of Bradford, and marched to Leeds, where sir Wm. Sayille commanded in chief; my son first summoned them by a trumpet to yield, which being refused, the assault began, wherein his men carried themselves with great resolution; for the town was fortified on all sides, furnished with two brass sakers, and manned with 1500 soldiers, yet they forced an entry in two hours fight; there were not lost on both sides above 40 men, but he took 4 colours, and 500 prisoners, of which 6 are commanders; and, with the prisoners, they took many arms, the sakers, and all the munition they had, which was not much; on our part we lost 13 men, and capt. Briggs, and capt. Lee, both sore wounded; and I perceive that in this exploit, sir Wm. Fairfax, sir Tho. Norcliffe, and serjeant-major Forbes, with the rest of the commanders, carried themselves very gallantly. The people do observe that sir Wm. Saville, and the chief commanders on the other side, soon after the fight began, fled by secret ways towards Pontefract, and their men after them by degrees. After Leeds was thus won, my son writes that he intended to have marched to Wakefield, where sir Geo. Wentworth commanded, but was prevented therein by the enemies fears; who, hearing he had taken Leeds, fled all away from Wakefield to Pontefract, and left the town; so he hath sent some forces to invest and keep that place: thus hath God blessed their endeavours on that side; and now I am told that capt. Hotham and sir John Saville are gone up yesterday with some forces into those parts, but upon what design I know not.—Yesterday morning I had some intelligence that the most part of the forces were marched, the day before, out of Doncaster; so I have sent my serj. major general with 6 companies of foot to invest that place, and to leave some forces to keep it until more strength come to us out of the Southern counties; which, if it could be hastened hither, might very much advance the cause, and crush the Popish forces before they be supplied by the queen's coming, or their party in Scotland, of which there is some expectation.—I desire you will make known to the house the great extremities that are put upon me; and that a certain course may be settled for supplying us with money for the entertainment of the army, in such season as our men may be encouraged in the service, and not fall into a way of plundering for want of pay. My son upon the taking of Leeds, though he entered it by force, yet he restrained his army from pillaging; so I have ordered that the Malignants, in lieu of the spoil challenged to be due unto the soldiers, shall give them a month's entertainment, which I hope will content both parties.—Yesternight intelligence was brought to me, that the earl of Newcastle hath drawn down all his forces from the South parts of Yorkshire, those only excepted that kept the castle at Pontefract; for yesterday he marched from Sherburne to York, with 36 colours, 2 pieces of cannon, 45 other carriages; the certain cause I do not yet know, but suppose it is to meet the arms and munition coming from Newcastle; or to prepare for the queen's entertainment at York, which is much spoken of. I shall carry a vigilant eye upon his designs, and endeavour to prevent them, so far as can be expected from the forces under the command of, Sir, &c. FER. FAIRFAX. Selby, Jan. 26, 1642."

Ordinance of Parliament in consequence of the above Letter.] After the reading of this Letter, the following Ordinance is entered in the Lords Journals:

"Whereas many and fervent prayers have been sent up to God, for his blessing to be poured down upon the endeavours of the parliament in maintenance of his own cause and religion, now openly assaulted by Papists; and because it is most just and necessary to observe the return of these prayers, that our mouths and hearts may be as much enlarged in praises as they have been in prayers, the lords and commons have thought fit to publish some late good successes, as so many Answers from Heaven, which God hath given to the prayers of his servants.—And whereas sundry late Declarations have shewed to the world divers informations and proofs concerning the raising of a Popish army, with an intention to subvert God's true religion professed, and by law established, in this kingdom, and to introduce Popish idolatry and superstition; that it may appear what was, before, an intention is now matter of fact, and really put in execution, a most certain and true Relation is here offered to public notice and observation; wherein it may be seen that this Popish army hath set up the open practice of their abominable idolatry in York, the second city in the kingdom; and are grown to that height of insolency, that they terrify and drive away the Protestant ministers and people from frequenting their own churches, and from the practice of their own religion; wherein they have given a pattern and pledge what they intend to do, and what must be expected from them, through the whole kingdom. The consideration hereof (whereby the most precious things in the world, God's glory and true worship, and the salvation of the souls of men, are brought into danger) ought to excite and stir up, and we are confident it will, the strongest endeavours and most united conjunctions, of all religious and well-affected Protestants and patriots, to resist and suppress those common enemies of God, in pity to their country and the commonwealth; for now it plainly appears that, however they pretend to defend the religion and the laws, yet their main intention is to establish Popery in this kingdom, and to extirpate the Protestant religion; which cannot be done without subversion of the laws, as the Papists have, almost, effected in Ireland."

A Committee of Sequestration appointed.]

Feb. 3. The commons, after passing some Votes, for Sequestering the Estates, real and personal, of some particular persons, appointed a committee to consider of the sequestering and seizing the estates, real and personal, of all such persons as have been, are, or shall be, in actual war or arms against the Parliament: and to have power to appoint Sequestrators, to make allowances to such as should be employed in this service; and to use all other means thought effectual to it

Ordinance for a general Weekly Assessment.]

Feb. 8. A Weekly Assessment was agreed on for the maintenance of the army; and an Ordinance was made for that purpose. These new kind of taxes bore grievously on the citizens of London, and all those counties which were within the power of the parliament.

Votes and Resolutions relating to disbanding the King's and the Parliament's Armies.]

Feb. 13. The commons sent up their Resolutions on the intended Treaty at Oxford. They told the lords, in a conference, That they agreed with them in some things, and differed in others; and offered the following Votes, of their house, to their lordships consideration: Resolved, "That this house doth concur with the Lords in their Votes, That there shall be a speedy Disbanding of both Armies; and that there should be a fixed time appointed for it. The Northern and Western armies to be first disbanded, which shall be on the 1st of March next; and the day for disbanding all the other armies, on the 10th of the same month. That a message be sent to his majesty to desire his consent for disbanding the Armies, according to the Votes of this house; and that persons shall be appointed to treat with his majesty concerning the manner of disbanding." The question being put, Whether there shall be a present Cessation of Arms, in order to the Treaty on the Propositions, before the disbanding of the armies? it passed in the negative. Resolved, "That when his majesty shall have assented to a Disbanding, and the time and manner of it, then the time for an immediate Cessation shall be agreed on."

They also presented the following Reasons why there should be no Treaty, upon the Propositions, before disbanding:

"That a Treaty, before the Disbanding, will be ineffectual to produce such a Peace, as may secure religion against the designs of the papists to destroy it, and the prelatical party to corrupt it; or to secure the liberties of the kingdom, and the privileges of parl. against projectors and delinquents. The grounds and evidence whereof are these: 1. Because Papists, Malignants, and other Delinquents, are now in greatest power about the king; and this Treaty is like to be managed by their counsels, whose hopes and interests are built upon the breach and distemper betwixt the king and his people; whereof they having been the greatest cause, will still endeavour to hinder such a Peace, as may interrupt their own designs: Whereas if the Treaty be after the Disbanding, the authority of parliament will be more powerful to remove such impediments. 2. If the Treaty be before the Disbanding, it will not be safe for his majesty to yield to any such propositions as shall be for the suppressing of Papists and Malignants, his person being in their power; nor yet so safe for the kingdom, whilst arms are in their hands, and so great a party, both in Ireland and beyond the seas, to encourage and assist them in resisting the observance and execution of any such Treaty. 3. If the armies be once disbanded, though the Treaties should not succeed, yet the war cannot be carried on, but there will be time of mediation to take up those differences without any further shedding of blood: whereas, if the armies be on foot, upon every difference in the Treaty both sides may be provoked, with more animosity and bitterness, to refer matters to the bloody trial of the sword; and many intervening accidents may interrupt the Treaty. 4. That it will be most honourable for his majesty, and more safe for his people, that the Propositions be yielded after the Disbanding than before; for thereby his maj. will be freed from the imputation of granting any thing by force; which might both trench upon his honour, and weaken the validity of the things granted; and both houses will be free from that tax of unparliamentary proceedings, implied in his majesty's Answer, Of requiring new Laws by Arms. 5. That if the Treaty be before Disbanding, it will endanger, or delay, his majesty's consent to the disbanding at the time limited; for there will be the same reason, on his majesty's part, for concluding the Treaty before the disbanding, as for the beginning it; that so, if he be like to have more advantage by arms than by the Treaty, he may still have it in his power to pursue the same ends for which his force was at first raised; and all delays in that kind will make the burdens and miseries insupportable to the kingdom, by the necessary maintenance of all the armies, and other charges and mischiefs which will thereby fall upon the subject."

To these Reasons of the commons was annexed the following Resolution:—"That, forthwith after the Disbanding of both armies, this house will send a committee to attend his majesty, by an humble Treaty, to give him due satisfaction concerning the Propositions sent to them from his majesty, and those presented from them to his majesty."

These Votes, Reasons and Resolutions, were not laid before the lords till the 16th of this month, when they were quickened by another Message from the commons. The Votes and Reasons were again read; and, after debate, the lords resolved, "Not to recede from their former Votes, but to adhere to them, notwithstanding the Reasons of the commons: to have a conference with them, and acquaint them, That this house thinks it fit that the time, from the beginning of the Treaty, ought not to exceed 20 days. That the king's Propositions, concerning his magazines, towns, forts, and ships; and the Propositions of both houses for disbanding of all armies, may be first treated of. That the remote armies may be disbanded by the last day of March, or sooner if it can be: that the king's army under the command of the earl of Forth, and that under the earl of Essex raised by parliament, may be disbanded by the 10th of April, or sooner. That there may be a present Cessation of all acts of hostility, on both sides; and that all other things may continue in the same state, without any further intercourse, or free passage, than is at present. Lastly, Because that money is necessary to maintain and support the army, the lords think fit to propose to the commons, to join with them in sending to the lord mayor of London, to call a common council the next day, to move them to advance money for the supply of the army."

Sir B. Rudyard's Speech on the Disbanding of the Armies.] Feb. 17. The debates on the disbanding, or not disbanding, the Armies before the Treaty, were this day continued in the commons; and, on two divisions, one of them

76 against 73, and the other 86 against 83, it was carried to enter upon the Treaty before Disbanding. On this day we meet with the following speech of sir Benj. Rudyard:

Sir Benj. Rudyard said—"Mr. Speaker; I do verily think that the vote we have already passed, for the disbanding the armies the 1st and 10th of Feb. will find us no farther on our way than where we now are, besides the accidents that may happen, and so much precious time spent, as till then.—Sir, the main business is, whether we shall have a present Treaty or no. And this concerns us in all that we have, and are. Since we refused a Treaty at Nottingham, I do not find that we have gotten much ground, although our army then was fresh, full, and full paid; the people erect, bountiful and forward to the war. Now the disposition of the kingdom, for the greatest part, stands bent towards a peace: so that where-soever the refusal, or delay of the way to it shall be fixed, the disadvantage will fall on that side. How clear soever the intentions of the house are, yet abroad it will be taken but as a shew without reality, and so it will be returned upon us.—For the Propositions; I have not known, nor heard, that all the propositions in any Treaty of importance were ever swallowed whole. If some be harsh and rough, they may be wrought and suppld by wise treaters, made fit for an acceptable agreement. If others be unpassable, they may be totally rejected. Those that are our unquestionable rights, may be so claimed, and held.—Mr. Speaker, we have already tasted the bitter bloody fruits of war, we are grown exceedingly behind hand with ourselves since we began it: if we persist, there will such a confluence of mischiefs break in upon us, as, I am afraid, will ruin the king, the kingdom, the nation; unless God be merciful to us, and do step in with a great miracle, for a little one will not serve our turn. I have long and thoughtfully expected that the Cup of Trembling, which hath gone round about us to other nations, would at length come in amongst us; it is now come at last, and we may drink the dregs of it, the worst; which God avert. There is yet some comfort left, that our miseries are not likely to last long: for we cannot fight here as they do in Germany, in that great, large, vast continent; where, although there be war in some parts of it, yet there are many other remote quiet places, for trade and tillage to support it. We must fight as in a cock-pit, we are surrounded with the sea. We have no stronger holds than our own skulls, and our own ribs, to keep out enemies; so that the whole kingdom will suddenly be but one flame. It hath been said in this house, that we are bound in conscience to punish the shedding of innocent blood: but, sir, who shall be answerable for all the innocent blood which shall be spilt hereafter, if we do not endeavour a Peace, by a speedy Treaty? Certainly God is as much to be trusted in a Treaty, as in a War: it is he that gives wisdom to treat, as well as courage to fight, and success to both, as it pleaseth him. Blood is a crying sin, it pollutes a land: why should we defile this land any longer? Wherefore, Mr. Speaker, let us stint blood as soon as we can. Let us agree with our adversaries in the way, by a present, short, wary Treaty. God direct us."

Propositions from the Citizens of London, concerning raising Money, disbanding the Army, &c.] Feb. 20. New Propositions having been made to the citizens for a considerable advance of money, some of the aldermen and common-council attended the house of lords; when, being called in, they declared, "That they were sent from the lord mayor, aldermen and common council of London, to give their lordships an account of the desire of both houses for the advancement of 60,000*l.* which the common council have taken into consideration, and voted to raise it speedily, if possible it may be; and the common council have many things in agitation, which are not yet digested: but think it fit humbly to desire of their lordships, and the house of commons, some things that will give encouragement in the raising of this money, which they offer to their lordships consideration. 1. That both houses would vouchsafe to advance the raising of 60,000*l.* by their own example, and pay it into the hands of the treasurers at Guildhall, in London, to the end that the sight of it may encourage others. 2. That they may be eased in the rates of the weekly assessment, because it exceeds the proportion of the county, if it be not too late. 3. That the 3000*l.* per month, granted for defence of the city, out of the weekly assessment, may be made 4000*l.* 4. It is humbly desired that the citizens lands and houses in the country, may not be rated for the weekly assessment, so that they pay in London. 5. It is desired, in regard they are informed that divers misinformations have been made concerning the city of London by private persons, that hereafter no such credit may be given thereunto, as to be accounted the sense of the city, unless it proceeds from the court of aldermen or common-council, signified by special messengers of their own, or by their burgesses, directed by one of the said courts. 6. That it will much promote the said service, if the money assessed by virtue of divers Ordinances, be collected forthwith in London, and other parts of the kingdom, that the charge may not lie wholly upon the willing party; for that otherwise the well-affected will be either destroyed with them or for them; with them, if they should refuse as others do; or for them, by contributing, alone, to the public safety more than their estates will bear. 7. That search be made, without the liberties, in the parts adjacent, for suspected persons; and that, upon the disbanding, those that are called the King's Army may be enjoined to go to their several habitations, and not to come to London, to the disturbance of the peace, safety, and welfare of the said city, and of the good government thereof; and that during the time of the Treaty and Cessation, none of the said army may be permitted to come to the city. 8. That to prevent misapprehensions and jealousies concerning the present proceedings of both houses of parliament, about the Treaty and Cessation, and Disbanding, it is humbly prayed it may be declared, That the Resolution of both houses is the same as at the first, That nothing shall be done but that which tends to the securing the true Protestant religion, the just liberties of the subjects, and privileges of parliament. 9. It is desired that the Ordinance for the weekly Assessment may pass forthwith, for securing the reimbursement of the 60,000*l.* which otherwise, will not be raised.—The Resolutions of both houses are humbly desired herein, as an encouragement to carry on the business."

The Answer returned to these Messages was, 1. "That their lordships gave the lord mayor, &c. thanks for their readiness and care in the raising of 60,000*l.* and to let them know that their lordships hope nothing shall be done in this Treaty, but what shall be for the security of the true Protestant religion, the privilege of parliament, the just privileges of the subject, and the security of the City of London. 2. For the Ordinance for the Weekly Assessment, this house hath passed it already, and sent it to the commons; and concerning the making of 3000*l.* allowance a week to be 4000*l.* their lordships will give the best furtherance they can in it."

Letter from the E. of Essex concerning a Cessation.] Feb. 21. The lords had sent a copy of the Votes of both houses concerning the Cessation, &c. to the earl of Essex, their general: at the same time desiring his opinion and advice about them; to which the general returned the following Answer, addressed to their Speaker:

"My lord; I must acknowledge the obligation I have to the lords, that they desire my advice about the particulars concerning a Cessation. My lord, if I had known of it before it had been voted, I should have clearly delivered my opinion, and then submitted myself and it to your lordships greater wisdoms; but, my lord, now I know my duty. The arms you have raised are so dispersed, and so many difficulties in it, that it is too great a burthen for me to undertake to deliver my opinion; not doubting but that your lordships, in your grave wisdoms, have weighed all the inconveniences that may happen to your servants employed by you, during this Cessation, and the ways how to prevent them, before you voted the Cessation. My lord, if I knew how to give a clear answer to a business I am so great a stranger to, having been at none of the debates, I should shew my obedience to their commands. I am, &c. ESSEX. Windsor, Feb. 20. 1642."

The King's Message concerning a Cessation.] After this the house being informed that one

Mr. Wm. Murray was without, with a Letter from the King to the Speaker, his lordship was appointed to receive it; which contained only a command to read the following Message in the house, and afterwards to communicate it to the commons:

“C. R. Whereas his majesty hath, together with a Treaty proposed a Cessation of arms to both his houses of parliament, now 16 days since, to which, as yet, he hath received no Answer: to the end that his maj. may so clearly understand the houses, that no such imputations, as have been formerly, may after be laid upon him, upon occasion of any thing that may intervene; his maj. desires, if a Cessation shall be approved of by them, that the day upon which the Cessation is thought fit to begin, and such particular limits and conditions of that Cessation as are necessary to be understood and agreed on before the Cessation itself can actually begin, be proposed by them at the same time, with their approbation of it; since, as his maj. supposes by the present great preparation of several forces of the earl of Essex to march several ways, that till such time as this be done, they do not conceive themselves obliged to an actual Cessation: so neither, till then, doth his maj. conceive himself obliged to it.”

Hereupon the lords resolved to have a conference with the commons, and to communicate this Message and the earl of Essex's Letter to them; and to desire that a committee of both houses may be appointed to consider in what manner, and what limitations, the Cessation of Arms may proceed in, and how to be carried on.

The Parliament's Articles of Cessation.
Feb. 28. The following Articles to be sent to the king for a Cessation of Arms, before the intended Treaty began, were perfected, read, and agreed to by both houses:

“Whereas the lords and commons in parliament, out of a tender sense of the present miseries and distractions of the kingdom, and for the obtaining and settling of a happy peace between his majesty and his people, have humbly presented his majesty divers Propositions, to which he hath been pleased to make this return; ‘That his desire was, that a speedy time and place might be appointed for the discussing of those Propositions, and likewise some others proposed by his majesty.’ It is thereupon agreed in both houses, that a committee shall be appointed to attend his majesty, on or before the 4th of March, if his majesty shall so please, to endeavour to give him all humble and fit satisfaction concerning the said Propositions, both his majesty's and their own.—And whereas, for the more speedy removal of the bloody and miserable effects of war, his maj. hath likewise been graciously pleased, by a late Message, to signify his desire, ‘That, for avoiding all intervening accidents of war, which might interrupt this Treaty, there might be a Cessation of Arms, under such particular conditions and limitations as should be agreed on:’ their humble desires therein concurring with his majesty, it is, by them, assented and agreed, That a Cessation of Arms, in order to such a Treaty as is resolved upon by both houses, may be enjoined to all the armies and forces now on foot in the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, on either side, under the restrictions and limitations hereafter following; and that neither side shall be bound and limited by this Cessation, in any otherwise, or to any other purpose, than is hereafter expressed. I. That all manner of arms, ammunition, victuals, money, bullion, and all other commodities, passing without such a Safe-Conduct as may warrant their passage, may be staid and seized on, as if no such Cessation were agreed on at all. II. That all manner of persons, passing without such a Safe-Conduct as is mentioned in the Article next going before, shall be apprehended and detained, as if no such Cessation were agreed on at all. III. That his majesty's forces in Oxfordshire, shall advance no nearer to Windsor than Wheatly; and, in Buckinghamshire, no nearer to Aylesbury than Brill; and that, in Berkshire, the forces respectively shall not advance nearer the one to the other than now they are; that the parliament forces in Oxfordshire shall advance no nearer to Oxford than Henley; those in Buckinghamshire, no nearer to Oxford than Aylesbury; that his majesty's forces shall take no new quarters above 12 miles from Oxford, any way; and that the parliament forces shall take no new quarters above 12 miles from Windsor, any way. IV. That no siege shall be begun, or continued, against Gloucester; and that his majesty's forces, now employed in the siege, shall return to Cirencester and Malmsbury, or to Oxford, as shall be most for their conveniency: that the parliament forces which are in Gloucestershire shall remain in the cities of Gloucester, Bristol, and the castle and town of Berkley; or retire nearer to Windsor, as they shall see cause; and that those of Wales, which are drawn to Gloucester, shall return into their quarters, where they were before they drew down to Gloucestershire. V. That in case it be pretended on either side, that the Cessation is violated, no act of hostility is immediately to follow; but, first, the party complaining is to acquaint the lord-general on the other side, and to allow 3 days, after notice given for satisfaction: and in case satisfaction be not given or accepted, then 5 days notice to be given before hostility begin; and the like to be observed, in the remoter armies, by the commanders in chief. Lastly, That all other forces in the kingdom of England, and dominion of Wales, and not before-mentioned, shall remain in the same quarters and places, as they are at the time of the publishing of this Cessation, and under the same conditions as are mentioned in the Articles before; and that this Cessation shall not extend to restrain the setting forth, or employing, of any ships for the defence of his majesty's dominions.—All which they humbly desire his majesty will be pleased to ratify and confirm, and that this Cessation may begin upon the 4th of March next, or sooner if it may be, and continue until the 25th of the same month; and, in the mean time, to be published to the commanders, officers, and soldiers, and all other his majesty's loving subjects on either side; and that the Treaty, intended, may commence upon the 4th of March next, or sooner if it may be; and the continuance thereof not to exceed 20 days."

The King's Articles of Cessation.] March 6. The lords received an Answer from the king to their Articles of Cessation, as follows:

"His majesty hoped the Treaty would have been begun, and the Cessation agreed on long since; and that much might, in this time, have been concluded in order to the peace and happiness of the kingdom; but since, in almost a month (for his majesty's Propositions were made on the 3rd of Feb. and he heard not, since, from both houses till the 1st of March) no consent hath been yielded to it, he conceives the Cessation cannot begin so soon as the 4th of this month; by which time (though his majesty uses no delay in making his Answer) the same can hardly be returned to them; and many of the Articles now presented to him from both houses concerning the Cessation, are so strict, that such of his good subjects, who are not of his army (and for whom, generally, he shall always have a principal, just, and compassionate regard) receive not any benefit, or are restored to any liberty thereby, which his maj. shall ever insist upon; (when in matters merely concerning himself, he may descend to easier conditions) and which he hath returned with such alterations, as he doubts not both his houses will consent to; and do sufficiently manifest how solicitous his maj. is for the good of his people, and how desirous he is that, in this unnatural contention, no more blood of his subjects may be spilt, (upon which he looks with much grief, compassion, and tenderness of heart) even of those who have lifted up their hands against him: and his maj. therefore desires (against which he can imagine no objection can be made) That the Cessation may begin upon the 12th of this month, or sooner, if the conditions of the Cessation shall be sooner agreed on, and is willing the same shall continue for 20 days; in which time he hopes by the Treaty, and a clear understanding of each other, a full peace and happiness may be established throughout the kingdom. And, during that time, his maj. is willing that neither side shall be bound or limited by this Cessation in any otherwise, or to any other purpose, than is hereafter expressed. I. That all manner of arms, ammunition, money, bullion, and victuals, passing for the use of either army, without a pass or safe-conduct from the generals of each army, may be stayed and seized on, as if no Cessation was agreed on at all. II. That all officers and soldiers of either army, passing without such licence or safe-conduct as aforesaid, may be apprehended and detained, as if no such Cessation was agreed on at all: and that all manner of persons, his majesty's subjects, of what quality or condition soever (except officers and soldiers of either army) shall pass to and from the cities of Oxford and London, and back again at their pleasures, during this Cessation; as likewise to and from any other parts of his majesty's dominions, without any search, stay, or imprisonment of their persons, or seizure and detention of their goods or estates; and that all manner of trade, traffick, and commerce be free and open between all his majesty's subjects, excepting, as aforesaid, between the officers and soldiers of either army; or for arms, ammunition, money, bullion, or victuals, for the use of either army, without a pass or safe-conduct as aforesaid; which may be a good beginning to renew the trade and correspondence of the kingdom, and whereby his good subjects may be restored to the liberty and freedom they were born to, and have so happily enjoyed till these miserable distractions; and which, even during this war, his maj. hath, to his utmost, laboured to preserve; opening the way, by most strict Proclamations, to the passage of all commodities, even to the city of London itself. III. That his majesty's forces in Oxfordshire shall advance no nearer to Windsor than Wheatley; and, in Buckinghamshire, no nearer to Aylesbury than Brill; and that in Berkshire, the forces respectively shall not advance nearer the one to the other than they shall be at the day to be agreed upon for the Cessation to begin; and that the forces of the other army in Oxfordshire, shall advance no nearer to Oxford than Henley, and those in Buckinghamshire no nearer to Oxford than Aylesbury; and that the forces of neither army shall advance their quarters nearer to each other than they shall be upon the day agreed on for the Cessation to begin, otherwise than in passage and communication between their several quarters respectively, without any acts of hostility to each other; but may enlarge themselves within their own quarters respectively, as they shall find convenient. IV. That the forces of either army in Gloucestershire, Wiltshire, and Wales, as likewise in the cities of Gloucester and Bristol, and the castle and town of Berkley, shall be guided by the rule expressed in the latter part of the precedent Article. V. That in case it be pretended on either side, That the Cessation is violated, no act of hostility is immediately to follow; but first the party complaining is to acquaint the lord-general on the other side, and to allow 3 days, after notice, for satisfaction; and in case satisfaction be not given or accepted, then 5 days notice to be given before hostility begin; and the like to be observed in the remoter armies by the commanders in chief. VI. That all other forces in the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, not before mentioned, shall remain in the same quarters and places, as they are at the time of publishing this Cessation, otherwise than in passage and communication between their several quarters, as is mentioned in the latter part of the 3rd Article: and that this Cessation shall not extend to restrain the setting forth, or employing, any ships for the defence of his majesty's dominions; provided that his maj. be first acquainted with the particulars, and that such ships as shall be set forth be commanded by such persons as his maj. shall approve of. Lastly, "That, during the Cessation, none of his majesty's subjects be imprisoned, other-wise than according to the known laws of the land; and that there shall be no plundering or violence offered to any of his subjects. And his maj. is very willing, if there be any scruples made concerning these propositions and circumstances of the Cessation, that the committee for the Treaty, nevertheless, may immediately come hither, and so all matters concerning the Cessation may be here settled by him."

The King grants a Safe-Conduct to all the Parliament's Commissioners except the Lord Say.] At the same time came a letter of Safe-Conduct for all the parliament's commissioners, except the lord Say. The king's reasons for objecting to the last were, "That his lordship was excepted against, by name, in his Proclamation, at Oxford, of the 3d Nov. and by writ to the sheriff proclaimed then in that county; in which his majesty's intention is declared to proceed against him as a person guilty of high treason; and so falling to be within the case of sir John Evelyn, who, upon the same exception, was not admitted to attend his maj. with the rest of the committee, at Colebrooke, in Nov. last; yet his maj. did signify, that in case the house shall think fit to send any other person in the place of the lord Say, who is not included in the like exception, his maj. hath commanded all his officers, soldiers, and other subjects to suffer him as freely to pass and repass, as if his name had been particularly comprised in the Safe-Conduct."

With these objections to the lord Say came also the following Message relating to the Cessation:

"His majesty is content that his Proposition concerning the magazines, forts, ships, and revenue, and the Proposition of both houses for the disbanding of the armies, shall be first treated of, and agreed of before the proceeding to treat upon any of the other Propositions; and that, afterward, the second of his majesty's, and the second of theirs be treated on and agreed of, and so on in the same order; and that, from the beginning of the Treaty, the time may not exceed 20 days; in which, he hopes, a full peace and right understanding may be established throughout the kingdom."

After the reading of these matters in the house of lords, the lord Say stood up and said, "That he never heard of this Proclamation before; what he did was in obedience to the commands of the parliament, for the settling of the county of Oxford in quietness and security; and if he shall be proclaimed a person guilty of high treason, for doing his duty to the commands of parliament, it will be a case worthy their lordships consideration, as a thing which much concerns the privileges of parliament: but, for his part, rather than the Treaty and Cessation of arms, for obtaining a happy peace between the king and kingdom, should be hindered, he desired the lords to give him leave to attend this house, and dispeuse with his going on the service." But the lords, conceiving this precedent treached on the essential proceedings of parliament, left it freely to the lord Say, either to go or stay as he shall think proper."

The King's Articles of Cessation sent to the Earl of Essex.] March 7. A message came up from the commons, with their thoughts on the king's last Articles for a Cessation, "That since the parliament had, before, sent committees to consult with the lord-general about them, they think it fit that the same committee may be sent again to acquaint him with it, and desire his advice therein." Upon which the lords Fielding and Hunsdon were sent to the lord general for that purpose. On the 9th, these lords reported to the house the effect of their embassy to the earl of Essex, "That he had called a council of war to his assistance; and, upon due consideration of the king's Articles, they offered some inconveniences which might ensue by accepting the same."—A message was then sent to the commons, to communicate this Advice of the lord general to them, and to desire that the select committees of both houses, appointed to consider of the king's Answer touching the Articles of the Cessation, may meet and take this Paper, sent from my lord general, into consideration; and prepare what they conceive fit to be done thereupon.

The Commons receive Advice of Prince Rupert's intending to assault Bristol.] A message was this day brought from the commons, desiring a present conference, touching some intelligence they had received from their lord general; which was agreed to. The Speaker reported, "That, at this conference, the commons acquainted their lordships with letters received from sir Robert Cook, to let them know that prince Rupert is within 4 miles of Bristol, and intends to assault that city: upon this the lord general intends, to-morrow, to march out from Windsor with the whole army; but desires there might be some course taken to furnish and supply money and victuals; for the effecting hereof the commons have made some Votes, wherein they desire their lordships concurrence." The Votes were then read as follows: 1. "That this house doth approve of the lord general's resolutions to march; and that thanks be given unto him for his care of the safety of the kingdom. 2. That the lord mayor be desired, that a common council be called to meet to-morrow; and that a committee of both houses may go thither; and that a supply of money, and other assistance, may be propounded and desired for the important service of the army now to march." Both these Votes were agreed to by the lords. Next it was reported, "That the commons have received some letters from the North, by which it seems there is some difference amongst the officers which command in chief there; whereupon the commons have passed some Votes, wherein they desire their lordships concurrence, viz. 1. That letters be sent to the lord lieutenants and deputy lieutenants of the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, and Derby, to send what forces they can, with all convenient speed, to the lord Fairfax. 2. That the lord Fairfax shall be desired to go in person, if he can, with the best strength he hath, to the aid of capt. Hotham, in the East-Riding of York; if not, to send 1000 foot at least, or more, if he can spare them, to oppose the army under the command of the earl of Newcastle; and that the committee for the safety of the kingdom do prepare these letters." The lords agreed to both these Votes also.

The Parliament's Ships fire upon the Queen's Lodgings.] March 10. The lords were informed of a report that some ships, set out by the parliament, had shot at the house where the queen lodged, after she had landed at Bridlington, in Yorkshire, and had killed a man very near her majesty. Lord Clarendon gives us the following particulars of this affair: "About the middle of Feb. the queen took shipping from Holland, in a States man of war, assigned by the prince of Orange, with others for her convoy, and arrived safely in Bridlington bay, where she had the patience to stay on shipboard, at anchor, the space of two days, till the earl of Newcastle had notice to draw such part of his forces that way, as might secure her landing, and wait on her to York; which he no sooner did, but her maj. came on shore; and, for the present, was pleased to refresh herself in a convenient house upon the very key, where all accommodations were made for her reception. The second day after her landing, Batten, vice-admiral to the earl of Warwick, (who had waited to intercept her passage) with 4 of the king's ships, arrived in Bridlington road; and, finding that her maj. was landed, and that she lodged upon the key, bringing his ships to the nearest distance, being very early in the morning, discharged above 100 cannon (whereof many were laden with cross bar-shot) for the space of 2 hours upon the house where her majesty was lodged; whereupon she was forced out of her bed, some of the shot making way through her own chamber, and to shelter herself under a bank in the open fields; which barbarous and treasonable act, (says his lordship) was so much the more odious, in that the parliament never so far took notice of it as to disavow it."—This last circumstance is confirmed by the Lords Journals, in which we find, That though that house ordered, That the earl of Warwick be desired to examine the truth of this business, and certify it to their house, when their lordships would take it into further consideration; yet nothing more was done upon it: but we are told in the Commons Journals, That it being suspected the ships which brought over the queen, then lying before Bridlington, had some design upon Hull, a letter was ordered to be sent to the earl of Warwick, to send some ships from his squadron, which might prevent any mischief from that quarter. Her majesty shortly after removed to York, where she had been many weeks expected.

The Parliament's Articles for a Cessation as altered by Advice of the E. of Essex.] March 17. The Articles for a Cessation being finished and agreed to on both sides, they were ordered to be sent to the king by their commissioners, with full instructions how to act in this Treaty. The Articles for a Cessation, as altered by the Advice of the earl of Essex were as follows:

"The lords and commons in parliament, being still carried on with a vehement desire of peace, that so the kingdom may speedily be freed from the desolation and destruction wherewith it is like to be overwhelmed if the war should continue, have, with as much expedition as they could, considered of the Articles of Cessation, with those Alterations and Additions offered by his majesty, unto which they are ready to agree in such manner as is expressed in these ensuing Articles, viz. I. That all manner of arms, ammunition, victual, money, bullion, and all other commodities, passing without a Safe-Conduct from the generals of both armies, as well of his majesty's as of the armies raised by the parliament, may be stayed and seized on, as if no such Cessation were agreed on at all. II. That all manner of persons, passing without such a Safe-Conduct, shall be apprehended and detained, as if no such Cessation were agreed on at all. III. That his majesty's forces in Oxfordshire shall advance no nearer to Windsor than Wheatley; and, in Buckinghamshire, no nearer to Aylesbury than Brill; and that, in Berkshire, the forces respectively shall not advance nearer the one to the other than they shall be at the day to be agreed on for the Cessation to begin: and that the forces of the other army, raised by the parliament, shall advance no nearer to Oxford than Henley, and those in Buckinghamshire no nearer to Oxford than Aylesbury; and that the forces of neither army shall advance their quarters nearer to each other than they shall be upon the day agreed on for the Cessation to begin. IV. That the forces of either army in Gloucestershire, Wilts, and Wales, as likewise in the cities of Gloucester and Bristol, and the castle and town of Berkley, shall be guided by the rule expressed in the latter part of the preceding Article. V. That in case it be pretended on either side, That the Cessation is violated, no act of hostility is immediately to follow; but, first, the party complaining is to acquaint the lord general on the other side, and to allow 3 days after notice given for satisfaction; and, in case satisfaction be not given or accepted, then 5 days notice to be given before hostilities begin; and the like to be observed in the remoter armies by the commanders in chief. VI.

That all other forces in the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, not before-mentioned, shall remain in the same quarters and places as they are at the time of the publishing of this Cessation, and under the same conditions as are mentioned in the Articles before: and that this Cessation shall not extend to restrain the setting forth, or employing of, any ships for the defence of his majesty's dominions. VII. That as soon as his maj. shall be pleased to disband the armies, which both houses earnestly desire may be speedily effected, and to disarm the papists according to law; the subjects may then enjoy the benefit of peace in the liberty of their persons, goods, and freedom of trade; in the mean time, the generals and commanders of the armies of both sides shall be enjoined to keep the soldiers from plundering; which the two houses have ever disliked and forbidden. And for the speedy settling of this so much desired Peace, they have thought good to send their Committees with Instructions, That, if his maj. be pleased to consent to a Cessation, so limited and qualified, they may forthwith proceed to treat upon the Propositions; and because the time is so far elapsed in these preparations, they desire the Cessation may begin the 25th of this instant March, or sooner if it may be; and, in the mean time, notice to be given to all the forces in the several and remote parts; and the commanders, officers, and soldiers are enjoined to observe this Cessation accordingly; to which they hope and pray that God will give such a blessing, that thereupon, peace, safety, and happiness may be produced, and confirmed to his maj. and all his people."

INSTRUCTIONS, agreed on by the Lords and Commons in Parliament, for Algernon earl of Northumberland, William lord Viscount Say and Sele, Wm. Pierpoint, esq. sir William Armin, bart. sir John Holland, bart. and Bulstrode Whitlocke, esq. Committees appointed to attend his Majesty upon the Propositions made by his Majesty to the Parliament, and likewise upon the other Propositions humbly presented from them to his Majesty:

"I. You shall present to his majesty the Articles agreed on for the Cessation of Arms, humbly desiring his majesty to ratify and confirm the same under the great seal; which being obtained, you are to send it up to the parliament with all possible speed: and shall likewise beseech the king to dispatch away messengers to the generals, commanders, and soldiers of all his armies and forces, with a strict command and injunction, that they observe those Articles of Cessation, according as they are agreed upon; as the two houses likewise intend to give the like direction to the lord general of the armies raised for their defence. II. After his maj. hath declared and ratified the Cessation, you shall then proceed to the Treaty, beginning with the first Proposition on his majesty's behalf, concerning his majesty's own revenue, his magazines, towns, forts, and ships, and thereunto make this Answer: You shall declare, That the two houses of parliament have not made use of his majesty's own revenue, but in a very small proportion; which, for a good part, hath been employed in the maintenance of his majesty's children, according to the allowance established by himself; and they will satisfy what shall remain due to his maj. of those sums received out of his majesty's own revenues, and shall leave the same to his maj. for the time to come. And you likewise shall propound to his majesty, That he will restore what hath been taken for his use, upon any of the bills assigned to other purposes by several acts of parliament, or out of the provision made for the war of Ireland:—That they will remove the Garrisons out of all towns and forts in their hands, wherein there were no garrisons before these troubles, and slight all fortifications made since that time; which towns and forts, it is to be agreed on both parts, shall continue in the same condition they were in before; and that those garrisons shall not be renewed, nor the fortifications repaired, without consent of his maj. and both houses of Parliament: That for those Town and Ports which are within the jurisdiction of the Cinque-Ports, they shall be delivered up into the hands of such a noble person as his maj. shall appoint to be Warden of the Cinque-Ports, being such a one as they shall confide in: That the Town of Portsmouth shall be reduced to the number of the garrison, as was at the time when the lords and commons undertook the custody thereof: and such other forts, castles, and towns as were formerly kept by garrisons, as have been taken by them into their care and custody since the beginning of these troubles, shall be reduced to such proportion of garrison as they had in the year 1636, and shall be so continued: and that all the said towns, forts, and castles shall be delivered up into the hands of such persons of quality and trust, to be likewise nominated by his majesty, as the two houses shall confide in: That the Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and all governors and commanders of towns, castles, and forts, shall keep the same towns, castles, and forts respectively, for the service of his maj. and the safety of the kingdom; and that they shall not admit into any of them any foreign forces raised without his majesty's authority and consent of the two houses, and they shall use their uttermost endeavours to suppress all forces whatsoever, raised without such authority and consent; and they shall seize all arms and ammunition provided for any such forces:—That the Ships shall be delivered into the charge of such a noble person as his maj. shall nominate to be lord high admiral of England, and the two houses confide in; who shall receive the same office by letters patent quamdiu bene se gesserit; and shall have power to nominate and appoint all subordinate commanders and officers, and have all other powers appertaining to the office of high admiral; which ships he shall employ for the defence of the kingdom against all foreign forces whatsoever, and for the safeguard of merchants, securing of trade, the guarding of Ireland, and the intercepting of all supplies to be carried to the rebels; and shall use his uttermost endeavour to suppress all forces which shall be raised by any person without his majesty's authority, and consent of the lords and commons in parliament; and shall seize all arms and ammunition provided for supply of any such forces: That all the arms and ammunition, taken out of his majesty's magazines, which shall remain in their hands, shall be delivered into his stores; and whatsoever shall be wanting, they will, in convenient time, supply in kind, according to the proportions which they have received; and that the persons, to whose charge those public magazines shall be committed, being nominated by his maj. shall be such as the lords and commons shall confide in. And you shall propound to his maj. That he will restore all such arms and ammunition as have been taken for his use, from the several counties, cities, and towns.—III. To the Proposition made by the two houses, concerning the Disbanding of the Armies, you shall humbly desire his majesty's speedy and positive Answer; unto which if he shall be pleased to give his assent, you shall then beseech his majesty, in the name of both houses, that a near day may be agreed upon for the disbanding all the forces in the remote parts of Yorkshire, and the other Northern counties; as also in Lancashire, Cheshire, and in the dominion of Wales, and in Cornwall and Devonshire; and they being fully disbanded, another day may be agreed on for the disbanding of all forces in Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, and all other places except at Oxford and the quarters thereunto belonging, and Windsor and the quarters thereunto belonging; and that, last of all, a speedy day be appointed for the disbanding those two armies at Oxford and Windsor, and all the forces members of either of them:—That some officers of both armies may speedily meet to agree of the manner of the Disbanding; and that fit persons may be appointed by his maj. and the parliament, who may repair to the several armies, and see the disbanding put in speedy execution accordingly:—That his maj. do likewise remove the Garrisons out of Newcastle, and all other towns, castles, and forts, where any garrisons have been placed by him since these troubles; and that the fortifications be likewise slighted, and the towns and forts left in such state and condition as they were in the year 1636: and That all other Towns, Forts, and Castles, where there have been formerly garrisons before these troubles, be committed to the charge of such persons, to be nominated by his majesty, as the parliament shall confide in, and under such instructions as are formerly mentioned.—IV. That if his maj. shall be pleased to assent to these Propositions, concerning the towns, forts, castles, magazines, and ships, that then his maj. be humbly intreated to name persons of quality to receive the charge of the several offices and forts, castles and towns, to be forthwith certified to the two houses, that thereupon they may express their confidence in those persons, or humbly beseech his maj. to name others; none of which persons shall be removed, during 3 years next ensuing, without just cause, to be approved by parliament; and if any be so removed, or shall die within the said space, the person to be put into the same office shall be such as both houses shall confide in:—That all Generals and Commanders in any of the armies, on either side, as likewise the lord admiral of England, the lord warden of the Cinque-Ports, all commanders of any ships, and commanders of any town, castle, or fort, shall take an oath to observe these Articles aforementioned; and to use their uttermost power to preserve the true reformed Protestant religion, and the peace of the kingdom, against all foreign force, and all other forces raised without his majesty's authority and consent of the two houses.—V. You shall move his majesty, That for the better dispatch of the Treaty, and the free intercourse of Instructions and Advertisements betwixt the two houses of parliament and the committee, that there may be a free pass of messengers to and from the parliament and the committees, without search or interruption; and his majesty's safe-conduct to be obtained to that effect, to such persons as are, or shall be, appointed for that service, viz. Mr. John Rushworth, Mr. Michael Welden, Mr. John Corbet of Gray's Inn, and Mr. James Standish."

Letters from the Commissioners at Oxford, to the Parliament.] March 23. The lords read a Letter from the earl of Northumberland to the Speaker, in these words:

"My lord; As soon as we came hither, between 4 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon, we sent to know his majesty's pleasure when we should wait on him, who commanded us presently to attend him, which we did in the garden at Christ-Church; where I read the Articles for the Cessation, and we humbly presented them to the king, who read the title of them himself, and said, 'There was a difference in them from the Articles which he sent to both houses; and told us, before he should be many hours older, he would give his Answer to them;' Your lordship's, &c. A. NORTHUMBERLAND. Oxford, March 19. 1642."

Besides the foregoing, there was another Letter from this earl, of a later date, read the same day, directed as before:

"My lord; This afternoon my lord Falkland and Mr. Secretary Nicholas came to us, with a Message from his majesty, to know 'Whether, in case he would not agree to the Articles of Cessation, in terminis, that we had any commission to proceed in the Treaty upon the Propositions?' I answered, 'We had not.' The council have met often, and sat long, since the delivery of the Articles of Cessation. Mr.

May came to us from his majesty, and said he was sent with a Message to both houses of parliament; the contents he was commanded to let us know, which were, 'That his maj. desired free trade with the limitations he formerly sent; and that there might be a Cessation by sea as well as by land. That, because there might be a misunderstanding of expressions, we might have power to treat on the Articles of Cessation; if not, That the Treaty, upon the Propositions, might go on without a Cessation; and that all prisoners taken in war, except officers, might be set at liberty.' This is the information he gave us. Your lordships, &c. A. NORTHUMBERLAND. Oxford, March 22, 1642."

The King's Exceptions to the Parliament's last Articles of Cessation.] These Letters being produced at a conference, they were found to correspond, verbatim, with others the commons had received from their commissioners at Oxford. At this conference, also, a letter was read, directed to the Speaker of the house of lords, from the lord Falkland, in which was inclosed a Message from the king, to both houses, concerning the Cessation, dated at Oxford, March 22, in these words:

"C. R. His majesty hath immediately, upon the irarrival, admitted the committee sent to him from both houses of parliament, (as the messengers of peace) to his royal presence, and received the Articles of Cessation brought by them; which are, in effect, the same his maj. formerly excepted to, though their expression in the preface to these Articles, of their readiness to agree to those Alterations and Additions offered by his majesty, in such manner as is expressed, made him expect to have found, at least, some of the real Alterations and Additions made by him admitted; which he doth not discover. I. His majesty desired, 'That provision might be made, and licence given to his good subjects, for their freedom of Trade, Traffick, and Commerce, (though, in matters which concerned himself more immediately, as in arms, ammunition, money, bullion, and victuals for the use of his army, and the passage of all officers and soldiers of his army, he is contented the restraint should be in such manner as was proposed) of which his maj. is so tender, that as he hath provided for the same by his gracious Proclamations, so he doth daily release and discharge such merchandize and commodities, as are, contrary to those Proclamations stayed by any of his majesty's forces.—To this Freedom and Liberty of his good subjects, there is not the least admission given by these Articles; so that they have not any ease or benefit by this Cessation; which his maj. desires both houses to consider of; and whether, if his maj. should take the same course to stop and interrupt the trade of the kingdom, as the other army doth, a general loss and calamity would not seize upon his good subjects? II. His majesty, to the end that a full Cessation might be as well at sea as at land, and he might be secured that the ships, proposed to be set forth for the defence of his majesty's dominions, should be employed only to that end and purpose, desired, 'That they might be put under the command of persons to be approved of by his majesty;' which is not consented to by these Articles; but their former, to which his maj. excepted, strictly and entirely insisted on; by which (besides that part of hostility remains) the conveying of any number of forces from one part to any other, by that means, remains free to them. III. For the prevention of any inconveniences which might arise upon real differences, or mistakes upon latitude of expression: (as if his majesty should now consent to these Articles proposed, in the terms proposed, he must confess the army, of which he complains, to be raised by the parliament; and either himself to be no part of the parliament, or himself to have raised that army) and for prevention of that delay which he foresaw could not otherwise be avoided, if, upon every difference, the question must be remitted to London, his maj. desired, 'That the committee, for whom he then sent a safe-conduct, might have liberty to debate any such difference and expressions, and reconcile the same, that all possible expedition might be used to the main Treaty.'—In this point of so high concernment, no power is given in these Articles; and the committee confessed to his maj. they have no power given, but are strictly and precisely bound to the very words of the Articles now sent; and that, before these are consented to by us, they cannot enter into any Treaty concerning the other Propositions. IV. His maj. desired, 'That during the Cessation, none of his good subjects might be imprisoned, otherwise than according to the known laws of the land.'—This is in no degree consented to, but the privilege and liberty, to which they were born, reserved from them till the disbanding of both armies, though they are no part of either army; and so have no benefit by this Cessation. V. His maj. desired, 'That, during this Cessation, there should be no plundering or violence offered to any of his subjects.' In the Answer to which, his desire against violence is not at all taken notice of, nor is his desire again plundering anywise satisfied; his majesty, not only intending by it the robbing of the subject by the unruliness of the uncommanded soldier (which their clause of requiring 'the generals and officers to keep them from it,' seems to imply; and the assertion, 'That the two houses had ever disliked and forbidden it,' declares plainly to be their only meaning) but particularly the violence and plunderings used to his subjects, by forcibly taking away their goods for not submitting to Impositions and Taxes required from them by Orders or Ordinances of one or both houses of parliament, which are contrary to the known laws of the land. VI. Besides, that there is no consent given to those Alterations and Additions offered by his maj. whatsoever is pretended; for where an absolute consent may be supposed, because the very words of his majesty's Article are wholly preserved, yet, by reason of the relation to somewhat going before that is varied by them, the sense of those words is wholly varied too; as in the fourth Article, where the part of the third Article, to which that did refer, is wholly left out: so that, upon the matter, all the Propositions made by his maj. which did not in terms agree with those presented to him, are utterly rejected.—For these Reasons, and that this entrance towards a blessed Peace and Accommodation, which hath already filled the hearts of the kingdom with joy and hope, may be improved to the wished end, his maj. desires, That the committee now sent may speedily have liberty to treat, debate, and agree upon the Articles of Cessation; in which they and all the world shall find, that his maj. is less solicitous for his own dignity and greatness, than for his subjects ease and liberty: and he doubts not, upon such a debate, all differences concerning the Cessation will be easily and speedily agreed upon: and the benefit of a Cessation be continued and confirmed to his people by a speedy disbanding of both armies, and a sudden and firm Peace, which his maj. above all things desires. If this so reasonable, equal, and just desire of his maj. shall not be yielded unto, but the same Articles still insisted upon: though his maj. next to Peace, desires a Cessation; yet that the not agreeing upon the one, may not destroy the hopes of, nor so much as delay, the other, he is willing however to treat (even without a Cessation, if that be not granted) upon the Propositions themselves, in that order as is agreed upon, and desires the committee here may be enabled to that effect; in which Treaty he shall give all his subjects that satisfaction, That if any security to enjoy all the rights, privileges, and liberties due to them by the law; or that happiness in church and state, which the best times have seen; with such farther acts of grace as may agree with his honour, justice, and duty to his crown, and as may not render him less able to protect his subjects, according to his oath, will satisfy them, he is confident, in the mercy of God, that no more precious blood of this nation will be thus miserably spent."

Resolutions of both Houses thereupon.]
March 24. Another conference was held concerning this affair; the result of which was, That the commons communicated to the lords some Resolutions, which they had made concerning the king's last Message; wherein there was an offer to treat upon the Propositions, in case the Cessation was not agreed on, to which they desired their lordships concurrence. The Resolutions were as follows: 1. That the Committee at Oxford shall have power to treat and debate with his majesty upon the two first Propositions, according to their Instructions, for 4 days after the day of the receipt of this Message, notwithstanding that the Cessation be not yet agreed upon. 2. That the Committee, formerly appointed to prepare the Articles of Cessation and Instructions for the Committee at Oxford, shall consider of an Answer to be made to his majesty's Message this day received; and likewise prepare Reasons to be sent to the committee, for them to press the Treaty, and debate the former Articles of Cessation; and to shew his majesty the grounds why the houses cannot depart from those former Articles."

The Parliament's Message to the King in consequence thereof.] For the present, the Parliament thought proper to send the following Message to the king; and the Additional Instructions to their commissioners. And first the Message:

"May it please your majesty; We your loyal subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, having received a Message from your majesty; in which you are pleased to express yourself not to be satisfied with the Articles of Cessation, presented unto you by our committee now attending you at Oxford, and yet a signification of your majesty's willingness to treat upon the Propositions themselves, even without a Cessation; do, with all humbleness, give our consent that our committee shall have power to treat and debate with your maj. upon the two first Propositions according to their Instructions, for 4 days after the day of the receipt of this Message, notwithstanding that the Cessation be not yet agreed upon; that, as much as in us lies, there may be no delay in the proceedings, for the obtaining of a blessed peace, and the healing up the miserable breaches of this distracted kingdom; and do purpose to represent, very speedily, unto your majesty those just Reasons and Grounds, upon which we have found it necessary to desire of your majesty a Cessation, so qualified as that is; whereby we hope you will receive such satisfaction, as that you will be pleased to assent unto it; and being obtained, we assure ourselves it will be most effectual to the safety of the kingdom; and that peace, which, with so much zeal and loyal affection to your royal person, and in a deep sense of the bleeding condition of this poor kingdom, we humbly beg of your majesty's justice and goodness."—The Additional Instructions were as follows:

"My lord* and gentlemen; Whereas, by your former Instructions, your are tied up to a circumstance of time, and are not to proceed unto the Treaty upon the Propositions, until the Cessation of Arms be first agreed upon: you are now authorized and required, as you may perceive by the Votes of both Houses which you shall herewith receive, to treat and debate with his majesty upon the two first Propositions, according to those Instructions, for four days after the day of the receipt hercof, notwithstanding that the Cessation be not agreed upon. March 24, 1642."

* The reason of this address being 'My lord,' and not 'My lords,' was because the lord Say did not go; and the house, lest they should be thought to countenance the king's objection, would not appoint another in his stead.

Lord Clarendon's and Mr. Whitlocke's Account of what passed between the King and the Commissioners at Oxford.] We have already given the initial forms for the constituting this Treaty: and shall now present the reader with the Account of this unsuccessful Negotiation, as drawn up by those two contemporary and opposite historians, the earl of Clarendon and Mr. Whitlocke; the former of whom was, at this time, attending the king's service at Oxford; and the latter employed, as himself tells us, by his brother-commissioners in drawing up all their papers to the king, which were afterwards transcribed by their secretaries. And, first, lord Clarendon:

"When the Treaty was first consented to by the two houses, they ordered that it should be upon the first Proposition made by his majesty, and the first Proposition made by themselves; and that those should be first concluded on, before they proceeded to treat upon any of the other Propositions: so that the committee, in the first place, applied themselves to his majesty, upon his own first Proposition, which was, 'That his own revenue, magazines, towns, forts, and ships, which had been taken or kept from him by force, should be forthwith restored to him.' To which the committee answered, 'That the two houses had made use of his majesty's own revenue but in a very small proportion, which in a good part had been employed in the maintenance of his children, according to the allowance established by himself: and the houses would satisfy what should remain due to his maj. of those sums which they had received; and would leave the same to him for the time to come. And they desired likewise, that his maj. would restore what had been taken for his use upon any of the bills, assigned to other purposes by several acts of parliament, or out of the provision made for the war of Ireland: that all the arms and ammunition, taken out of his magazines, should be delivered into his stores, and whatsoever should be wanting they would supply in kind, according to the proportions they had received; but they proposed the persons, to whose charge those public magazines should be committed, being nominated by his majesty, might be such as the two houses might confide in; and that his maj. would restore all such arms and ammunition, as had been taken for his use, from the several counties, cities, and towns.—That the two houses would remove the garrisons out of all towns and forts in their hands, wherein there were no garrisons before these troubles, and slight all fortifications made since that time, and those towns and forts to continue in the same condition they were in before; and that those garrisons should not be renewed, or the fortifications repaired, without consent of his maj. and both houses: that the towns and forts, which were within the jurisdiction of the Cinque-Ports, should be delivered into the hands of such a noble person as the king should appoint to be warden of the Cinque-Ports, being such a one as they should confide in: that Portsmouth should be reduced to the number of the garrison, as was at that time when the lords and commons undertook the custody of it; and that all other forts, castles, and towns, in which garrisons had been kept, and had been, since the beginning of these troubles, taken into their care and custody, should be reduced to the same establishment they had in 1636, and should be so continued; and that all those towns, forts, and castles should be delivered up into the hands of such persons of quality and trust, to be likewise nominated by his majesty, as the two houses should confide in: that the warden of the Cinque-Ports, and all governors and commanders of towns, castles, and forts, should keep the same, respectively, for the service of his majesty, and the safety of the kingdom; and that they should not admit into them any foreign forces, or any other forces raised without his majesty's authority, and consent of the two houses; and they should use their utmost endeavour to suppress all forces whatsoever raised without such authority and consent; and they should seize all arms and ammunition provided for any such forces.—They likewise proposed to the king, that he would remove the garrison out of Newcastle, and all other towns, castles, and forts where any garrisons had been placed by him since these troubles; and that the fortifications might be likewise slighted, and the towns and forts left in such state as they were in 1636; and that all other towns and castles in his hands, wherein there had been formerly garrisons, might be committed to such persons, nominated by him, as the houses should confide in, and under such instructions as were formerly mentioned; and that the new garrisons should not be renewed, or the fortifications repaired, without the consent of the king and both houses: that the ships should be delivered into the charge of such a noble person as the king should nominate to be lord high admiral of England, and the two houses confide in; who should receive that office by letters patent, quamdiu se bene gesserit, and should have power to nominate and appoint all subordinate commanders and officers, and have all other powers appertaining to the office of high admiral; which ships he should employ for the defence of the kingdom, against all foreign forces whatsoever, and for the safeguard of merchants, securing of trade, and the guarding of Ireland, and the intercepting of all supplies to be carried to the rebels; and should use his utmost endeavours to suppress all forces which should be raised by any person without his majesty's authority, and consent of the lords and commons; and should seize all arms and ammunition provided for supply of any such forces."—To this Answer, by which they required, at least, to go whole sharers with him in his sovereignty, the king replied, 'That he knew not what proportion of his revenue had been made use of by his two houses, but he had reason to believe, if much of it had not been used, very much remained still in their hands; his whole revenue being so stopped and seized on, by the Orders of one or both houses, even to the taking of his money out of his Exchequer and Mint, and bonds forced from his cofferer's clerk, for the provisions of his household, that very little had come to his use for his own support; but he would be well contented to allow whatsoever had been employed in the maintenance of his children, and to receive the arrears due to himself, and to be sure of his own for the future. He was likewise willing to restore all monies taken for his use, by any authority from him, upon any bills assigned to other purposes, being assured he had received very little, or nothing, that way: and he expected, likewise, that satisfaction should be made by them for all those several vast sums received and diverted to other purposes, by Orders of one or both houses, which ought to have been paid, by the act of pacification, to his subjects of Scotland, or employed for the discharge of the debts of the kingdom; or, by other acts of parliament, for the relief of his poor protestant subjects in Ireland.—For what concerned his Magazines, he was content that all the arms and ammunition, taken out of his magazines, which did remain in the hands of both houses, or of persons employed by them, should be, as soon as the Treaty was concluded, delivered into the Tower of London; and that whatsoever should be wanting of the proportions taken by them, should be supplied by them, with all convenient speed, in kind; which, he said, should be committed to, and continued in, the custody of the sworn officers, to whose places the same belonged: and if any of those officers had already forfeited, or hereafter should forfeit, that trust, by any misdemeanors, his maj. would by no means defend them from the justice of the law: that he always intended to restore such arms and ammunition, which he had been compelled to take from any persons and places, when his own had been taken from him; and would make them recompence as soon as his own stores were restored to him.—To whatsoever they proposed for the slighting all Fortifications, and reducing all Garrisons which had been made since the beginning of the troubles, and leaving them in the state they were before, the king fully and absolutely consented; and that the old castles and garrisons should be reduced to their antient proportion and establishment; but, for the governors and commanders of them, he said, That the Cinque-Ports were already in the custody of a noble person, against whom he knew no just exception; and who had such a legal interest therein, that he could not, with justice, remove him from it, until some sufficient cause were made appear to him; but he was very willing, if he should at any time be found guilty of any thing that might make him unworthy of that trust, that he might be proceeded against according to the rules of justice: that the government of Portsmouth, and all other forts, castles, and towns, as were formerly kept by garrisons, should be put into the hands of such persons, against whom no just exceptions could be made; all of them being, before these troubles, by letters patent, granted to several persons, against any of whom he knew not any exceptions, who should be removed, if just cause should be given for the same. The Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and all other governors and commanders of the towns and castles, should keep their charges, as by the law they ought to do, and for the king's service, and safety of the kingdom; and they should not admit into any of them foreign forces, or other forces, raised or brought in to them contrary to law, but should use their utmost endeavours to suppress such forces; and should seize all arms and ammunition, which, by the laws and statutes of the kingdom, they ought to seize.—To that part which concerned the Ships, the King told them, 'That he expected his own ships should be delivered to him, as by the law they ought to be; and that when he should think fit to nominate a lord high admiral of England, it should be such a person against whom no just exception could be made; and if any should be, he would always leave him to his due trial and examination; and he would grant his office to him by such letters patent, as had been used. In the mean time he would govern the admiralty by commission, as had been in all times accustomed; and whatsoever ships should be set out by him, or his authority, should be employed for the defence of the kingdom against all foreign forces whatsoever, for the safeguard of merchants, securing of trade, guarding of Ireland, and the intercepting of all supplies to be carried to the rebels; and they should use their utmost endeavours to suppress all forces which should be raised, by any person whatsoever, against the laws and statutes of the kingdom; and to seize all arms and ammunition provided for the supply of any such forces.'—It is evident to all men where the difference now lay between them, being, Whether the king would reserve the disposal of those offices and places of trust to himself, (which all kings had enjoyed, and was indeed a part of his regality) or Whether he would be content with such a nomination, as, being to pass, and depend upon their approbation, no man should ever be admitted to them, who was nominated by him. The committee, upon his majesty's Answer, desired to know, 'Whether he did intend, that both houses should express their confidence of the persons, to whose trust those places were to be committed; for that they were directed by their Instructions, that, if his maj. was pleased to assent thereunto, and to nominate persons of quality to receive the charge of them, that they should certify it to both houses; that thereupon they might express their confidence in those persons, or humbly desire his maj. to name others, none of which persons to be removed during 3 years next ensuing, without just cause to be approved by both houses; and if any should be so removed, or die within that space, the persons, to be put in their places, to be such, as the two houses should confide in.—The King answered, 'That he did not intend that the houses should express their confidence of the persons, to whose trusts those places should be committed, but only that they should have liberty, upon any just exception, to proceed against any such persons according to law; his maj. being resolved not to protect them against the public justice. When any of the places should be void, he well knew the nomination and free election of those who should succeed, to be a right belonging to, and inherent in, his majesty; and having been enjoyed by all his royal progenitors, he could not believe his well-affected subjects desired to limit him in that right; and desired they would be satisfied with this Answer, or give him any reasons to alter his resolution, and he would comply with them.'—They told him, 'There could be no good and firm peace hoped for, if there were not a cure found out for the Fears and Jealousies; and they knew none sure, but this which they had proposed.'—The King replied, 'That he rather expected Reasons grounded upon law, to have shewed him, by the law, that he had not that right he pretended, or that they had a right superior to his, in what was now in question; or that they would have shewed him some legal reason, why the persons trusted by him were incapable of such a trust, than that they would only have insisted upon Fears and Jealousies; of which as he knew no ground, so he must be ignorant of the cure. That the argument they used might extend to the depriving him of, or at least sharing with him in, all his just regal power; since power, as well as forces, might be the object of Fears and Jealousies; and there would be always a power left to hurt, whilst there was any left to protect and defend.' He told them, 'If he had as much inclination, as he had more right, to Fears and Jealousies, he might, with more reason, have insisted upon an addition of power, as a security to enable him to keep his forts when he had them; since it appeared it was not so great, but that they had been able to take them from him, than they to make any difficulty to restore them to him in the same case they were before. But, he said, as he was himself content with, so, he took God to witness, his greatest desire was to observe always and maintain, the law of the land; and expected the same from his subjects; and believed the mutual observance of that rule, and neither of them to fear what the law feared not, to be, on both parts, a better means to establish a happy and perpetual peace, than for him to divest himself of those trusts, which the law of the land had settled in the crown alone, to preserve the power and dignity of the prince, for the better protection of the subject and of the law, and to avoid those dangerous distractions, which the interest of any sharers with him would have infallibly produced.'—The Committee neither offered to answer his Majesty's Reasons, nor to oppose other Reasons to weigh against them; but only said, 'That they were commanded, by their Instructions, to insist upon the desires of both houses formerly expressed.'—To which the King made no other Answer, than 'That he conceived it all the justice in the world for him to insist, That what was, by law, his own, and had been, contrary to law, taken from him, should be fully restored to him, without conditioning to impose any new limitations upon him, or his ministers, which were not formerly required from them by the law; and he thought it most unreasonable, to be pressed to diminish his own just rights himself, because others had violated and usurped them.' This was the sum of what passed in the Treaty upon that Proposition.—To the first Proposition of the two houses, 'That his majesty would be pleased to disband his armies, as they likewise would be ready to disband all their forces, which they had raised, and that he would be pleased to return to his parliament.' The King answered, 'That he was as ready and willing that all armies should be disbanded, as any person whatsoever; and conceived the best way to it, would be a happy and speedy conclusion of the present Treaty; which, if both houses would contribute as much as he would do to it, would be suddenly effected. And as he desired nothing more than to be with his two houses, so he would repair thither as soon as he could possibly do it with his honour and safety.' The Committee asked him, 'If by a happy and speedy conclusion of the present Treaty, he intended a conclusion upon the two first Propositions, or a conclusion of the Treaty in all the Propositions of both parts?' The King, who well knew it would be very ungracious to deny the disbanding of the armies, till all the Propositions were agreed, some whereof would require much time, answered, 'That he intended such a conclusion of, or in, the Treaty, as there might be a clear evidence to himself, and his subjects, of a future peace, and no ground left for the continuance or growth of those bloody dissensions; which, he doubted not, might be obtained, if both houses will consent that the Treaty should proceed without farther interruption, or limitation of days.'—They asked him, 'What he intended should be a clear evidence to him, and his good subjects, of a future peace, and no ground left for the continuance and growth of those bloody dissensions?' His majesty told them, 'If the conclusion of the present Treaty upon his first Proposition, and the first Proposition of both houses, should be so full and perfectly made, that the law of the land might have a full, free, and uninterrupted course, for the defence and preservation of the rights of his majesty, and of themselves, and the rest of his subjects, there would be thence a clear evidence to him, and all men, of a future peace; and it would be such a conclusion as he intended, never meaning that both armies should remain undisbanded until the Propositions on both sides were fully concluded.—To the other clause of their own Proposition, concerning the King's Return to the Parliament, they said, 'They had no Instructions to treat upon it;' which the king much wondered at; and finding that they had no other authority to treat, or debate what was necessary to be done in order to disbanding, but only to press him to appoint a day for the actual disbanding; and that the forces in the North, where he had a great army, and they had none, might be first disbanded, he endeavoured to draw them to some Propositions upon his return to the parliament; from whence expedients would naturally result, if they pursued that heartily, which would conclude a general peace. And it seemed very strange, that, after so many discourses of the king's absence from the houses, from whence they had taught the people to believe that most of the present evils flowed and proceeded, when a Treaty was now entered upon, and that was a part of their own first Proposition, that their committee should have no instructions or authority to treat upon it. After this they received new Instructions, 'To declare to his majesty the desire of both houses, for his coming to his parliament; which, they said, they had often expressed with full offers of security to his royal person, agreeable to their duty and allegiance, and they knew no cause why he might not repair thither with honour and safety.'—When the King found he could not engage them in that argument to make any particular overture or invitation to him; and that the committee, who expressed willingness enough, had not in truth the least power to promote, or contribute to an accommodation, lest they should make the people believe that he had a desire to continue the war, because he consented not to their Proposition of Disbanding the Armies, he sent this Message, by an express of his own, to the two houses, after he had first communicated it to their committee:

"To shew to the whole world, how earnestly his majesty longs for peace, and that no success shall make him desire the continuance of his army to any other end, or for any longer time, than that; and until things may be so settled, as that the law may have a full, free, and uninterrupted course, for the defence and preservation of the rights of his majesty, both houses, and his good subjects: 1. As soon as his majesty is satisfied in his first Proposition, concerning his own Revenue, Magazines, Ships, and Forts, in which he desires nothing, but that the just, known, legal rights of his majesty (devolved to him from his progenitors) and of the persons trusted by him, which have violently been taken from both, be restored unto him, and unto them; unless any just and legal exception against any of the persons trusted by him (which are yet unknown to his majesty)

can be made appear unto him: 2. As soon as all the members of both houses shall be restored to the same capacity of sitting and voting in parliament, as they had upon the 1st of Jan. 1641; the same, of right, belonging unto them by their birth-rights, and the free election of those that sent them; and having been voted from them for adhering to his maj. in these distractions; his maj. not intending that this should extend either to the Bishops, whose votes have been taken away by bill, or to such, in whose places, upon new writs, new elections have been made: 3. As soon as his majesty, and both houses, may be secured from such tumultuous assemblies, as, to the great breach of the privileges, and the high dishonour of parliaments, have formerly assembled about both houses, and awed the members of the same; and occasioned two several complaints from the lords house, and two several desires of that house to the commons, to join in a Declaration against them; the complying with which desire might have prevented all these miserable distractions which have ensued; which security, his maj. conceives, can be only settled by adjourning the parliament to some other place, at the least 20 miles from London, the choice of which his majesty leaves to both houses:—His majesty will, most chearfully and readily, consent that both armies be immediately disbanded, and give a present meeting to both his houses of parliament at the time and place, at, and to which, the parliament shall be agreed to be adjourned: his majesty being most confident that the law will then recover due credit and estimation; and that upon a free debate, in a full and peaceable convention of parliament, such provisions will be made against seditious preaching and printing against his majesty, and the established laws, which have been one of the chief causes of the present distractions; and such care will be taken concerning the legal and known rights of his majesty, and the property and liberty of his subjects, that whatsoever hath been published or done, in or by colour of any illegal Declaration, Ordinance, or Order of one or both houses, or any committee of either of them, and particularly the power to raise arms without his majesty's consent, will be in such manner recalled, disclaimed, and provided against, that no seed will remain for the like to spring out of for the future, to disturb the peace of the kingdom, and to endanger the very being of it. And in such a convention his maj. is resolved, by his readiness to consent to whatsoever shall be proposed to him, by bill, for the real good of his subjects (and particularly for the better discovery, and speedier conviction of Recusants; for the Education of the children of Papists by Protestants in the Protestant religion; for the prevention of practices of Papists against the state, and the due execution of the laws, and true levying of the penalties against them) to make known to all the world, how causeless those Fears and Jealousies have been, which have been raised against him; and by that so distracted this miserable kingdom. And if this offer of his maj. be not consented to (in which he asks nothing for which there is not apparent justice on his side, and in which he defers many things highly concerning both himself and people, till a full and peaceable convention of parliament, which in justice he might now require) his maj. is confident, that it will then appear to all the world, not only who is most desirous of peace, and whose fault it is that both armies are not now disbanded; but who have been the true and first cause that this peace was ever interrupted, or those armies raised, and the beginning or continuance of the war; and the destruction and desolation of this poor kingdom (which is too likely to ensue) will not, by the most interested, passionate, or prejudicate person, be imputed to his majesty."

"To this Message the two houses returned no Answer to the king, but required the committee to return to Westminster (having been in Oxford with his majesty just 20 days) with such positive circumstances, that the house of commons enjoined their members to begin their journey the same day, which they obeyed; though it was so late, that they were forced to very inconvenient accommodations; and, at their return, some of them were looked upon with great jealousy, as persons engaged by the king, and disinclined to the parliament; and this jealousy prevailed so far, that Mr. Martin opened a letter from the earl of Northumberland to his own lady, presuming he should therein have discovered some combination; and this insolence was not disliked."

Mr. Whitlocke's Account of what passed between the King and the abovementioned Committee of Parliament, at Oxford, is as follows:

"The king used the commissioners with great favour and civility; and his general, Ruthen, and divers of his lords and officers came frequently to their table, and they had very friendly discourses and treatments together. The king himself did them the honour sometimes to accept of part of their wine and provisions, which the earl of Northumberland sent to him, when they had any thing extraordinary. Their Instructions were very strict, and tied them up to treat with none but the king himself, whom they often attended at his lodgings in Christ-Church: they had access at all times when they desired it, and were allowed by his maj. a very free debate with him. He had commonly waiting on him, when he treated with them, prince Rupert, the lord keeper Littleton, the earl of Southampton, the lord chief justice Banks, and several other lords of his council, who never debated any matters with them; but gave their opinions to the king in those things which he demanded of them, and sometimes would put the king in mind of some particular things; but otherwise they did not speak at all. In this Treaty the king manifested his great parts and abilities, strength of reason, and quickness of apprehension, with much patience in hearing what was objected against him; wherein he allowed all freedom, and would himself sum up the arguments, and give a most clear judgment upon them. His unhappiness was, That he had a better opinion of others judgments than of his own, though they were weaker than his own; and of this the parliament's commissioners had experience to their great trouble. They were often waiting on the king, and debating some points of the Treaty with him until midnight, before they could come to a conclusion. Upon one of the most material points they pressed his maj. with their Reasons, and best arguments they could use, to grant what they desired. The king said, 'He was fully satisfied, and promised to give them his Answer in writing, according to their desire; but, because it was then past midnight, and too late to put it into writing, he would have it drawn up the next morning (when he commanded them to wait on him again); and then he would give them his Answer in writing, as it was now agreed upon.' They went to their lodgings, full of joyful hopes to receive this Answer the next morning; and which, being given, would have much conduced to a happy issue and success of this Treaty; and they had the king's word for it, and they waited on him the next morning at the hour appointed. But, instead of that Answer which they expected, and were promised, the king gave them a Paper quite contrary to what was concluded the night before, and very much tending to the breach of the Treaty. They did humbly expostulate this with his majesty, and pressed him upon his royal word, and the ill consequences which they feared would follow upon this his new Paper. But the king told them, 'He had altered his mind; and that this Paper, which he now gave them, was his Answer, which he was now resolved to make upon their last debate;' and they could obtain no other from him, which occasioned much sadness and trouble to them.—Some of his own friends, of whom the commissioners enquired touching this passage, informed them, That after they were gone from the king, and that his council were also gone away, some of his bed-chamber (and they went higher) hearing from him what Answer he had promised, and doubting it would tend to such an issue of the Treaty as they did not wish, they being rather for the continuance of the war, never left pressing and persuading of the king, till they prevailed with him to change his former resolutions, and to give order for his Answer to be drawn as it was now delivered.—The Treaty, upon the king's Propositions as well as upon the commissioners, going slowly on, and their Instructions being strict, and such as they could not shew to the king when he desired it, he thought fit, April 12, to send a Message to the parliament during the Treaty. [Here follow the heads of this Message, which we have already given at length, p. 105.] This being intimated to the commissioners they dissuaded the sending of it, as that which they feared might break off the Treaty; and the improbability that the houses would adjourn, and leave the city of London, their best friends and strength, and put a discontent upon them. Yet the king was prevailed with to send it; and, upon the receipt of it by the houses, they presently resolved to call away their commissioners, and sent their orders to them to return to the parliament, which they obeyed; and so this Treaty, having continued from the 4th of March to the 15th of April, was now dissolved, and all their labours and hazards become fruitless and of no effect; and all good Englishmen, lovers of the peace of their country, were troubled and disappointed. When they were come to the parliament they gave them a particular Account of all their negotiation, wherewith they were so well satisfied, that they ordered the Thanks of the house to be given them; and, by Vote, approved of all their proceedings."

Sir Hugh Cholmley deserts the Parliament.] April 3. A Letter to the commons from sir John Hotham was read, intimating, That sir Hugh Cholmley, governor of Scarborough castle, had deserted the parliament; but that, by his directions, the castle was regained by capt. Bushel; on which the house immediately expelled sir Hugh, and disabled him from ever sitting as a member there; and ordered that he should be impeached of high treason, for falsely and perfidiously betraying the trust reposed in him by the parliament, falsifying his Protestation, and revolting to the Popish army raised against the parliament.

The E. of Northumberland canes Mr. Martin, a Member, for opening a Letter of his.] April 18. The Parliament's Commissioners being all returned, the earl of Northumberland had the public Thanks of the house of lords given him for his prudent management in that business. Lord Clarendon, in his account of the Treaty before given, has hinted, that this nobleman was one of the suspected amongst the commissioners, as too much favouring the royal cause; and that Mr. Martin, one of the committee of safety at Westminster had opened a Letter from the earl, at Oxford, to his lady. We find, by the Journals, that this affair was highly resented by his lordship; who, at his return, meeting Mr. Martin at a conference in the Painted-Chamber, took him aside and questioned him upon it; but Mr. Martin justifying what he had done, the earl caned him in the presence of several persons. Mr. Martin complained of this to the commons; which produced the following Message to the lords, brought up by Mr. Glynn, who said,—“He was commanded by the commons to tell their lordships, that they had always been very tender of their lordships Privileges, and very desirous of the continuance of a fair agreement between both houses; and they were very confident that their lordships would be as tender of the privileges of the commons. That they were informed, that, this day, Mr Martin, a member of the commons, appointed by them to be one of the managers at a conference, as he was returning from it, (as the members ought to do without any hindrance or violence) was assaulted in the Painted-Chamber by a peer of great worth, the earl of Northumberland; which they held to be a Breach of the Privilege of parliament: and for this, he said, he was commanded by the commons to desire reparation."

The earl being then in the house, stood up and said, “That he submitted himself to their lordships judgment in this business; but desired them to take his case first into consideration, and to get reparation for the great breach of privilege done to the house of lords, and the injury to himself, by Mr. Martin, in opening his lordship's letter sent from Oxford, without any authority; he being a peer of that house, and then employed by it as one of the committee to treat with his majesty about the affairs of the kingdom."

All the Answer the lords gave to this Message at first, was, That they would send one by messengers of their own. They then took into consideration the fact done by Mr. Martin, in opening the earl's letter without any authority: and considering the earl as a member of the house of lords, and as a person of that capacity he was in when the fact was committed, being employed by their house to treat with his maj. about the great affairs of the kingdom, they conceived the matter to be a great Breach and Violation of the Privileges of their house; and it was resolved to have a conference with the commons, the next morning, concerning their Privileges, and to give them a narration of the whole business; and a message was sent down accordingly. But though we are told, by the Lords Journals, that a conference was held the next day, and a narration of the fact made by their lordships; yet it is not entered in either Journal, nor is there any more said concerning this business.

The E. of Essex's Letter from before Reading.] April 25. A Letter from the earl of Essex, who then lay before Reading with his whole army, was read, in the house of lords, addressed to their Speaker, in these words:

“My lord; I hold it my duty to acquaint the parliament with some passages, that happened yesterday morning and this last night. In the morning, about 2 of the clock, captain Kerr, that commands sir Wm. Balfour's troop, with two troops more, being upon the guard at Caversham, to take care that no provisions should be put into the town, the general Ruthen, with about 1500 horse and dragoons, namely 7 regiments of horse and 2 or 300 dragoons, surprized two centinels; but, having the alarm, our troops charged with 40 horse, and so retreated to col. Berkeley's regiment that was drawn over the bridge. The enemy charging, the musqueteers gave fire, and attacked col. Holborn with his musqueteers so resolutely, that they wheeled about and went away, our few horse following them 3 miles.

Their intention was to put 40 barrels of powder into the town.—That evening I sent out col. Middleton and col. Meldrum with their horse, and col. Milne with 4 troops of his dragoons, to find out the enemy. They fell in with them about 11 at night, at Dorchester, where the life-guard of foot lay, and the king's standard, which they knew not of till afterwards.—If the soldiers could have been kept from plundering, they might have done much more; but there being 4 troops of horse there besides a regiment of foot, and being in danger of having the communication with Wallingford cut off between them and us, they only routed most of that regiment, took the captain and lieutenant of the life-guard, another lieutenant, two of the king's harbingers, one cornet, which they say was sir Tho. Aston's, and 40 other prisoners, with 150 horse.—The king draws together all his forces, prince Maurice being come, and prince Rupert hourly expected at Brill, and is marching this way; so that we expect this night, or Tuesday night which we rather conjecture, all their forces to fall upon us: besides Proclamations are sent out to raise all the country from 16 to 60; which, if the parliament had sent out in that kind, it would well have strengthened their army.—We doubt not but that God, which hath shewed us so many blessings hitherto, will protect us out of these storms that threaten us. We, that serve you, are in a hard condition, losing all our fortunes; and those that are violentest against the parliament, have their estates protected; if the army be well paid, it is no matter; if not, it must break; which I think, for the number, is the bravest army in Christendom. I believe that the time is thought long that Reading holds yet out. I assure you it is a very strong fortified town, all pallisadoed, and strong in out-works.—I am very loth to venture the soldiers upon such work, it being probable that many may be lost in storming; and, now especially, it were our great hazard, the enemy being so near, and we must be in a posture to fight. But I doubt not, by God's blessing, I shall give a good account of this great business. Sir Wm. Waller doth not come to me according to my expectation and order, though prince Maurice be come from him, and turned upon me; so that I have now all the king's forces to deal with, both without and within the town, without the assistance which I had reason to look for. Your, &c. ESSEX. From before Reading, April 24, 1643."

Conference on the Means for supplying the E. of Essex's Army.] April 27. The commons finding that their Armies were in great want of pay, had a conference with the lords; in which they offered the following Propositions: "First, On account of the lord-general's letter, they considered that his estate was all sequestered and seized upon, whereby he was utterly unable to bear the charge now laid upon him; therefore the commons desired the lords to expedite the order, formerly sent to them, for to put the lord-general into possession of the lord Capel's estate. In the same Letter they took notice, that the Army was in danger to disband, unless care be taken to supply it with money; therefore the commons desired their lordships to join with them in sending a select committee of both houses to the city of London, this morning, to communicate the lord-general's Letter to them, except that part of it concerning sir Wm. Waller and delinquents estates; and to offer to them personal security of the members of both houses, to raise a considerable sum of money for the relief of the Army: likewise to return the common council thanks for the procuring of the late sum of 44,000*l.* Also to let them know, that the king is now drawing his forces into the field, and has made proclamation for all, from 16 to 60, to come in to his assistance; therefore to desire the city to get their forces in readiness to defend it, the adjacent counties, and the lord-general, if there be occasion. And, To desire the city to collect, speedily, the money that is behind on the Weekly Assessment; and, since the burdens of voluntary contributions are very great, and divers rich men have done nothing in the counties, the commons desired their lordships to pass the Ordinance for seizing the 20th part of the Malignants estates in the country, which would speedily bring in a considerable sum."

The lords agreed to send a committee of both houses into the city, upon the particulars aforementioned; but they objected against enjoining any lords to give their personal securities for the procuring of money, and left every lord to do therein as he pleased. And as to the Ordinance for sequestering all the lord Capel's, and that for the 20th part of Malignants estates, the lords would take them into their consideration. The earls of Bolingbroke, Manchester, and Rutland, were nominated, by the lords, to visit the city.

May 2. We now first meet with the name of Mr. Oliver Cromwell, as an officer of rank in the parliament's army; a particular Ordinance being made concerning him and some more officers, viz. Ch. Fleetwood, Edw. Whalley, and John Desborough: names which will frequently occur in the sequel. The said Ordinance appoints, "That whereas authority was given, by a former, to col. Oliver Cromwell and others, for the seizing of the persons, horses, arms, money, and plate of malignants and ill-affected persons in the county of Cambridge, the isle of Ely, &c. It was now further ordained, That the said col. Cromwell, &c. shall have authority to seize their corn and cattle, as well as other goods, under the protection of both houses of parliament."

The Parliament's Letter to the United Provinces, desiring a good Correspondence.] The Dutch had been, of late, much courted by the English parliament, to prevent any supplies of men, arms, or money being sent over to the king's assistance; but their agent, Mr. Strickland, at the Hague, could not hinder them from selling arms, or taking pawns of the queen's, or crown jewels, for that purpose. At this time the parliament was alarmed with the report of a naval armament, then getting ready at Dunkirk, which was to act against theirs at sea; to prevent which, the following Letter was agreed upon, by both houses, to be sent to their high mightinesses with all speed.

"High and mighty lords; We are commanded, by the lords and commons in parliament, to make known to your lordships, that several advertisements have been given to the committee of the lords and commons, appointed by both houses to take care of the safety of the kingdom on all occasions that concern the same, both at home and abroad, That the king hath hired divers ships and frigates of Dunkirk, to the number of 24, or thereabouts; and that he intended to employ them against the fleet appointed by the parliament for the defence of this kingdom. It was further informed, That two of these ships, or frigates, were permitted to pass, out of Dunkirk, by the admiral of your lordships fleet, by warrant or some command from his highness the prince of Orange; which information that committee ordered should be communicated to Mr. Strickland, now resident in the Hague by authority and instructions from both houses; which direction of that committee of both houses was likewise seconded by an Order of the commons house, and Mr. Strickland commanded to present it to your lordships, as he hath done.—We are to intreat your lordships to believe, that the two houses have such an opinion of the wisdom and justice of your state, that they cannot easily conceive you would do any thing so much to the prejudice of the interest of yourselves, as well as of the kingdom; and the high esteem and value which they set upon your friendship and correspondence is such, that they would not suffer any report of that nature to be spread in the world, but speedily present it to your lordships, as an information only commonly spoken of, to the great prejudice and disreputation of that near union and concurrence between this kingdom and your state, which they most earnestly desire may ever be continued: and they very much rejoice to hear, that there was no ground for that report in any resolution of your lordships, nor in any command or direction of the prince of Orange; whose eminent power and abilities they shall always hope will be expressed in such counsels and actions as may be most agreeable for the preservation of the Reformed Religion, and the interest of both states, against the antient known enemies of both: and the lords and commons do assure your lordships, that you shall never discern any thing, in their intentions and proceedings, but what, in their judgment, shall be most proper and effectual to that end; and as they rest fully satisfied concerning the vanity and falsehood of that report, so they pray your lordships to rest assured, that this information was appointed to be presented to you, out of a tender affection to preserve both the being and reputation of an invoidable conjunction betwixt this kingdom and your state, without intention to reflect upon the honour of his highness the prince of Orange; and they desire you so to continue your favourable audience to Mr. Strickland, and to give credit to him, as one authorized by both houses of parliament to communicate to you the affairs of this kingdom, and to cherish the peace and amity betwixt the two states, which the two houses are confident he will ever faithfully and effectually perform. We commend the prosperity of your state, and of your lordships, to God's blessing, and remain your, &c. MANCHESTER, Speaker of the house of peers pro tempore. W. LENTHALL, Speaker of the House of commons. Westminster, May 2, 1643."

Dispute between the Houses concerning the seizure of 2 of the King's Horses.] May 3. One De Luke having broke open the King's Stables, and taken two young Horses belonging to his majesty, the lords ordered the horses to be restored, and De Luke to attend them to answer it. This man produced his warrant to the messenger, from Mr. Martin; and Mr. Martin himself denied to return the horses, saying 'We have taken the king's ships and forts, and may as well take his horses, lest they might be employed against us; but, however,' he added, 'he would acquaint the commons therewith the next morning, who would satisfy the lords at a conference.' This the lords took very ill, and, at the conference, they told the commons, That they had resolved to write to the lord-general, to recall Mr. Martin's commission; but, for himself, they had done nothing, in regard he was a member of their house. Adding, That they did apply themselves unto the commons in all respect and civility, and did look for reparation in this business. Instead of which, the commons, on their return to the house, voted, 'That Mr. Martin did well in not delivering the two Horses till he had made them acquainted with it: that these two horses should be kept by Mr. Martin till this house gives further order; and that the lord-general be desired not to do any thing in the business concerning Mr. Martin, till he heard further from that house.'

The Book of Sports ordered to be burnt.] May 5. An Order of parliament was made, That the Book, enjoining and tolerating of Sports upon the Lord's Day, be forthwith burnt, by the hands of the common hangman, in Cheapside, and other usual places. The sheriffs of London and Middlesex were to attend, and see this Order duly executed; and all persons, who had any of the said books, were ordered to bring them to one of the sheriffs, for their utter destruction.

An Excise laid on Ale, Cyder, Perry, &c.] May 16. An Order was made by the commons, directed to all justices of peace, &c. all over England and Wales, to put the statute, 1^{mo} Jacobi, in execution, That no strong Beer or Ale should be sold at above 1d. the quart; and, of all other beer, two quarts for the penny.—An Excise was also laid on at this time as follows: For each barrel of strong Beer or Ale, of 8s. the barrel, 1s. For a hogshead of Cyder or Perry, 1s. To be paid by the first buyer. The same tax was laid on the house-keeper, for Beer, Ale, Cyder or Perry, brewed or made for his own spending. All alehouse-keepers, or inn-holders, that brew and sell strong Beer and Ale of their own, each barrel, 2s. For all sorts of retailed Wines, over and above the customs due for the same, to be paid by the first retailer, a quart, 2d. On all sorts of Wines bought here, besides customs, to be paid by the first buyer, for all he shall use in his own house, for a quart, 1d. The same to be paid by the merchant for all the wine he shall use in his own house, besides the due customs. For a barrel of 6s. Beer sold, to be spent, as well in private as in victualling-houses, to be paid by the common brewer, or those that brew or sell the same beer, 6d. On all Tobacco, not of English plantation, the pound value, not weight, 4s. For the English plantation Tobacco, the same value; both over and above all other customs, 2s.

Resolutions of the Commons relating to the Great Seal.] May 20. A conference was held between the two houses, the effect of which was, That the commons presented to the lords certain votes they had lately passed, viz. 1. "That the Great Seal of England ought, by the law of the land, to attend the parliament. 2. That the Great Seal of England doth not attend the parliament; as, by the laws of the land, it ought to do. 3. That, by reason of this, the commonwealth hath suffered many grievous mischiefs, tending to the destruction of king, parliament, and kingdom. 4. That it is the duty of both houses to provide a speedy remedy for these mischiefs. 5. That a Great Seal of England shall be forthwith made, to attend the parliament for the dispatch of the affairs of parliament and kingdom."—This last Vote occasioned a division in the commons, when the numbers were 86 for making a new Seal, and 74 against it; in all 160 members present: the most that have divided on any question for a long time.—The lords deferred debating on all these matters till another day.

The King's Message requiring an Answer to his Message for an Accommodation.] May 22. A message from the king was read in the lords, as follows:

"C. R. Since his majesty's Message of the 12th of April, in which he conceived he had made such an overture for the immediate Disbanding of all armies, and composure of these present miserable distractions, by a full and free convention in parliament, that a perfect and settled Peace would have ensued, he hath, in all this time, (above a full month) procured no Answer from both houses; his maj. might well believe himself absolved, before God and man, from the least possible charge of not having used his utmost endeavours for peace; yet when he considers that the scene of all the calamity is in the bowels of his own kingdoms; that all the blood which is spilt is of his own subjects; and what victory soever it shall please God to give him, it must be over those who ought not to have lifted up their hands against him: when he considers these desperate civil dissensions may encourage and invite a foreign enemy to make a prey of the whole nation; that Ireland is in present danger of being totally lost; that the heavy judgment of God's plague, pestilence, and famine will be inevitable attendants of this unnatural contention; and that, in a short time, there will be so general a habit of uncharitableness and cruelty contracted throughout the kingdom, that even peace itself will not restore his people to their old temper and security: his maj. cannot but again call for an Answer to that his Message, which gives so fair a rise to end these unnatural distractions. And his maj. doth this with the most earnestness, because he doubts not but the condition of his armies in several parts; his strength of horse, foot, and artillery; his plenty of ammunition (which some men lately couceived he might have wanted) is so well known and understood; that it must be confessed, that nothing but the tenderness and love to his people, and those Christian impressions which always have dwelt, and, he hopes, always shall dwell, in his heart, could move him, once more, to hazard a refusal: and he requires them, as they will answer to God, to himself, and all the world, that they will no longer suffer their fellow subjects to welter in each other's blood; that they will remember by whose authority, and to what end, they met in that council; and send such an Answer to his majesty, as may open a door to let in a firm peace and security to the whole kingdom. If his maj. shall again be disappointed of his intention herein, the blood, rapine, and distractions which must follow in England and Ireland, will be cast upon the account of those who are deaf to the motion of Peace and Accommodation."

Ordered, That this Message should be communicated to the commons; and some lords being appointed to draw up what was fit to be delivered to them besides, at this conference, as the sense of this house about it, they soon after brought in the following:—"That the lords conceive it necessary to send the Reasons to the king, why the two houses could not agree to the Propositions offered in his majesty's Message of the 12th of April. To express, in that Answer to be made to his majesty, That their endeavours had been, and ever shall be, to put an end to these unhappy differences; so as their religion, laws, and liberties might be secured. To desire the commons to appoint a committee to meet one from the lords, to consider of this whole Message, and to prepare such an Answer as they think fit to offer to the two houses."

Abp. Laud's Petition for Relief.] The Abp. of Canterbury having now lain a very long time in the Tower, and no process, as yet, brought against him by the commons, though often urged to it by the lords; an humble Petition was this day presented to that house, from this prelate in these words:

The Humble PETITION of William Archbishop of Canterbury,

“Shewing, That he hath neither lands, lease, nor money; that the small store of plate he had is long since melted down for his necessary support and expences, caused by his present troubles: that his rents and profits are sequestered, and now all his goods taken from him, and no maintenance at all allowed him; insomuch that if some friends of his had not compassion on his wants, and sent him some little supply, he had not been able to subsist till this present; and now this supply is at the last. He humbly prays that your lordships would take his sad condition into your considerations, that somewhat may be allowed him out of his estate to supply the necessities of life; assuring himself that your lordships will not, in honour and justice, suffer him either to beg or starve. And your petitioner, &c.

The lords immediately resolved to allow the archbishop some maintenance, out of charity, to supply his necessities; and further ordered, That the petition be recommended to the commons. The commons returned for Answer, That they would send one by messengers of their own; but we hear no more of it from that quarter.

The Commons accuse the Queen of High Treason.] A message being sent up from the commons, to desire the lords to sit a while, for they had a matter of great importance to communicate to them; soon after Mr. Pym came up to acquaint their lordships, that the commons had discharged their consciences by the following Vote which they had passed:—“That the Queen had levied war against the parliament and kingdom; and, having discharged their consciences, they think it fit to discharge their duty too; and said, He was commanded by the commons, in the name of themselves, and of all the commons of England, to accuse and impeach, and he did accordingly now accuse and impeach, Henrietta Maria, queen of England, of High Treason. And they desired their lordships to issue forth proclamations to summon her to appear before them, and receive a trial and due sentence for the same.”

—It is observable that these Votes were carried in the commons nem. con. The queen had just before met the king at Edge-hill, with a reinforcement of 3000 foot, 30 troop of horse and dragoons, and 6 pieces of cannon, besides great store of other warlike ammunition. All that is entered in the Lords Journals relative to this impeachment is, ‘This to be taken into consideration?’ but we hear no more of it for some time.

The Lords agree only to some of the Commons Votes relating to the Great Seal.] The lords entered into a long debate, concerning the Votes lately brought up from the commons, about making a new Great Seal: and, the first Vote being debated, these questions were put, Whether the use of the Great Seal of England ought to be applied to the commands of the parliament, by the laws of the land? It passed in the affirmative. The next, Whether the Great Seal ought to attend the commands of the parliament, according to law? Resolved negatively. The second Vote, ‘That the Great Seal doth not attend the parliament, as by the laws of the land it ought to do,’ being read, the lords resolved to have a conference, to be informed by the commons wherein the Great Seal hath not been applied to the commands of the parliament. They likewise resolved to defer giving any resolution as to the third Vote till the second was cleared. The house then proceeded to the fourth Vote, ‘That it is the duty of both houses to provide a speedy remedy to these mischiefs;’ and, after debate hereof, the lords came to this Resolution, That it is the duty of both houses to use their best endeavours to provide a fitting and speedy remedy. The fifth Vote, ‘That a Great Seal of England shall be forthwith made to attend the parliament, for dispatch of the affairs of parliament and kingdom,’ was put to the question, and passed in the negative.—To palliate these Resolutions to the commons, the lords appointed a considerable committee to consider what was fit to be delivered to them, on this subject, at the ensuing conference.

This day another conference was held between the two houses; in which the commons communicated to the lords some Letters which they had received from their general in the North, the lord Fairfax, and other officers, concerning the taking of Wakefield, &c. and that they had voted a public thanksgiving for the same; which the lords agreed to.

Order relating to the Regalia in Westminster Abbey.] June 2. On a motion in the commons, That the dean, sub dean, and prebendaries of Westminster-abbey, should be required to deliver up the keys of the treasury there, where the Regalia were kept, that the place might be searched, and a report of it made to the house, the question was put, Whether, upon refusal of the keys, the door of that place should be broke open? It passed in the negative, 58 against 37: but the next day, the same question being again put, with the addition of an inventory of the things there to be taken, new locks put on the doors, and nothing removed till upon further order of the house, it was carried by so small a majority, as 42 against 41, for breaking open the doors.

The important town of Newcastle upon Tyne had been, for some time past, in the hands of the king’s forces; by which the city of London was much straitened for coals, the works and mines for digging this useful commodity being all engrossed by the Royalists, as well as the several ports from which it was shipped off and conveyed to London. To remedy this great inconvenience to the city, after many consultations and conferences, a scheme was published, put on the footing of the adventurers for Ireland; by which means those Northern parts of England were to be as much a conquered country as the other; and the lands and estates of many great families shared out amongst those who would venture to advance money for this expedition. An Ordinance to that purpose was passed by both houses, about this time, and ordered to be printed and published.

Petition from the University of Cambridge.] June 5. The following Petition, from the University of Cambridge, was presented to the lords:

The Humble PETITION of the University of Cambridge;

"Humbly presenteth to your honourable consideration the sad dejected state of the University; how our schools daily grow desolate, mourning the absence of their professors, and their wonted auditories; how, in our colleges, our numbers grow thin and our revenues short; and what subsistence we have abroad is, for the most part, involved in the common miseries; how, frightened by the neighbouring noise of war, our students either quit their gowns or abandon their studies; how our degrees lie disesteemed, and all hopes of our public commencements are blasted in the bud; besides sundry other inconveniences which we forbear to mention.—We cannot but conceive your honourable piety (out of a noble zeal for learning) will duly pity our sad condition; and, as the present general calamities give way, afford us some succour and encouragement. Your wisdoms best know what privileges and immunities have been, in all good times, afforded to the seats of learning and professors of it; and, even in the fury and heat of war, places of religion and devotion have usually, not only on both sides, been spared from ruin, but supported and esteemed as sanctuaries. Hence it is that the members of our University (by charter confirmed by act of parliament) are expressly freed from all preparations and contributions to any war; hence it is that, in neighbouring territories, where the excise is most in use, the university, with all their students, are exempt.—May it, therefore, not be displeasing to your pious wisdoms, if in all humility we crave at your hands a tender consideration of our case; that you will be pleased to exempt our poor estates from all such rates and impositions; to vouchsafe such freedom to our persons, not giving just offence, as may enable us the better to keep together, and daily to offer up our joint prayers to God for a blessed union betwixt our gracious sovereign and you, and the blessing of peace upon the land."

Meeting of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster.] This day the Ordinance of the lords and commons, formerly made, was read, for the calling an Assembly of learned and godly Divines, to be consulted with by parliament, for the settling the government and liturgy of the Church of England; and vindicating and clearing the doctrine of the said church from false aspersions and interpretations. This Ordinance was referred to the consideration of 13 lords, appointed as a committee, to report the same to the house. This Assembly of Divines soon after met, to the number of 69, in Henry 7th's Chapel, in the Abbey of Westminster, where a sermon was preached, before them and the two houses of parliament, by Dr. Twist, their prolocutor; and, a day or two after, a public fast was kept by them. What they did, when met together, will appear in the sequel.

A Plot against the Parliament; which gives rise to a new Oath or Covenant.] June 8. The commons had been busy for some days, in tracing out a Plot against the Parliament, and securing the authors and contrivers of it. The names of these conspirators were, Mr. Edm. Waller, (the poet) a member of the house of commons, and one of their late commissioners at Oxford, Mr. Tomkins, Mr. Chaloner, and others. This day, at a conference, the commons produced the Examinations they had taken concerning this Plot, to prove the particulars of it, and also made some observations thereupon. They then presented to the lords the form of an Oath, or Covenant, which the members of their house, for the most part, had already taken, except a few who desired some days to consider of it; and this they requested the lords to take also. They further brought up an Oath, or Covenant, to be taken by the whole kingdom, for discovery of such designs as these, and to express a detestation of all of the like nature. Lastly, they said it was to distinguish the good and the well-affected party from the bad, and unite the former faster together amongst themselves.—This affair Mr. Whitlocke tells us, was long debated in the commons; but was, at last, carried, and those members looked upon as disaffected who were any way backward in taking of it. And, after another long debate, it was ordered to be taken by all persons, in city and country; and those who refused it had the mark of Malignancy fixed upon them.

Next the commons offered some Votes, which had passed their house, to the lords, for their concurrence; as, 1. "That a particular short day may be appointed, wherein both lords and commons, with the cities of London and Westminster, &c. may meet and give public Thanks to God, for this discovery and great deliverance." Agreed; and the 15th instant appointed for the parliament and city, and that day month for the whole kingdom. 2. That a free pardon shall be granted for all such persons that have been in this Plot, and are not yet taken, nor have fled, as shall come in voluntarily before the 15th of this month, and discover their whole knowledge of this design, and shall heartily join with the parliament in defence of the kingdom. 3. That it be recommended to the city to have a stricter guard kept till this business be settled; and that some better course may be taken for securing the prisoners, and keeping them in close custody. 4. That letters be sent to the earl of Warwick, to inform him of this Plot; and that the said Oath may be taken by all the officers and mariners through the whole fleet." The lords agreed to these Votes, without any alteration.

Mr. Pym's Narrative of the Plot, as delivered at the Guildhall.] This day the commons, also, thought fit to send a deputation of their house into the city, to make the same Narrative to them as was made to the lords.

Mr. Pym, being chosen orator for this purpose, delivered himself, at a Common-hall, in these words:*

"My Lord Mayor, and you worthy Citizens of this famous and magnificent City; We are sent hither to you from the house of commons, to make known to you the Discovery of a great and mischievous Design, tending not only to the ruin and destruction of the city and of the kingdom; but, in those ruins, likewise to have buried religion and liberty. I might call it a strange design (though, in these late times, designs of this kind have been very frequent) because it exceeds others in divers considerable circumstances of it; in the malice of the intention, subtilty of contrivance, extent of mischief, and nearness of execution; all which arose from the wickedness of the authors. Two others may be added; that is, the clearness of the discovery and proof, and the greatness of the deliverance, proceeding from the great mercies of God.—I shall, in the opening this Design, take this course for my own memory and yours; and observe, 1. What was in their aims. 2. The variety of Preparations. 3. The Degrees of Proceedings. And 4. The Maturity and Readiness for Execution.—The parliament, the city, and the army, seem to be the three vital parts of this kingdom; wherein not only the well-being, but the very life and being of it doth consist; this mischief would have seized upon all these at once.—The City should have been put into such a combustion, as to have your swords imbrued in one another's blood: the parliament should have been corrupted, and betrayed by their own members: the Army destroyed, if not by force, yet for want of supply and maintenance, that so they might have had an open and clearer way to the rest which they had in proposition; especially to that main and supreme end, the extirpation of religion.—I shall tell you, first, out of what principles this did rise; it was from the ashes of another design that failed; that mutinous Petition which was contrived in this city; the actors of that Petition being therein disappointed, they fell presently into consultation how they might compass their former end in another way; that is, under pretence of securing themselves by force against the Ordinances of Parliament, and, under pretence of procuring Peace, they would have made themselves masters of the city, yea of the whole kingdom; and they would have ruined and destroyed all those that should have interrupted them in their mischievous intentions.—The first step in their Preparation was, To appoint a committee that might often meet together, and consult how they might compass this wicked end. Their next was, that they might enable that committee with intelligence from both armies, as well those on the king's side, (as they call themselves, though we be of the king's side indeed) as those that are raised by the parliament; especially they were careful to understand the proceedings of parliament, that so, by the advantage of this intelligence, they might the better effect that which they had in project, and find the readiest and the nearest ways to it.—After they had thus provided for intelligence, then how to procure power and countenance to this action, by some appearing authority from his majesty: for which purpose they projected to get a commission from the king, whereby many of themselves, and of those that were of their own consort, should be established a council of war in London and parts adjacent, with power to raise forces, make provisions of ammunition, and of other kind of arms, and to give authority to the leading and conducting of those forces, and to raise money for the maintenance of them; and, as it is expressed in the commission, for the destruction of the army under the command of Robert earl of Essex, raised by authority from the two houses of parliament.—Having laid these Grounds, I shall, in the next place, discover to you those that should have been actors and agents in this business, their several qualifications and relations. The first sort was some members of the city, whereof there were divers, you shall hear the names out of the proofs; the next was (in their pretence, as they gave out) members of the two houses of parliament; the third sort was, two gentlemen, Mr. Waller, and a brother-in-law of his, Mr. Tomkins, that were to be agents betwixt the parliament and the city, as they pretended; a fourth sort was, those that were to be messengers to convey intelligence from this place to the court at Oxford, and to other places where there should be occasion; and the fifth and last consisted but in one man, that we yet discover, and that was the lord of Falkland, that kept correspondency with them from the court: these were to be the actors in this mischievous Design.—They began then to think upon some other courses of very great advantage to themselves. The first was of Combination; how they might be more closely conjoined one to another, and how they might be more secure from all others that were not of the same party; and, for this purpose there was devised a Protestation of Secrecy, whereby, as they were Christians, they did bind themselves to keep one anothers counsel, not to reveal that which they had knowledge of, which they were trusted with: and the second was, a wariness in discovering the business to any of those who were to be brought into the Plot, for though they came in amongst them to be of them, they would not trust all of their own body; but they took this wary and subtil course, that no one man should acquaint above two in this business, that so, if it came to examination, it should never go farther than three, by the same party that discovered it; and then those two had the like power, that any one of them might discover it to two others, that so still it might be confined within the number of three: then there was a special Obligation, as was pretended by Mr. Waller, which he had made to those that he said were members of both houses of parliament, and consenting to this Plot; but that is yet but a pretence, no names or parties are known.—After they had provided thus for their Combination, and for their security, then, in the next place, they thought of some means of Augmentation, how they might increase their numbers, and draw in others to come to be of their party; and for this they did resolve to use all the art and subtilty to irritate men's minds against the parliament; they found out those that thought themselves most heavily burdened with these taxes; they did cherish all that had any discontents about the Assessment, advising them to repair to the Committee for Ease, which they knew would be difficult to obtain; and that they, being disappointed, would be more enraged, and the apter to join with them in this Plot.—From this care of Augmentation, they went, in the next place, to find out some means of Discovery; that they might know how far their party did extend, who were of their side, and who were against them; and, for this purpose, they did devise that there should be a survey of all the Wards, nay of all the parishes, within the city of London, the suburbs and places adjoining in every parish, to observe those that were for them, whom they called Right Men; and others that were against them, whom they called Averse Men; and then a third sort, whom they called Neutrals and Indifferent Men; and they appointed several persons, that were trusted with this survey and enquiry, to find out these several degrees and sorts in every parish.—Thus far this Design seems to be but a work of the brain, to consist only in invention and subtilty of design; but the other steps and degrees, which I shall now observe to you, will make it to be a work of the hand, to bring it somewhat nearer to execution.—The first step that came into action and execution was, That they procured this Commission, which they had before designed and endeavoured to obtain: now they had obtained a commission, as I told you before, to establish certain men, 17 in number; their names are there expressed; you shall hear them read to you; they were to be a council of war here within the city; these 17 men had power to name others to themselves, to the number of 21; and they should be enabled both to appoint, not only colonels and captains, and other inferior officers of an army, but to appoint and nominate a general; they had power to raise men, to raise arms and ammunition, and to do all those other things that I told you before; and to lay taxes and impositions, to raise money, and to execute martial law.—When they had gone thus far, in the next place, they did obtain a Warrant from the king; and this was to Mr. Chaloner, that he might receive money and plate of all those, that, either by voluntary Contribution or Loan, would furnish the king, in this necessity of his, as they called it; and thereby the king was obliged to the repayment of it: this was obtained.—By this cometh in the List; and what was before part of the Design, cometh now into act; the citizens that were trusted with framing of this List, brought it in, except in some few parishes, under those Heads of Discovery that I formerly told you of; that is, in every parish who were Right, who were Indifferent and Neutral, and who were Averse; and those were brought to Mr. Waller's house. After they had delivered that List the citizens then declared themselves that now they had done their part; as they had discovered to them a foundation of strength, they did expect from them again a foundation of countenance and authority, that was from both houses of parliament; and they did declare, that they would proceed no farther till they knew the names of those members of both houses that should join with them, and should undertake to countenance this business. Mr. Waller made this Answer, that he did assure them that they should have members of both houses, both lords and commons, to join with them; that he himself was but their mouth; that he spoke not his own words, but their words; that he was but their agent, and did their work; that they should have of the ablest, of the best, and of the greatest lords, and the greatest number; nay, that they should pick and chuse; that they could not wish for a lord, whom he doubted not but to procure them: this was the vanity of his boasting to them to draw them on, and to encourage them in this Plot. This being now done, and propounded by the citizens on their part, Mr. Waller propounded from the lords divers Queries and Questions which had been framed, as he said, by the lords and commons; and, in their name, he did present them that were for the removal of difficulties, of some Obstructions, that might hinder this work; those Queries were delivered upon Friday was se'nnight to some of the citizens, and, upon the Saturday morning, (that was Saturday was se'nnight) they were returned back again with Answers.—I shall now relate to you both the Queries and the Answers that were returned by those of the City. 1. 'What number of men there were armed? A. There was a third part well armed, a third part with halberts, and another third part with what they could get; with what came to hand. 2. In what places the Magazines were laid? A. At alderman Fowk's house at Leadenhall, and at Guildhall. 3. Where the rendezvous should be? A. At all the gates, the places of the magazines in Cheapside, in the Exchange, and at what other places the Lords should think fit. 4. Where was the place of retreat, if there should be occasion? A. They had Banstead Downs, they had Blackheath, in proposition; but they did refer the conclusion of the place to the lords. 5. What colours there should be? A. At every rendezvous there should be colours. 6. By what marks and tokens they should be distinguished from others, and know their friends from their enemies? A. They should have white ribbons or white tape. 7. What strength there was within the walls, and without? A. Within the walls, there was for one with them, three against them; but, without the walls, for one against them, there were five for them. 8. What was to be done with the Tower? A. They could conclude nothing in that point. 9. Where the chief commanders dwelt? A. Every parish could tell what new commanders and captains they had, and who of the militia dwelt in it. 10. What time this should be put in execution? A. The time was wholly left to the lords.—After all these Quæries, thus propounded and answered, Mr. Waller told them, That he would acquaint the lords with those Answers that he had received from them to their Quæries; and wished them not to be troubled, though the lords did not yet declare themselves, for they could do them as good service in the house. Being proceeded thus far, they came then to some Propositions which should be put in execution, and they were these: 1. That they would take into their custody the king's children that were here. 2. That they would lay hold of all those persons that they thought should be able to stand in their way, or to give them any impediment, or at least of some considerable number of them; it is unlike that all were named, but some were named, of the lords house there was named my lord Say and my lord Wharton; and besides my lord mayor, whom they took into their consideration as the head of the city, there was named of the house of commons, sir Philip Stapylton, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Strode; and they did me the honour and favour to name me too.—When they had taken into consideration the surprisal of these members of both houses, they did take into their further resolution, that, with my lord mayor, should have been seized all your committee of militia; they would not spare one of them.—They intended further, that they would release all prisoners that had been committed by the parliament; that they would seize upon the magazines; that they would make a Declaration to satisfy the people.—There are no designs, be they never so ill, but they do put on a mask of some good, for betwixt that that is absolutely and apparently ill, there is no congruity with the will of man; and therefore the worst of evils are undertaken under a shadow and a shew of goodness: a Declaration must be set out, to make the people believe that they stood up for the preservation of religion, of the king's prerogative, of the liberties of the subject, of the privileges of parliament; and of these 1000 copies were to be printed; they were to be set upon posts and gates in the most considerable and open places; and they were to be dispersed, as much as they could, through the city against the time it should be put in execution: this was done upon Saturday last was se'nnight, in the morning.—Then, in the next place, they thought fit to give intelligence to the court of what proceedings they had made here; and thereupon Mr. Hazel was sent to Oxford, that very Saturday in the afternoon, from Mr. Waller's house. There were two messages sent by him for this main design they would not trust in writing: the first message was from Mr. Waller, That he should tell my lord of Falkland, that he would give him a more full notice of the great business very speedily: the other message was from Mr. Tomkins, and that was, That the Design was now come to good maturity; that they had so strong a party in the city, that though it were discovered, yet they would be able to put it in execution: they promised to give notice to the king of the very day, and, if it were possible, of the very hour, wherein this should be put in execution; and then they did desire, when they had seized upon the outworks, that there might some party of the king's army come up within 15 miles of the city, who, upon knowledge of their proceedings, must be admitted into the city. These were the 4 points upon which the message did consist, which was sent from Mr. Tomkins to my lord of Falkland by Mr. Hazel. To both these Messages my lord of Falkland, returned an Answer by word of mouth; (they kept themselves so closely that they durst not venture to write) and he bid the messenger tell Mr. Waller, Mr. Tomkins, and Mr. Hambden, (a gentleman that was sent up with a message from the king, and remained here in town to agitate this business, and made that use of his being here in town) That he could not well write, and did excuse himself; but prayed them that they would use all possible haste in the main business.—Mr. Waller having plotted it, and brought it on thus far, now he began to think of pushing it further: and, the Tuesday following this Saturday, which was Tuesday was se'nnight in the evening, after he came home to his lodgings, Mr. Tomkins and he being together, he told him, That the very next morning, that was Wednesday, the Fast-Day, he should go to my lord of Holland, and acquaint him with this Plot, and discover so much to him as he thought fit; that he himself would go to some other lords, and do the like. This was the Tuesday night, in which conference they put on that confidence in expectation of success in this Plot, that Mr. Waller broke out with a great oath to affirm, That if they did carry this throughout, then they would have any thing. This he spake to

Mr. Tomkins with a very great deal of earnestness and assurance. So far they went on in hope and expectation, but here they were cut short: That very night there were warrants issued upon some discoveries that were made of this Plot, to the lord mayor, and to the sheriffs here; which they did execute with so much diligence and care of the good of the city, that the next morning, when Mr. Tomkins and Mr. Waller should have gone about their business, they were apprehended, and the rest of the citizens, divers of them, but some escaped.—Thus far I have discovered to you the materials and the lineaments of this mischievous Design; you shall now be pleased to hear the Proofs and the Confessions out of which this Narration doth arise, and that will make all this good to you that I have said. And, after those are read, I shall then tell you what hath been done since in the house of commons, somewhat in the house of lords, and what else is in proposition to be offered to you from the commons; but I shall desire you first that you may be fully convinced of the great goodness of God in discovery of this Plot, and the truth of these things that I have spoken to you, that you will hear the evidence of the Proofs; and then we shall go on to those other things which we have in charge.”—The Proofs being read, Mr. Pym proceeded thus: ‘Gentlemen, we have held you long, you are now almost come to the end of your trouble; I am to deliver to you some short Observations upon the whole matter, and then to acquaint you with the Resolutions thereupon, taken in the house of commons; and to conclude with a few desires from them to you. The Observations are these: 1. I am to observe to you the contrariety betwixt the pretences, with which this Design hath been masked, and the truth: one of the pretences was peace; the truth was, blood and violence: another of the pretences was, the preserving of property; the truth was, the introducing of tyranny and slavery, which leaves no man master of any thing he hath. 2. The unnatural way by which they meant to compass this wicked Design, that was, to destroy the parliament by the members of parliament; and then, by the carcass and shadow of a parliament, to destroy the kingdom: what is a parliament but a carcass when the freedom of it is suppressed? When those shall be taken away by violence, that can, or will, oppose and stand in the way of their intentions? The high court of parl. is the most certain and constant guardian of liberty; but if it be deprived of its own liberty, it is left without life or power to keep the liberty of others. If they should bring a parliament to be subject to the king’s pleasure, to be correspondent, as they call it, to his will, in the midst of such evil councils which now are predominant, there would little or no cure be left; but then all things that are most mischievous would seem to be done by law and authority. 3. With what an evil conscience these men undertook this work: They that pretended to take arms to defend their own property, obtained a commission to violate the property of others: they would take the assertion of the laws of the land, but assumed to themselves such a power as was most contrary to that law; to seize upon their persons without due process; to impose upon their estates without consent; to take away some lives by the law martial; and, besides all this, without any commission, they intended to alter the government of the city, which is now governed by your own council, by a magistrate chosen by yourselves, then to be governed by violence.

4. That the mischievous effect of this Design would not have ceased in the first night’s work; all the godly part in the kingdom, all faithful ministers especially, would have been left not only to the scorn and reproach, but to the hatred, malice, and cruelty of the papists and malignants. 5. That this matter was prosecuted in part, and agitated and promoted by those that were sent from the king, and seemed to be messengers of peace; and while we should be amused with the pretences of gracious Messages to propose Peace this villainous project, which should have set you all in blood, was promoted by those messengers, and should have been put in execution very shortly after.

—The Matters resolved on in the house of commons are these things: 1. That there may be public Thanksgiving to God, both in the city and throughout the kingdom, for this great deliverance; that a near day be appointed for the city, the parliament, and the parts adjacent, and a convenient day for other parts of the kingdom. 2. That the house of peers should be made acquainted with these Proofs, and with all this discovery; which hath been done accordingly. 3. That there should be a Covenant made, whereby we should both testify our detestation of this mischievous Plot, and join ourselves more closely in the maintenance of the common interest of the church and commonwealth, in religion and liberty, which are still in great danger, and would have been utterly subverted, if this project had taken effect. 4. That this should be communicated to you of the city; that so as you have a great part in the blessing, you may do your part in the duty of Thankfulness, together with us. 5. That it shall be communicated to the army, that they likewise take notice of this great mercy of God, and join with us, both in the Thanksgiving and in the Protestation and Covenant, as we shall likewise desire you of the city to do.—Then we are commanded to give Thanks to my lord mayor, to the sheriffs, and to the rest of the officers of the city, for their great care in the apprehending of these persons, in guarding the peace and quiet of the city. We are likewise to give thanks to those gentlemen, that have had the custody of these prisoners. We know it cannot but be a trouble to them; but there was no means to keep them safe from Messages one to another, and from Speeches, but by such a way of putting them in honest men’s hands; therefore the commons have commanded us to give them special thanks for their undertaking this care, and to assure them that they will see them fully recompenced for all the trouble and charge they shall undergo by it.—And we are to give you thanks, which are the citizens of this city, for your good affections to the public cause, and for your continual bounty for the support of it.—Thus far we are enjoined by the Resolution of the house: now we are further to entreat you to hear both the Covenants; you shall thereby know to what we have bound ourselves, and to what we desire you shall be bound. There are two Covenants; that is, one proper for the houses of parliament, which hath been taken in the house of commons by all the members, even by those gentlemen that are named in the Examinations to have been privy to this Plot, which they all have disavowed; and the other Covenant is to be taken by all the other part of the kingdom; by the citizens, by the army, and the rest of the people generally in all places.—The draught of these two Covenants we shall communicate to you; the house of lords they have had them already, and have taken them into consideration; and we hear they do resolve, That what is appointed for them shall be taken by the members of that house.—We are further to desire you, That you would co-operate with the Divine Providence, in God's great mercy to this city, and the whole kingdom: God doth not only do good, but thereby gives assurance that he will do good; his mercies they are comforts for the present, they are pledges for the future; but yet our care must not cease.—We are to desire that you would keep your guards, and look well to your city; and that you would find out these evil members that are among you, as near as may be; that so, for the time to come, this Plot may be prevented, as hitherto it hath been stopped; for out of doubt all the malignity is not drawn out of them, though the opportunity is hindered for the present putting it in execution.—I am to tell you further, That, in desire to win those that shall be taken with remorse for this wicked Design and Conspiracy, it is resolved, That if any man shall come in before the 15th day of this present June, and freely confess his fault, and what he knows of this conspiracy, that he shall have a full, free, and plenary pardon for the time to come, except those that are already taken or fled; I say, those that come in voluntarily shall be pardoned. Your care, and our care, they will be all little enough; we hope God's blessing will be so upon them both, that you shall be restored to a full Peace; and that, in the mean time, you shall enjoy such a degree of safety and prosperity, as may make way to it."

The Covenant taken by the Lords on that Occasion.] June 9. The lords having considered of the Vow and Covenant, brought up by the commons, judged it a voluntary Oath, and proper to be given to every member of their house, in a solemn and serious manner. Accordingly, every lord, beginning at the youngest baron, and going upwards according to their degrees, held the Paper in their hands and read it distinctly as follows:

"Whereas there hath been, and now is, in this kingdom, a Popish and traiterous Plot, for the subversion of the true Protestant Reformed Religion, and the liberty of the subject: and, in pursuance thereof, a Popish army hath been raised, and is now on foot in divers parts of this kingdom. And whereas there hath been a treacherous and horrid Design lately discovered by the great blessing and special providence of God, of divers persons, to join themselves with the armies raised by the king, and to destroy the forces raised by the lords and commons; to surprize the cities of London and Westminster, with the suburbs, and, by arms, to force the parliament; and finding, by constant experience, that many ways of force and treachery are continually attempted to bring to utter ruin and destruction the parliament and kingdom, and, that which is dearest, the true Protestant Religion; and that, for the preventing and withstanding the same, it is fit that all, who are true-hearted and lovers of their country, should bind themselves each to other in a sacred Vow and Covenant:—"I, A B, in humility and reverence of the Divine Majesty, declare my hearty sorrow for my own sins, and the sins of this nation, which have deserved the calamities and judgments that now lie upon it: and my true intention is, by God's grace, to endeavour the amendment of my own ways. And I do further, in the presence of Almighty God, declare, vow, and covenant, That, in order to the security and preservation of the true Reformed Protestant Religion, and Liberty of the Subject, I will not consent to the laying down of arms, so long as the papists, now in open war against the parliament, shall, by force of arms, be protected from the justice thereof: and that I do abhor and detest the said wicked and treacherous design lately discovered; and that I never gave nor will give my assent to the execution thereof; but will, according to my power and vocation, oppose and resist the same, and all others of the like nature: and in case any other like Design shall hereafter come to my knowledge, I will make such timely discovery as I shall conceive may best conduce to the preventing thereof. And whereas I do in my conscience believe, That the forces raised by the two houses of parliament, are raised and continued for their just defence, and for the defence of the true Protestant Religion and Liberty of the Subject, against the forces raised by the king; that I will, according to my power and vocation, assist the forces raised and continued by both houses, against the forces raised by the king without their consent: and will likewise assist all other persons that shall take this Oath, in what they shall do in pursuance thereof; and will not, directly or indirectly, adhere unto, nor willingly assist, the forces raised by the king, without the consent of both houses. And this Vow and Covenant I make in the presence of Almighty God, the Searcher of all Hearts, with a true intention to perform the same, as I shall answer at the Great Day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed."

At the same time, however, it was moved and agreed to by the lords, That a short Declaration might be drawn up, and taken by them, the house of commons, and the whole kingdom, declaring their loyalty to the king's person, his crown and dignity; and a committee of 11 lords were ordered to draw it up and report it to the house.

June 11. The earl of Portland and the lord viscount Conway being accused by the commons, of being concerned in Mr. Waller's Plot, they were sequestered from the lords house and committed; the one to the custody of the lord mayor of London, and the other to one of the sheriffs; but their lands and goods not to be seized on, till, upon trial, it appeared they were guilty of the charge against them.

Ordinance for restraining the Liberty of the Press.] The Liberty of the Press having of late been very grievous to the parliament, they passed an Ordinance to restrain it, and to strengthen some former Orders made for that purpose. The preamble to this Ordinance sets forth,

"That whereas divers good Orders have been lately made, by both houses of parliament, for suppressing the great abuses and frequent disorders in printing many false, forged, scandalous, seditious, libellous, and unlicensed papers, pamphlets, and books to the great defamation of religion and government; which have taken little or no effect, by reason the bill in preparation, for redress of the said disorders, hath hitherto been retarded: and that through the present distractions, very many persons, as well stationers and printers, as others of sundry other professions, have taken upon them to set up private printing presses in corners; and to print, vend, publish, and disperse books, pamphlets and papers, in such multitudes, that no industry could be sufficient to discover or bring to punishment all the several abounding delinquents: therefore, &c." The most material Clauses are these; "That no Order or Declaration of either house shall be printed without order of one or both the said houses; nor any other book, pamphlet, paper, nor part of any such book, pamphlet, or paper, shall from henceforth be printed, bound, stitched, or put out to sale, by any person or person whatsoever, unless the same be first approved and licensed under the hands of such persons as both, or either, of the said houses shall appoint for licensing of the same; and be entered in the Register Book of the Company of Stationers, according to antient custom, and the printer thereof to put his name thereto.—The master and wardens of the said company, the gentleman-usher of the house of peers, the serjeant of the commons house, and their deputies, together with the persons formerly appointed by the committee of the house of commons for examinations, are authorized and required to make diligent search in all places, where they shall think meet, for all unlicensed printing presses, and all presses any way employed in the printing of scandalous or unlicensed papers, pamphlets or books; and to seize and carry away such printing presses, letters and other materials, of every such irregular printer, which they find so misemployed, unto the common-hall of the said company, there to be defaced and made unserviceable, according to antient custom; and likewise to make diligent search in all suspected printing houses, ware-houses, shops and other places, for such scandalous and unlicensed books, papers, pamphlets, and all other books, not entered, nor signed with the printer's name as aforesaid, being printed, contrary to this Order; and the same to seize and carry away to the said common-hall, there to remain till both or either house of parliament shall dispose thereof; and likewise to apprehend all authors, printers, and other persons whatsoever employed in compiling, printing, stitching, binding, publishing and dispersing of the said scandalous, unlicensed, and unwarrantable papers, books, and pamphlets as aforesaid; and all those who shall resist the said parties in searching after them, and bringing them before either of the houses or the committee of examinations, that so they may receive such further punishments as their offences shall merit; and not to be released until they have given satisfaction to the parties employed in their apprehension for their pains and charges, and sufficient caution not to offend in like sort for the future.—All justices of the peace, captains, constables and other officers, are ordered and required to be aiding and assisting to the aforesaid persons in the due execution of all and singular the premises, and in the apprehension of all offenders against the same; and, in case of opposition, to break open doors and locks, &c."

Declaration made by the Lords, of their Loyalty to the King's Person.] June 16. The earl of Northumberland reported from the committee a draught of what they thought proper to be taken, to declare the Loyalty of the Lords to the King's Person, his crown and dignity; which was read: viz. "We the lords and commons do further declare, That our intentions have been, and still are, to our power, to maintain, preserve, and defend his majesty's person and just rights of the crown; together with the persons of his royal issue; and that we shall use our utmost endeavours in pursuance of the same." Ordered, To communicate this to the commons: and, at the same time, to offer somewhat to them for composing the present Distractions and settling Peace between the king and parliament.

Draught of a Petition to the King for Peace.] June 17. A committee of lords were appointed to consider of this last Article; and, after some time, the lord Say and Sele brought in a Draught of what they had to offer for that purpose; which was as follows:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; We your loyal subjects, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, having a deep sense of the present miseries of this your kingdom, and of the Christian blood, the blood of your subjects, that hath been spilt in this unnatural war: to prevent the desolation and ruin of this kingdom, the destruction of your people, and the danger of your own royal person and children, do again, in all humility, petition your majesty, that you will be pleased, before the armies be engaged in battle, they being now drawn near together, to accept of our humble Answer to your majesty's first Proposition, and agree unto the first Proposition presented unto you by the hands of our commissioners, for the Disbanding of all Armies; whereby your kingdom will be restored to the former happy condition of peace, and the sad accidents and consequences of a civil war be prevented; and that, as the most likely means to compose and settle these unhappy differences between you and your people, you will please to return to your parliament, your great and most faithful council, whose advice your maj. will find more conducing to your greatness, honour, and safety, than the council of some few about you; whose counsels if they may prevail, we find all our petitions and endeavours for the peace of this kingdom, to be fruitless.—If God shall make us so happy as to incline your majesty's heart to this our humble Petition, which your parliament and kingdom may expect from your justice and goodness; our endeavours and counsels shall all be directed to settle the true protestant religion, your majesty's just rights, the preservation and safety of your royal person and children, and the laws of the kingdom, the liberties of the subject, and the privileges of parliament."

Ordered, That this Petition be communicated to the commons at a conference.

The King's Proclamation forbidding Obedience to the Parliament, and for calling the Members to him at Oxford.] June 26. The lord Say and Sele acquainted the lords, That he had received a Letter from the King, in which was inclosed a Proclamation from his majesty, which was read:

"Whereas we have been long since driven by force and violence from our palace at Westminster, (the place of sitting for us and our two houses of this parliament) so that we could not, with safety of our life, be present with our Great Council; and much the greater part of the members of both houses have been likewise driven by tumults and force, for their safety, from their attendance upon that council, the said members having been threatened and assaulted for delivering their opinions freely in the houses; or have, out of conscience and duty, withdrawn themselves from being present at the debates and resolutions, which they have well known to be so contrary to their duty and allegiance; or for so withdrawing, or for freely speaking in the houses, have been expelled or suspended from being members of that council, contrary to the antient practice and just privileges of parliament. Since which time, and by which means, a great and rebellious army hath been raised against us, under the command of Robert earl of Essex; which army hath not only endeavoured to take away our life from us in a set battle, but the same, and other forces raised by the like means, have committed all the acts of outrage, robbery, and murder, upon our good subjects throughout the kingdom, and still continue to do the same.—And though, in truth, a very small part of that Great Council remain there together; yet, under pretence of having the countenance of our two houses of parliament, some seditious persons assume to themselves (with the assistance of those rebellious armies, and of divers mutinous and desperate Brownists, Anabaptists, and other ill-affected persons in our city of London, by whose means they awe such members of both houses who yet continue amongst them) a power to do things absolutely contrary to the laws of the land, and destructive to our rights, and to the liberty and property of the subject, and to alter the whole frame and government of this kingdom; disposing of the lives and fortunes of us and our good subjects, according to their discretion; subjecting both to their own unlimited arbitrary power and government.—We have only accused some particular persons, whom we well know to be the authors and contrivers of these deperate counsels and actions; and have forborne to censure, or charge, the whole number of the members remaining, by whose orders and authority the evils have been pretended to be done; hoping that the sense of the miserable distractions of the kingdom would, at length, have brought them to discern where they had erred; and our often Messages and complaints of the violence offered to us, and to the members of both houses, would have procured justice and redress: and that the power and reputation of such amongst them, who wished well to the peace of the kingdom, and honour and dignity of parliaments, would have at last so far prevailed, that a right understanding might have been begotten betwixt us and our people; and all shew of force and violence so taken away and suppressed, that we might, in a full and peaceable convention of parliament, with the advice of that our Great Council, have so settled the present distempers, that there might be no fear left of the like for the future.—But finding, to our great grief, that the power of those seditious persons, who first contrived these desperate and bloody distractions, continues so great; that as they have driven, and now keep us, and the much greater part of both houses, from being present at that Council; so they so far awe those who remain there, that they cannot, with freedom, give their Votes and Resolutions according to their consciences, and the laws and constitutions of the kingdom: that the members of both houses have been compelled to make Protestations to live and die with the Earl of Essex, the general of the rebellious army, and other unlawful and treasonable Protestations; and that such who have refused to take the said Protestations, have been expelled and imprisoned for such their refusal: that the great affairs of the kingdom are managed and concluded by a private committee, without being ever reported to the houses, contrary to the laws and rules of parliament: that the common council of London, most of them being persons factiously chosen out of Brownists, Anabaptists, and such who oppose the regular wholesome government of that city, and have promised themselves the destruction of the church, are grown the superintendants over both houses, and obtrude upon them what conclusions and resolutions they please: that they take upon them to justify this Rebellion against us, and have presumed, under pretence of the Order of both houses, to invite foreign forces to invade this kingdom: to send agents to foreign princes, to negotiate and treat with them in their own names: to imprison our good subjects contrary to law, prohibiting our judges to grant habeas corpus according to law: to introduce a new clergy throughout the kingdom, by displacing godly learned divines, without the least colour of law or judicial proceedings, and putting ignorant and seditious preachers in their places, to poison the hearts of the people: to countenance the vilifying of the Book of the Common-Prayer, established by the law of the land: to seize, levy, and take away what they please of the estates and fortunes of our subjects, by disposing of the 20th part of their estates, by exhausting them with unsupportable Weekly Taxes for the maintenance of their rebellious army, and by endeavouring to lay odious exercises upon victuals, goods, and merchandize of our people for the same purpose; while they suffer our poor protestant subjects of our kingdom of Ireland, whose defence was undertaken by our two houses, and that army raised for the suppressing of that horrid Rebellion to be starved and in danger of disbanding, or necessitated to desert that kingdom for want of money, victuals, and such other necessities as were to be provided for them by act of parliament, out of those monies which they have spent to destroy us and this kingdom: by exacting from merchants Tunnage and Poundage, and other impositions upon merchandizes, as well native as foreign, contrary to an act made this present parliament, with a penalty of premunire on those who shall pay or receive it: and, lastly, That they have (after the breaking off the late Treaty, by a peremptory recalling their committee, who, in truth, during their abode with us, had no power to treat by reason of their strict limitation) so far rejected all possible means and overtures of treaty and accommodation, that, instead of answering our gracious Messages, the house of commons hath imprisoned our messenger sent by us to them, to invite both houses to an Accommodation; and especially to move them to take such a course for the freedom of parliament, that we might safely advise with that our Great Council for the settling those miserable distractions and distempers: and hath maliciously, and in contempt of us, (after an attempt to murder our royal consort in Bridlington Road, the place of her landing) impeached her of high treason, for assisting us with arms and ammunition to defend us from this rebellion: it is time now to let our good subjects know, that they may no longer look upon the votes and actions of the persons now remaining, as upon our two houses of parliament; freedom and liberty to be present, and of opinion and debate there, being essential to a parliament; which freedom and liberty all men must confess to be taken away from this assembly, when they remember the great tumults brought down to awe and terrify both houses; and that they were then brought down when any great debate was in either house, and not like to be so carried as some seditious persons, who governed those tumults, did desire; that, in the greatest heat and fury of those tumults, the principal governors amongst them directed the unruly people to go to Whitehall, where our own person then was; and designed, by force, to have surprized the person of our son the prince; that, when it was desired that a Declaration might be made against such tumults, instead of consenting thereunto, the tumults themselves were justified; and when a legal course was prescribed by the lords, and taken by the proper ministers of justice, to suppress and prevent such tumults and riots, that legal course was superseded by those who were then present of the house of commons, and the ministers of justice punished and imprisoned for executing the law. When they remember that several members of either house have been threatened and assaulted in those tumults, and their own names proscribed as persons disaffected, because they freely used to speak their consciences in both houses: that the house of peers have been so far threatened and menaced, that the names of those have been, with threats, demanded by the house of commons at the bar of the lords house, who refused to consent to this or that proposition which had been in debate before them; and tumultuous Petitions countenanced, which have been presented to that same purpose: that the members of both houses have been imprisoned, and forbid to be present at those councils, for no reasons but because their opinion hath not been liked: that our negative voice (our greatest and most sovereign privilege) is boldly denied: that a presumptuous attempt hath been made by the major part of the remaining part of the house of commons to make our Great Seal of England; the making of which, by the express letter of the law, is High Treason, and would subvert the antient and fundamental administration of justice: that, at this time, we and the major part of both houses are kept, by a strong and rebellious army, from being present at that Council; and that those who are present are, by the same army, awed and forced to take unlawful and treasonable Protestations to engage their votes: and that such resolutions and directions, which concern the property and liberty of the subjects, are transacted and concluded by a few persons, (under the name of a Close Committee, consisting of the earl of Manchester, the lord Say, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Stroud, Mr. Martin, and others, the whole number not exceeding 17 persons) without reporting the same to the houses, or having the same confirmed by the houses, contrary to the express law and customs of parliament.—All these, for the matter of fact, we are ready to make proof of, and desire nothing but to bring the contrivers of all the aforesaid mischiefs to their trial by law; and, till that be submitted to, we must pursue them by arms or any other way, in which our good subjects ought to give us assistance to that purpose: the imagining the death of us, our royal consort, or our eldest son; the levying war against us in our realm, giving to them aid or comfort; the counterfeiting our Great Seal or Money, being by the express words of the statute of the 25th of Edw. 3. c. 2. high treason: and how applicable this is to those who have borne arms against us, and to those who have consented that such arms be borne; to those who have promised to live and die with the earl of Essex, and to those who every day consent to some act for the support and increase of that army, we shall leave to all the world to judge; and hope that this gracious warning and information, now given by us, will make that impression in the hearts of our people, that they will no longer suffer themselves to be misled from their duty and allegiance upon any pretences whatsoever; and we do declare, That we shall proceed with all severity against all persons whatsoever, who shall henceforward assist, vote, or concur in any kind toward the maintenance and countenancing such actions and resolutions, which, by the known and express laws of the land, are high treason; and against all those who shall adhere to them, who are in rebellion against us, as against rebels and traitors, in such manner as by the laws and statutes of the realm is directed and appointed.—And since by the power of seditious persons, we and both houses are kept from being secured against tumultuous assemblies, and both houses from adjournment to some place of safety; which, being done, might quickly make an end of these miserable distractions, whereby we are debarred from the benefit and advice we expected from that our Great Council, the members thereof being scattered into several places: therefore, that the whole kingdom may see that we are willing to receive advice from those who are trusted by them, though we cannot receive the same in the place to which they were called, for the reasons aforesaid, nor intend to receive advice from them elsewhere in the capacity of houses of parliament: We do hereby declare, That such of the members of both houses, as well those who have been by the faction of the Malignant Party expelled for performing their duties to us, and into whose rooms no persons have been since chosen by their countries, as the rest who shall desire our protection, shall be welcome to us at our city of Oxford; until, by the adjournment of the houses to some fit and free place, or otherwise, due course be taken for the full and free convention in parliament of us and all the members of both houses: and for their better encouragement to resort to us, we hereby will and command all the officers and soldiers of our army to suffer all such persons who are members of either house, with their attendants and servants, to come to us to this our city of Oxford.—And that none of our good subjects may believe that, by this our necessary Declaration against the freedom and liberty of that present assembly, we may have the least intention to violate or to avoid any act or acts passed by us for the good and benefit of our people this parliament; we do hereby declare to all the world, That we shall, as we have often promised, as inviolably observe all those acts, as if no such unhappy interruption had happened in the freedom and liberty of that council: and desire nothing more than to have such a free convention in parliament, that we may add such further acts of grace as shall be thought necessary for the advancement of the true protestant religion, for the maintenance of the liberty and property of the subjects, and the preservation of the liberty, freedom, and privileges of parliament.—And that all the world may see how willing and desirous we are to forget all the injuries and indignities offered to us by such who have been misled through weakness or fear, or who have not been the principal contrivers of the present miseries; we do offer a free and general Pardon to all the members of either house (except Robert e. of Essex, Rob. e. of Warwick, Edw. e. of Manchester, Henry e. of Stamford, Wm. visc. Say and Sele, sir John Hotham, sir Arth. Haslerig, sir H. Ludlow, sir Edw. Hungerford, and sir Francis Popham; Nath. Fiennes, John Hampden, John Pym, William Stroud, Henry Martyn, and Alex. Popham; Isaac Pennington alderman of London, and captain Ven; who, being the principal authors of these present calamities, have sacrificed the peace and prosperity of their country to their own pride, malice, and ambition; and against whom we shall proceed as against persons guilty of high treason by the known laws of the land; and shall, in the proceeding, be most careful to preserve to them all privileges in the fullest manner that, by the law or the usage of former times, is due to them, if they shall, within ten days after the publishing of this our Proclamation, return to their duty and allegiance to us.—And, lastly, we further command and enjoin all our subjects, upon their allegiance to us, as they will answer the contrary to Almighty God, and as they desire that they and their posterity should be freed from the foul taint of high treason, and as they tender the peace of this kingdom, That they presume not to give any assistance to the before-mentioned rebellious armies, in their persons or estates in any sort whatsoever; but join with us, according to their duty and the laws of the land, to suppress this horrid rebellion. And our pleasure and command is, That this our Proclamation be read in all churches and chapels within this our kingdom. Given at our Court at Oxford, the 20th of June, 1643."

Resolutions of the Lords on the foregoing Proclamation.] After reading this Proclamation the lords agreed, That it declared this parliament to be no true parliament; and that the king would not receive whatsoever came from them; thereupon they resolved to communicate this to the commons, at a conference, and appointed a committee of 4 lords to consider of the sense of this house, to be delivered on this occasion; as, also, to draw up a proper Answer to the Proclamation. Soon after the lord Say and Sele, from this committee, brought in the following:—"The lords do apprehend that the foregoing Proclamation, whereby this parliament is declared to be no free parliament, and the people are required not to look upon the votes or actions of the persons now remaining as upon the two houses of parliament, is destructive as to the present parliament and all acts therein, so also to the established government of this kingdom; which Declaration being maintained and pursued by force, the lords do conceive themselves bound to defend this present parliament, and to maintain the freedom thereof, with their lives and fortunes, and are resolved so to do. They think it fit, also, that a Declaration be made to that purpose to all the kingdom, and to invite therein all Englishmen to join with them; assuring such as shall do so that they shall be embraced and received into the protection of the parliament, and acknowledged as those who have done a good service to the state; except it be such persons who shall appear to be the contrivers of these destructive counsels, those to be named and excepted in the Declaration; and to this end to desire, that a committee of both houses may be named to meet to draw up the Declaration, their lordships being resolved to name four lords for that purpose."

Letter from the E. of Essex, desiring the Advice of Parliament.] July 1. The Speaker acquainted the lords, that he had received a Letter from the Lord-General; which was read as follows:

"My lord; Since the coming of the army to this place, the unseasonableness of the weather, and some other accidents, hath prevented many things which I purposed to have attempted, had God seen it fit; and therefore I much desire that some of the lords of your house might be sent down, together with some of the commons, that we may debate things of great necessity to be considered of; which I must desire may be done with all possible speed; that, upon a result of what may be offered, you may receive full satisfaction of our condition; which I leave to the wisdom of the house, resting, &c.

"ESSEX. Thame, June 30, 1643."

A conference being held between the two houses on the subject of this Letter, the result of it was, That the lords named the earl of Holland and the lord Grey of Werk to go, with a proportionable number of the commons, to the general: but the next day of meeting, July 3, the said lords being returned, reported to the house, That they set out on their Journey, and got as far as Aylesbury, where they met with another letter from the lord-general, informing them that the king's forces were abroad that way; and therefore advising them not to proceed any further.

Mr. Waller's Speech in his own Defence, concerning the late Plot.] July 4. Mr. Waller was brought to the bar of the commons in order to answer to his charge for being concerned in the late Plot; when his examinations and confessions were shewn unto him, he acknowledged them all to be true. Then being told by the Speaker, if he had any thing more to say, either as to the Plot, or for himself, he had leave to do so, he made the following speech to the house:

"Mr. Speaker; I acknowledge it a great mercy of God, and a great favour from you, that I am, once more, suffered to behold this honourable assembly. I mean not to make use of it to say any thing in my own defence, by justification or denial of what I have done. I have already confessed enough to make me appear worthy, not only to be put out of this house, but out of the world too. All my humble request to you is, that if I seem to you as unworthy to live as I do to myself, I may have the honour to receive my death from your own hands, and not to be exposed to a trial by the council of war: whatever you shall think me worthy to suffer in a parliamentary way, is not like to find stop any where else—This, sir, I hope you will be pleased, for your own sakes, to grant me; who am already so miserable, that nothing can be added to my calamity—but to be made the occasion of creating a precedent to your own disadvantage: besides the right I may have to this, consider, I beseech you, that the eyes of the world are upon you. You govern in chief, and if you should expose your own members to the punishment of others, it will be thought that you either want power, or leisure, to chastise them yourselves: nor let any man despise the ill consequence of such a precedent, as this would be, because he seeth not presently the inconveniences which may ensue: you have many armies on foot, and it is uncertain how long you may have occasion to use them. Soldiers and commanders (though I know well they of the parliament's army excell no less in modesty, than they do in courage) are generally of a nature ready to pretend to the utmost power of this kind, which they conceive to be due to them; and may be too apt, upon any occasion of discontent, to make use of such a precedent as this. In this very parliament you have not been without some taste of the experience hereof; it is now somewhat more than two years since you had an army in the North, paid and directed by yourselves; and yet you may be pleased to remember there was a considerable number of officers in that army, which joined in a Petition, or Remonstrance, to this house, taking notice of what some of the members had said here, as they supposed, to their disadvantage, and did little less than require them of you. It is true, there had been some tampering with them; but what has happened, at one time, may wisely be thought possible to fall out again at another. —Sir, I presume but to point you out the danger: if it be not just, I know you will not do me the wrong to expose me to this trial; if it be just, your army may another time require the same justice of you in their own behalf, against some other member, whom, perhaps, you would be less willing to part with. Necessity has, of late, forced you into untrodden paths; and in such a case as this, where you have no precedent of your own, you may not do amiss to look abroad upon other states and senates, which exercise the supreme power, as you now do here.—I dare confidently say you shall find none, either antient or modern, which ever exposed any of their own order to be tried for his life, by the officers of their armies abroad, for what he did while he resided among them in the senate. Among the Romans the practice was so contrary, that some inferior officers in their army, far from the city, having been sentenced by their general or commander in chief, as deserving death by their discipline of war, have nevertheless (because they were senators) appealed thither, and the cause has received a new hearing in the senate.—Not to use more words to persuade you to take heed that you wound not yourselves, through my sides, in violating the privileges belonging to your own persons, I shall humbly desire you to consider likewise the nature of my offence; (not but that I should be much ashamed to say any thing in diminution thereof: God knows it is horrid enough for the evil it might have occasioned) but if you look near it, it may, perhaps, appear to be rather a civil than a martial crime, and so to have title to a trial at the common law of the land: there may, justly, be some difference put between me and others in this business.—I have had nothing to do with the other army, or any intention to begin the offer of violence to any body; it was only a civil pretence to that which I then, foolishly, conceived to be the right of the subject. I humbly refer it to your considerations, and to your consciences. I know you will take care not to shed that blood by the law of war, which hath a right to be tried by the law of peace.—For so much as concerns myself and my part in this business, (if I were worthy to have any thing spoken, or patiently heard, in my behalf) this might truly be said, That I made not this business but found it; it was in other men's hands long before it was brought to me, and when it came I extended it not, but restrained it. For the proposition of letting in part of the king's army, or offering violence to the members of this house, I ever disallowed, and utterly rejected them.—What it was that moved me to entertain discourse of this business, so far as I did, I will tell you ingenuously; and that rather as a warning for others, than it makes any thing for myself; it was only an impatience of the inconveniences of the present war, looking on things with a carnal eye, and not minding that which chiefly, if not only, ought to have been considered, the inestimable value of the cause you have in hand, the cause of God and of religion; and the necessities you are forced upon for the maintenance of the same. As a just punishment for this neglect, it pleased God to desert me and suffer me, with a fatal blindness, to be led on and engaged in such counsels as were wholly disproportioned to the rest of my life. This, sir, my own conscience tells me was the cause of my falling, and not malice, or any ill habit of mind or disposition toward the commonwealth, or to the parliament: for from whence should I have it? If you look on my birth you will not find it in my blood: I am of a stock which hath borne you better fruit. If you look on my education, it hath been almost from my childhood in this house, and amongst the best sort of men; and for the whole practice of my life, till this time, if another were to speak for me, he might reasonably say, That neither my actions out of parliament, nor my expressions in it, have favoured of disaffection or malice to the liberties of the people or privileges of parliament.—Thus, Sir, I have set before your eyes, both my person and my case; wherein I shall make no such defence by denying or extenuating any thing I have done, as ordinary delinquents do. My address to you, and all my plea, shall only be such as children use to their parents, I have offended, I confess it. I never did any thing like it before. It is a passage unsuitable to the whole course of my life beside; and for the time to come, as God, that can bring light out of darkness, hath made this business in the event useful to you, so also hath he to me: you have by it made an happy discovery of your enemies, and I of myself and the evil principles I walked by; so that if you look either on what I have been heretofore, or what I now am, and, by God's grace assisting me, I shall always continue to be, you may perhaps think me fit to be an example of your compassion and clemency, —Sir, I shall no sooner leave you, but my life will depend on your breath; and not that alone, but the subsistence of some that are more innocent. I might therefore shew you my children, whom the rigour of your justice would make compleat orphans, being already motherless. I might shew you a family, wherein there are some unworthy to have their share in that mark of infamy, which now threatens me: but something there is, which if I could shew you, would move you more than all this; it is my heart, which abhors what I have done more, and is more severe to itself, than the severest judge can be. A heart, Mr. Speaker, so awakened by this affliction, and so intirely devoted to the cause you maintain, that I earnestly desire of God to incline you so to dispose of me, whether for life or death, as may most conduce to the advancement thereof.—Sir, not to trouble you any longer, if I die I shall die praying for you; if I live I shall live serving you; and render you back the use and employment of all those days you shall add to my life."

Mr. Waller expelled.] After this speech, Mr. Waller having withdrawn, he was called in again; and, being by the Speaker required thereto, gave the house an exact account how he came first to the knowledge of this business; as also what lords were acquainted therewith, or had engaged themselves therein. Notwithstanding which he was expelled the house; and so being left to the Council of War, as all the rest of the conspirators had been, he was condemned to die. But Whitlocke tells us, "That the lord-general granted him a reprieve; and, after a year's imprisonment, and paying a fine of 10,000*l.* he was discharged, and travelled into France."

Information of sir J. Hotham's intending to deliver up Hull.] July 4. The commons having received information of some design of betraying Hull to the king, in which sir John Hotham and his son were concerned, sent sir Wm. Strickland up to the lords with a message and several intercepted letters from the aforesaid sir John and his son; in consideration of which, he said, the commons had come to some Resolutions for the better securing and preserving that fortress; which were these: "That sir Wm. Strickland and Mr. Hatcher, members of their house, with the mayor of Hull and sir Matthew Boynton, should be appointed a committee for the government of Hull; and that the former two should go down forthwith to take it upon them: That sir M. Boynton should be appointed colonel of the garrison in that town, and recommended to the general for a commission for that purpose. Sir H. Vane, jun. and Peregrine Pelham, esq. members for Hull, with sir Wm. Allanson, were also added;" to all which the lords agreed.

The Commons order a new Great Seal to be made.] In this message the commons again pressed the lords to consent to the making of a new Great Seal, because, they said, the kingdom was not able to subsist without it; but the lords let them know, That they adhered, in this, to their former resolution; which, when the commons understood, they resolved to give orders for making a new Great Seal themselves, and appointed a committee to see it done with all speed: but they made no use of it till the lords gave their consent on the 12th of Oct. following. The form of it was, a representation of the house of commons, the members sitting, on one side; and the arms of England and Ireland, on the other.

The Lords agree to invite the Scots.] July 5. The commons having received Information of the ill success of the lord Fairfax in the North, and that the marquis of Newcastle had entirely routed his forces at Atherton-Moor, near Bradford, were in great consternation: and, this day, at a conference, communicated this bad news to the lords; earnestly pressing them to nominate a committee of their house, to go forthwith into Scotland, and to desire the Scots nation to send aid and assistance into England against the papists and others, now in arms to destroy the Protestant religion and the liberty of this kingdom. The lords agreed to this, and ordered the lord Grey of Werk to attend the house the next morning for that purpose.

July 11. A Letter from the lord-general, was read in the house of lords, desiring to have 500 horse sent him presently, to recruit his army, and 200 horse a month provided for the same purpose; as likewise a magazine of saddles and horse arms. Another letter of a later date, from the general, was also read, setting forth the distressed condition of his army. Both the houses agreed to supply the lord-general, as he desired; all the troops then raised in London, except those for the immediate defence of it, were ordered to march forthwith; and that there should be a course to supply him with horse, arms, and saddles. There was necessity sufficient for a general reinforcement at this time, the king's troops being every where victorious; for, besides the great victory in the North, already mentioned, sir Wm. Waller was defeated in the West, by the lord Wilmot, sir Ralph Hopton, &c. and his army totally ruined. Prince Rupert had also taken Bristol; so that the king's affairs were now in the most flourishing condition that they ever had been throughout the whole war.

The King's Declaration, after his Victory in the North and West, and the taking of Bristol.] On the day after the king received advice of the taking of Bristol, he published the following Declaration, addressed to all his loving subjects:

"As the grievance and losses of no particular persons, since these miserable bloody distempers have disquieted this poor kingdom, can be compared to the loss and damage we ourselves have sustained, there having been no victory obtained but in the blood of our own subjects, nor no rapine or violence committed, but to the impoverishment and ruin of our own people; so a blessed and happy peace cannot be so acceptable and welcome to any man as to us. Almighty God, to whom all the secrets of our heart are open, who hath so often and so miraculously preserved us, and to whose power alone we must attribute the goodness of our present condition, how unhappy soever it is with reference to the public calamities, knows with what unwillingness, with what anguish of soul, we submitted ourself to the necessity of taking up defensive arms. And the world knows with what justice and bounty we have repaired our subjects, for all the pressures and inconveniences they had borne, by such excellent laws as would for ever have prevented the like; and with what earnestness and importunity we desired to add any thing for the establishment of the religion, laws, and liberty of the kingdom. How all these have been disturbed, invaded, and almost destroyed, by faction, sedition, and treason, by those who have neither reverence to God nor affection to men, but have sacrificed both to their own ends and ambition, is now so evident, that we hope, as God hath wonderfully manifested his care of us, and his defence of his and our most just cause, so he hath so far touched the hearts of our people, that their eyes are at last opened to see how miserably they have been seduced, and to abhor those persons whose malice and subtilty had seduced them to dishonour him, to rebel against us, and to bring much misery and calamity upon their native country.—We well remember the Protestation voluntarily made by us, in the head of that small army we were master of in September last, to defend and maintain the true reformed protestant religion: and if it should please God, by his blessing upon that army, to preserve us from this rebellion, that we would maintain the just privileges and freedom of parliament, and govern by the known laws of the land; for whose defence, in truth, that army was only raised, and hath since been kept up. And there cannot be a more seasonable time to renew that Protestation than now, when God hath vouchsafed us so many victories and successes, and hath rendered the power of those, who seek to destroy us, less formidable than it hath been, (so that we shall probably not fall under the scandalous imputation, which hath usually attended our Messages of Peace, that they proceed from the weakness of our power, not love of our people) and when there is more freedom in many counties, for our good subjects to receive true information of their own and our condition; the knowledge whereof hath been, with equal industry and injustice, kept from them, as other acts of cruelty have been imposed on them.—We do therefore declare to all the world, in the presence of Almighty God, to whom we must give a strict account of all our professions and protestations, That we are so far from intending any alteration of the religion established, (as hath been often falsely, scandalously, and against the conscience of the contrivers themselves of that rumour, suggested to our people) or from the least thought of invading the liberty and property of the subject, or violating the just privileges of parliament, that we call that God to witness, who hath covered our head in the day of battle, that we desire from our soul, and shall always use our utmost endeavour, to preserve and advance the true Reformed Protestant Religion, established in the Church of England, in which we were born, have faithfully lived, and, by the grace of God, shall resolutely die: That the preservation of the liberty and property of the subject, in the due observation of the known laws of the land, shall be equally our care, as the maintenance of our own rights; we desiring to govern only by those good laws, which, till they were oppressed by this odious rebellion, preserved this nation happy. And we do acknowledge the just privileges of parliament to be an essential part of those laws, and shall, therefore, most solemnly defend and observe them; so that, in truth, if either religion, law, or liberty, be precious to our people, they will, by their submission to us, join with us in the defence of them, and thereby establish that peace, by which only they can flourish and be enjoyed.—Whether these men that be professed enemies to the established Ecclesiastical government; who reproach and persecute the learned orthodox ministers of the church, and into their places put ignorant, seditious, and schismatical preachers; who vilify the Book of Common Prayer, and impiously profane God's worship with their scurrilous and seditious demeanor, are like to advance that religion: whether those men, who boldly, and without the least shadow or colour of law, impose insupportable Taxes and odious Exercises upon their fellow-subjects, imprison, torment, and murder them, are like to preserve the liberty and property of the subject: and whether those men, who seize and possess themselves of our own unquestionable revenue, and our just rights; have denied us our negative voice; have, by force and violence, awed and terrified the members of both houses; and, lastly, have, as far as in them lies, dissolved the present parliament, by driving away and imprisoning the members, and resolving the whole power thereof, and more, into a committee of a few men, contrary to all law, custom, or precedent, are like to vindicate and uphold the privileges of parliament, all the world may judge.—We do, therefore, once more, conjure our good subjects, by their memory of that excellent peace and firm happiness with which it pleased God to reward their duty and loyalty in time past; by their Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, which no Vow or Covenant, contrived and administered to and by themselves, can cancel or evade; by whatsoever is dear and precious to them in this life, or hoped or prayed for in the life to come, that they will remember their duty and consider their interest; and no longer suffer themselves to be misled, their prince dishonoured, and their country wasted and undone, by the malice and cunning of those state impostors;

who, under pretence of reformation, would introduce whatsoever is monstrous and unnatural both to religion and policy: but that they rather chuse quietly to enjoy their religion, property, and liberty, founded and provided for by the wisdom and industry of former times, and secured and enlarged by the blessings upon the present age, than to spend their lives and fortunes to purchase confusion, and to make themselves liable to the most intolerable kind of slavery, that is, to be slaves to their fellow-subjects; who, by their prodigious unheard-of acts of oppression and tyranny, have given them sufficient evidence what they are to expect at their hands.—And let not our good people, who have been misled, or, through want of understanding or want of courage, submitted themselves to unwarrantable and disloyal actions, be taught, by these seducers, that their safety now consists in despair; and that they can only secure themselves, for the ills they have done, by a resolute and peremptory disobedience. Revenge and blood-thirstiness have never been imputed to us, even by those who have not left either our government or nature unexamined with the greatest boldness and malice. And all those who, since these bloody distractions, out of conscience have returned from their evil ways to us, have found that it was not so easy for them to repent as for us to forgive. And whosoever have been misled by those whose hearts, from the beginning, have designed all this mischief, and shall redeem their past crimes by their present service and loyalty, in the apprehending or opposing such who shall continue to bear arms against us, and shall use their utmost endeavours to reduce those men to their due obedience, and to restore this kingdom to its wonted peace, shall have cause to magnify our mercy, and to repent the trespasses committed against so just and so gracious a sovereign.—Lastly, we desire all our good subjects who have really assisted, or really wished us well, now God hath done such wonderful things for us, vigorously to endeavour to put an end to all these miseries, by bringing in men, money, plate, horses, or arms, to our aid; that so we, being not wanting to ourselves, may, with confidence, expect the continuance of God's favour, to restore us all to that blessed harmony of affections, which may establish a firm peace; without the speedy obtaining of which, this poor kingdom will be utterly undone, though not absolutely lost."

Lord Fairfax appointed Governor of Hull.] July 12. At the desire of the commons, the lord Fairfax was made governor of Hull, instead of the commissioners before-named. Sir J. Hotham and his son, with other prisoners concerned in the design upon that town, were now brought up to London; and, this day, a committee extraordinary was appointed by the commons, to take their examinations, and to do all other acts that might tend to the discovery of the whole business. Ordered, also, That no member of that house, or any other person, should visit sir John or his son, nor send any messages to them, without leave of the house.

Lord Grey of Werk committed to the Tower, &c. for refusing to go to invite the Scots Army.] July 17. The lord Grey of Werk having a post in the parliament's army, as lieut. general under the earl of Essex, his lordship shewed great reluctance to go into Scotland, notwithstanding the Lords had joined the earl of Rutland in the commission with him. He made many excuses to avoid this embassy, as leaving his charge, which at this time, the armies being so near one another, would reflect upon his honour: he desired, also, that he might be excused, on account of an ill disposition of body, which would not endure a sea voyage, the only way the parliament had now to send to the Scots with any safety. His lordship making the same excuses to the lords, this day, was ordered to withdraw; when that house, taking into consideration the whole progress of this business, and that, upon his submission to their pleasure, they had appointed a peremptory day for his going, and had also acquainted the commons therewith, the lords therefore insisted on their Order, that he should go; and the earls of Pembroke, Denbigh, and Bolingbroke, were sent out to acquaint him with it. Soon after the said earls returned with this Answer, "That the lord Grey submitted to go, if the house did command him; but desired them to present to their lordships two Petitions: 1. That he might enjoy his place of command in the army. 2. That when he had been in Scotland a-while, and settled affairs in some forwardness, if he found his health so ill that he could not stay there without prejudice to himself and the service, that, upon his humble suit and information thereof to the house, he might be permitted to return home." But the lords not thinking it fit to have any conditions put upon them, ordered the lord Grey to be called in again, and the Speaker to demand his positive Answer: he then said, 'He was not able to go on account of his health.' Hereupon, that house taking this for an absolute denial of their commands, and considering his former Answer in order to vindicate the honour of their house by some exemplary punishment, resolved, That the lord Grey, for his disobedience, should forthwith, be sent prisoner to the Tower. And, the next day, his commission in the army was also taken from him; though, very soon after, he was released from his imprisonment, without any petition, but not restored to his command in the army.

Petition from the Assembly of Divines.] July 19. The following Petition was presented to the lords from the Assembly of Divines sitting at Westminster:

To the right Hon. the lords and COMMONS assembled in Parliament, The HUMBLE PETITION of divers MINISTERS of CHRIST, in the Name of themselves and of sundry others,
"Humbly sheweth, That your petitioners, upon serious consideration, and deep sense of God's heavy wrath lying on us, and hanging over our heads and the whole nation, and manifested particularly by the two late sad and unexpected defeats of our forces in the North and in the West, do apprehend it to be our duty; as watchmen for the good of the church and kingdom, to present to your religious and prudent consideration these ensuing requests, in the name of Jesus Christ, your Lord and ours: 1st. That you would be pleased to command a public and extraordinary day of humiliation, this week, throughout the cities of London, Westminster, the suburbs of both, and places adjacent within the weekly bills of mortality, that every one may bitterly bewail his own sins, and cry mightily unto God, for Christ's sake, to remove his wrath, and to heal the land; with professed and renewed resolutions of more full performance of the late Covenant, for the amendment of our ways. 2nd, That you would vouchsafe instantly to take it into your most serious consideration, how you may most speedily set up Christ more gloriously in all his ordinances within this kingdom, and reform all things amiss throughout the land, wherein God is more specially and more immediately dishonoured: among which we humbly lay before you these Particulars; 1. That the brutish ignorance and palpable darkness possessing the greatest part of the people in all places of the kingdom, whereby they are utterly unfit to wait upon God in any holy duty, (to the great dishonour of the gospel, and the everlasting endangering of their poor souls) may be remedied by a speedy and strict charge to all ministers, constantly to catechize all the youth and ignorant people, they being commanded to be subject to it, and all sorts to be present at it; and information to be given of all persons who shall withstand or neglect it. 2. That the grievous and heinous pollution of the Lord's Supper, by those that are grossly ignorant and notoriously profane, may be henceforth, with all Christian care and due circumspection, prevented. 3. That the bold venting of corrupt doctrines, directly contrary to the sacred law of God, and religious humiliation for sin, which open a wide door to all libertinism and disobedience to God and man, may be speedily suppressed every where, and that in such manner as may give hope that the church may be no more infected with them. 4. That the profanation of any part of the Lord's Day, and the days of solemn Fasting, by buying, selling, working, sporting, travelling, or neglecting of God's ordinances, may be remedied by appointing special officers in every place, for the due execution of all good laws and ordinances against the same. 5. That there may be a thorough and speedy proceeding against blind guides and scandalous ministers, by whose wickedness people either lack or loath the ordinances of the lord, and thousands of souls perish; and the removal of the Ark from among us, is, to the trembling of our hearts, evidently threatened: and that your wisdoms would find out some way to admit into the ministry such godly and hopeful men as have prepared themselves and are willing thereunto; without which there will suddenly be such a scarcity of able and faithful ministers, that it will be to little purpose to cast out such as are unable, idle, or scandalous. 6. That the laws may be quicken'd against Swearing and Drunkenness, with which the land is filled and defiled, and under which it mourneth. 7. That some severe course may be taken against Fornication, Adultery, and Incest, which do greatly abound, especially of late, by reason of impunity. 8. That all Monuments of Idolatry and Superstition, but more especially the whole body and practice of Popery, may be totally abolished. 9. That justice may be executed on all delinquents, according to your solemn and religious Vow and Protestation to that purpose. 10. That all possible means may be used for the speedy relief and release of our miserable and extremely distressed brethren, who are prisoners in Oxford, York, and elsewhere, whose heavy sufferings cry loud in the ears of our God; and it would lie very heavy upon the kingdom should they miscarry, suffering as they do for the cause of God. That so God, who is now, by the sword, avenging the quarrel of his covenant, beholding your integrity and zeal, may turn from the fierceness of his wrath, hear our prayers, go forth with our armies, perfect the work of reformation, forgive our sins and settle truth and peace throughout the kingdom. And the petitioners shall ever pray, &c."

This Petition was signed by 47 of the Assembly; and in Answer to it, the lords appointed the next Friday for a solemn Day of Humiliation; and for the rest, they would take the same into consideration.

Commissioners appointed to go into Scotland.] This day a Message from the lords was sent down to the commons, importing, "That since by the earl of Rutland's indisposition of health, he cannot go as their Commissioner into Scotland so speedily as the business requires, and that the lord Grey is imprisoned for contempt, they would think of another lord to be sent in his stead: but, least the affair should suffer by further delay, the lords desired, That the commons would send their Commissioners away presently; and the other should follow with all convenient speed."—About the same time, the commons sent up copies of Credential Letters for their Commissioners, directed to the lord chancellor of Scotland, and the council of state there, and another to the earl of Leven, inviting him to take the command of the army which the Scots should send into England, as having been the Scots general against the rebels in Ireland: assuring him, That it would lay upon this state and them such an obligation, as they should study to answer in a manner proportionable, &c. Along with the former was sent, by the commissioners, a Declaration of the lords and commons in England to the general assembly of the church of Scotland, recommending their commissioners to them; as also, Mr. Stephen Marshall and Mr. Philip Nye, both ministers of God's Word, and men of approved faithfulness and abilities in their functions. Also a Declaration of the lords and commons in England, to the kingdom and states of Scotland.

The Parliament's Instructions to the said Commissioners.] We shall subjoin the parliament's Instructions to their Commissioners, as they stand in the Lords Journals:

INSTRUCTIONS, agreed upon by the LORDS and COMMONS in PARLIAMENT, for John earl of Rutland, sir Wm. Arminyn, bart. sir Henry Vane, jun. knight, Tho. Hatcher, and Henry Darley, esquires, appointed Commissioners to the kingdom of Scotland.

" You shall forthwith repair to the kingdom of Scotland, either to Edinburgh or other parts as you see cause; and you shall make your addresses to the parliament or any deputed by them, to the assembly of the states or any commissioners appointed by them, the general assembly of the church or the commissioners of the general assembly, the lords of the secret council, commissioners for conservation of the peace of the kingdom, the commissioners of common burdens, and such others as shall have power and authority to treat with you, upon such matters as you have received or shall receive in charge, and to negotiate in that kingdom as commissioners of and from the parliament of England. II. You shall take all fit ways and opportunities to make known to the state and nation of Scotland the great miseries, calamities, and dangers, brought upon this church and kingdom by the faction of papists and prelates, and their adherents; whereby we are disabled, for the present, to make payment of those great debts which are owing to them for the remainder of the Brotherly-Assistance money, and the arrear of their army in Ireland. III. You shall take care of stating and settling all accounts, debts and demands, betwixt the two nations of England and Scotland; and, the same being reduced to a certainty, you shall treat and compound for the time and manner of satisfaction for the said debts, in such manner as shall stand with justice and the conveniency of both kingdoms. IV. As touching the remainder of the Brotherly-Assistance money, it is conceived most just and reasonable (because the war upon the subjects and people of Scotland, begun and prosecuted in 1640 and 1641, was procured by the faction of papists, prelates, and their adherents, which was the cause of the coming of the Scots into this kingdom, and of the engagement thereupon made for their satisfaction) that sufficient lands of papists, prelates, and other malignants as have adhered to them, shall, by the direction and appointment of both houses of parliament, be set forth, out of which recompence shall be made for the forbearance of that money, until such time as satisfaction shall be given for the discharge of all the said debts, with the interest and consideration for the forbearance thereof. V. As for the arrears due to the Scots army in Ireland, it being impossible for this state, by reason of the manifold troubles and burdens which lie upon it, to make present payment, it is desired, That our brethren of Scotland think upon some other way how we may give satisfaction, either in the confiscated lands in Ireland by way of adventure, according to the rates and proportions at which they are to be delivered to the English adventurers; or else by instalment, at 4 equal payments, within two years after the peace of this kingdom shall be settled; or else in provision in victuals and apparel, to be delivered at reasonable rates in Scotland, or any other place; or any other way within the power of the two houses, it being our earnest desire to give our brethren full contentment herein, so far as God shall enable us thereunto. VI. You shall, according to the precedent Articles, treat and conclude for the discharge of both the debts aforementioned; that is, the remainder of the Brotherly-Assistance money and the arrear of the army in Ireland, and such further payments as shall grow due, until they shall be dismissed, in any of these ways as shall be agreeable to our brethren: and you shall receive any further or other propositions from them concerning the same; and such propositions certify to the lords and commons in parliament, that so you may receive further directions therein. VII. You shall, with the like plainness and truth, make known to our brethren of Scotland, that we are, by these troubles, made altogether unable to continue the charge of the army in Ireland; therefore, lest it should become too great a burden to them in our disability of payment, we desire the said army may be dismissed in some short time; only such garrisons to be kept on foot, as our brethren shall think fit to retain for the guard of Carrickfergus and Coleraine, according to the treaty in that behalf. VIII. You shall mediate and conclude an establishment of the same garrisons, both for the number of men (not exceeding 2000) and their allowances, which the two houses will undertake to discharge accordingly in money or provisions, at reasonable rates to be agreed upon. IX. You shall put our brethren in mind, That the popish and prelatical faction, which begun with them in 1640 and 1641, and intended to make way for our ruin by theirs, and so to have corrupted and altered religion in the whole island, have not diminished in any part of their malice towards them; or at all departed from their design, but only varied in the manner of their proceeding; conceiving that they have an easy way to destroy them, if they may first prevail over us: and thereupon you shall use your utmost endeavour to persuade and excite our brethren to join with us in the common cause; not only of the two kingdoms, but of all the professors of the Protestant religion; for the total and universal suppression whereof they may discern that the Pope and his faction, in several factions, are strongly combined.

X. You shall desire therefore, That both nations may be straitly united and tied for our mutual defence against the papists and prelatical faction, and their adherents, in both kingdoms; and not lay down arms till they shall be disarmed, and subjected to the authority and justice of parliament in both kingdoms respectively: for the effecting whereof, we desire our brethren of Scotland to raise an army of 10,000 foot and 1000 horse or more, to be forthwith sent against the papists, prelatical faction, and malignants; the same to be commanded by the earl of Leven, or such other general as shall be appointed by the states of Scotland, according to the orders and directions of both houses; and to be paid, according to such an establishment as shall be agreed on, out of such revenues of papists, malignants, and other delinquents, as shall be assigned for that purpose by the two houses. XI. You shall take care that the city of Carlisle and the town of Berwick, whensoever they shall be secured from the papists and malignants, be delivered over unto the hands of such persons and garrisons as shall be appointed by the two houses to receive and defend the same. XII. For the charge in raising and arming those men, we shall give our brethren satisfaction as speedily as may be; and if the reason of the war require that those forces, or any part thereof, be employed on this side Tees, or that it shall be so desired and directed by the lords and commons in parliament, they are, in such case, to be subject to the order and command of the earl of Essex, or such other as shall be appointed lord-general by the two houses. XIII. You shall assure our brethren of Scotland, That, if they shall be annoyed or endangered by any force or army, either from England or any other place, the lords and commons of England will assist them with a proportionable army of 10,000 foot and 1000 horse, or more, to be sent into Scotland for their defence, under such order and directions as shall be thought fit by the parliament or state of Scotland; and if any invasion of the Irish rebels, or other enemies, shall happen during such time as their army shall be employed for the defence of this kingdom, you shall agree with them for a guard of ships to be maintained by us upon that coast. XIV. And, that the mutual interest and dangers of both kingdoms may be defended and preserved by both, you shall, on the behalf of the lords and commons of England, contract and agree with the kingdom and states of Scotland, that no pacification, or agreement for peace, shall be concluded, by the two houses, without sufficient caution and provision for the security, peace, and safety, of that kingdom; the indemnity of all persons and states for and concerning the aid and assistance, which shall be given to this parliament and kingdom, for the suppression of the popish and ill-affected party among them; the safe and peaceable return of their forces sent hither, and the real performance of all articles agreed upon with them. XV.

You shall receive the public faith of that kingdom, that neither their entrance into, nor continuance in, this kingdom, in arms, shall be made use of to the prejudice of the rights and prerogatives of the crown of England, nor of the liberties and privileges of the subjects; but that all matters concerning the same be determined by the two houses; and that as our brethren shall be pleased to come in to help us, at our request, so their forces shall be always ready to depart this kingdom whensoever they shall, by both houses, be thereunto desired. XVI. You shall further consider, with our brethren of Scotland, what other Articles or Propositions may be fit to be added and concluded; whereby the assistance and union betwixt the two nations may be made more beneficial, and effectual for the security and defence of religion and liberty in both kingdoms: and you shall certify all such Propositions to the two houses of parliament, and thereupon proceed to a conclusion, as you shall receive further direction from them.—You are, together with 10,000 foot and 1000 horse, or more, desired of our brethren of Scotland for our assistance, to consider, agree and conclude, with them concerning a fitting train of artillery to accompany the same.—You are to represent to our brethren of Scotland the desire of both houses, that the earl of Antrim may be examined with reference to the affairs of this kingdom, upon such interrogatories as shall be, by you, framed and propounded in that behalf, or such as shall be hereafter appointed by both houses; which examinations you are to return unto the houses with all convenient speed.—You are to prosecute the Instructions formerly given, by the two houses, unto Michael Welden and John Corbet, esquires, concerning the six earls of Scotland voted incendiaries by both houses.—And whereas by act of parliament in both kingdoms, concerning the Treaty of Peace between the two nations, two commissions, the one for conserving of peace, and the other for trade, are directed and appointed; which commissions are passed and consented to by the two houses of parliament; you are therefore, according to the said commissions, and in the capacity of commissioners, in that behalf, to treat and advise of all such matters as, by the said act is appointed; and to carry with you authentic copies of the same, and them to deliver to the commissioners for conserving of peace, as you shall see cause.—You are to represent to the general assembly of Scotland, or to the commissioners appointed by them, the care and endeavours of both houses for a perfect reformation in this church, and the happy progress made by them therein; for the better accomplishing whereof they have called an Assembly of Godly and Learned Divines, who are now sitting; and that, by reason of the prevalency of the papists, prelatical faction, and other malignant enemies to this so much desired reformation, now in arms against the parliament, these good beginnings are like to receive interruption, if they be not utterly disappointed: and therefore you are not only to desire assistance of that reverend and Godly assembly, for the carrying on this work with their prayers, but also by such seasonable and effectual means, as to them shall seem meet; and you are to co-operate with the states of the kingdom of Scotland, for the effecting of the desires of both houses in the necessary supplies and aid now desired of our brethren.—You are also, according to the desires of both houses, formerly expressed in their Instructions to John Corbet, esq. and now in their Declaration to the general assembly, to solicit the speeding away of such and so many reverend and godly Divines as they shall make choice of, to be assistants in the assembly called by the two houses.”

A Letter from the Council of War, in the E. of Essex's Army.] July 22. A Letter to the Speaker of the house of lords, from the Council of War, was read as follows: the occasion of it will be best known from its own words:

“ My lord; We have, after divers addresses to the houses, with patience expected recruits and supplies of men, horses, saddles, and arms, to enable us to do the state that service which we most heartily wish we could perform: and we have, in modesty, forborne to press the necessity of the armies upon your lordships, so often as the condition thereof required, till now we are driven to that exigent that we can be no longer silent; we must therefore, to discharge that trust reposed in us, make known unto your lordships, That the army is much decayed very suddenly, partly by the mortality and sickness which hath befallen us, and which lieth still upon us; and partly for want of pay and cloathing, our soldiers being grown bare, and many of them almost naked; and the running away of our soldiers is not the least occasion of our weakness, who are encouraged to leave us, out of a report of raising new armies, wherein they hope they shall be entertained.—We hold it, now, fit to make public the particular condition of the army; not knowing whether it will be more pleasing to their lordships to refer the information thereof to such as shall be appointed, by your lordships, to receive the particular relation thereof from those who are herewith sent to give a full satisfaction therein: but thus much we shall be bold to say, That if a constant course be not held that the soldiers may be duly paid and better cloathed, and the recruits of men, horse, saddles, and arms, may likewise be provided, it will be impossible for us to answer your expectations, or discharge the duties of our place; whereof we have thought fit to give your lordships timely notice, that we may not, hereafter, have it laid to our charge that we have dealt unfaithfully in concealing that which, in the end, and that too soon, will be the destruction and overthrow of this army, if speedy course be not taken to supply the wants, and prevent our further weakness, occasioned by those particulars mentioned; some whereof will rest in your lordships power to provide against.—My lord, it concerning our honour and the safety of the kingdom, we must deal plainly and clearly with you, That if a speedy care be not had, there will not, in a few days, be left the face of an army here amongst us: all which we refer to your lordship's most serious and speedy consideration, and rest, &c. Tho. Grey, Wm. Brooke, John Middleton, Harry Barclay, John Burgoyne, Francis Russel, Tho. Tyrrell, Ja. Holborne, Lionel Copley, John Merrick, Phil. Skippon, Phil. Stapylton, Edw. Aldrich, Sam. Luke.”

This Letter was ordered to be communicated to the commons, at a conference; after which both houses fell upon various ways and means to raise money, of which they were then in great want. They also agreed that a large body of horse should be raised; and this day, a long Ordinance was read and agreed to for that purpose. This Army was to be commanded by the earl of Manchester, and was to prevent the great mischiefs done by the king's horse, his army being said to be vastly superior in that kind of force.

Aug. 4. The lords received Letters from the lord Willoughby of Parham, giving an account of the ill state and condition the parliament's forces were in, in those parts of Lincolnshire where he commanded; desiring present relief, both of men and money, otherwise he could not defend them against the earl of Newcastle's army. They were ordered to be communicated to the commons.

This day the earl of Northumberland, from the committee appointed to consider of means for settling the present Distractions of the Kingdom, reported, That they had considered of a Petition to be presented to his majesty, from both houses, to that purpose; which being read, and after debate agreed to, a Message was sent to the lower house, to desire a conference with them the next morning.

The Lords Propositions for Peace.] Aug. 5. The lords took into further consideration their Propositions for Peace, and ordered that their Speaker should introduce them to the commons, at the conference, with this preface:

“ Gentlemen, The lords believe it too visible to the understanding of all persons, that this kingdom, with all those blessings of plenty and abundance, the fruits of our long and happy Peace, must be forthwith turned into that desolation and famine which accompany a Civil War: and that those hands and hearts, that should support this land, do now endanger it by unnatural divisions: which considerations have moved the lords to send Propositions again to his majesty, in which they do desire your concurrence; the reasonableness and justice of them being such, that, if they be rejected, our cause will thereby be strengthened, and the kingdom encouraged to preserve themselves in their just rights.”

authorities what the Propositions for peace were. This deficiency is luckily supplied by lord Clarendon, who has not only given us the Propositions themselves, but also the arguments urged in the commons for and against them. The Particulars, says his lordship, proposed by the lords were: 1. "That both armies might be presently disbanded, and his majesty be entreated to return to his parliament, upon such security as should give him satisfaction. 2. That religion might be settled with the advice of a Synod of Divines, in such a manner as his majesty, with the consent of both houses, should appoint. 3. That the Militia, both by sea and land, might be settled by a bill; and the militia, forts, and ships of the kingdom, put into such hands as the king should appoint, with the approbation of both houses; and his majesty's revenue to be absolutely and wholly restored unto him, only deducting such part as had been of necessity expended for the maintenance of his children, and not otherwise. 4. That all the members of both houses, who had been expelled only for absenting themselves, or mere compliance with his majesty, and no other matter of fact against them, might be restored to their places. 5. That all delinquents, from before the 10th of Jan. 1641, should be delivered up to the justice of parliament, and a General Pardon for all others on both sides. 6. And lastly, That there might be an act of oblivion for all by-gone deeds and acts of hostility."

Debate thereon in the Commons.] "When this conference was reported in the commons, it begot a wonderful long and a hot debate, which lasted till ten o'clock that night, and continued a day or two more; the violent party (for there were yet many among them of more moderate constitutions, who did, and ever had, heartily abhorred their proceedings, though, out of fear, or indisposition of health, or not knowing else well what to do, they continued there) inveighed furiously against the design itself of sending to the king at all, and therefore would not have the particular Propositions so much as considered: 'They had received much prejudice by the last Treaty at Oxford, and therefore must undergo more now their condition was much lower; the king had since that, upon the matter, declared them to be no parliament; for if they were not free, they could not be a parliament; so that till that point were vindicated, they could not treat in any safe capacity, but would be looked upon under the notion of rebels, as his maj. had declared them. They had sent members into Scotland to require assistance, which that kingdom was preparing with all brotherly affection and forwardness; and, after such a discovery, to treat for Peace, without the privity of the Scots, was to betray them, and to forfeit all hopes hereafter of relief from thence, what necessities soever they might be reduced to. That the city of London had expressed all imaginable readiness to raise forces for sir Wm. Waller; and the counties near London were ready to rise as one man; whereby the earl of Essex would be speedily enabled to march, with a better army than ever he had, to give the king battle, except this discourse of Peace did extinguish the zeal that was then flaming in the hearts of the people.'—But notwithstanding these reasons, and the passion in the delivery, the terror of the king's successes suggested answers enough: 'They had been punished for breaking off the Treaty of Oxford, when they might have had better terms than now they could expect; and if they omitted this opportunity, they should fare much worse; that they were not sure of aid from Scotland, neither was it almost possible it should come time enough to preserve them from the ruin at hand: and for the city of London, though the common and meaner sort of people, who might promise themselves advantage by it, desired the continuance of the distractions, yet it was evident the most substantial and rich men desired Peace, by their refusal to supply money for the carrying on the war; and if they should judge of the common people by their forwardness to engage their own persons, they had reason to believe they had no mind to the war neither; for their general was forced to retire even under their own walls, for want of men to recruit his army. However, the sending reasonable Propositions to the king, would either procure a Peace, and so they should have no more need of an army; or, being refused, would raise more men and money than all their Ordinances without it.' These reasons and arguments prevailed; and after the debate had lasted till ten at night, it was resolved upon the question, and carried by 29 voices,* That they should insist upon the Propositions, and send them to his majesty."

The City of London petition the Commons against any Accommodation.] This apprehension of a Peace so alarmed the leading men in the city of London, that the lord mayor, Pennington, who had been excepted by name in the king's offer of a General Pardon, called a common council at the Guildhall the same evening, though on a Sunday; where a Petition against any Accommodation, and a draught of an Ordinance for vigorously prosecuting the War, was agreed on to be presented to the commons next morning, August 7. For though these Propositions for Peace took their rise in the house of lords, the citizens did not offer any Petition to that house against them. Instead thereof we find that the lords being met, they were informed that a great concourse of people were gathered about their house, occasioned by several Papers printed and dispersed all over the city the day before, inviting the people to come down in an unlawful manner to Westminster: on which they agreed to have a conference with the other house, to let them know, "That their lordships did account this manner of coming down a great breach of privilege, and that they did adjourn their house till the next morning; and that, if the concourse of people still continued, they would adjourn themselves to a further time. Likewise to desire the commons to join with them, to find out who printed and dispersed those Papers, and who were the authors of them, that they might be brought to condign punishment."—In the midst of this tumult came down also a select body of aldermen and common council to Westminster, with the Petition before-mentioned; and the commons being informed they were at the door, they were called in, when alderman Atkins, one of the sheriffs, in the name of the rest, presented the following Petition:

The Humble PETITION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled,

"Sheweth, That your petitioners having heard that such Propositions and Offers have been lately sent, from the house of peers, to this hon. house; which (as we greatly fear) if yielded unto, would be destructive to our religion, laws, and liberties; and finding already, by experience, that the spirits of all the well-affected party, in the city and counties adjacent, that are willing to assist the parliament both in person and purse, are much dejected thereat; and the Brotherly Assistance from Scotland, as well as the raising and maintaining of forces ourselves, thereby likely to be retarded; all which the petitioners refer to your serious consideration; and, considering our present sad condition lies upon us in a special manner, through the incensed patience of the Almighty, by delay and want of execution of justice upon traitors and delinquents; and, having an opportunity yet afforded us to speak, our desires are, That you would be pleased to persist in your former Resolutions, whereupon the people have so much depended, and wherein you have so deeply engaged yourselves, (though you should perish in the work) that justice may be done upon offenders and delinquents. And that, since we are as willing as ever to expose what we are, and have, for the crowning of so good a cause, you will be pleased, by a speedy passing the Ordinance hereunto annexed, or one to this effect, to put us in a probable way for our and your defence, wherein your petitioners will, by the blessing of God, never be wanting; but shall ever pray, &c."

The Commons reject the Lords Propositions for Peace.] The commons, after having read the Petition and Ordinance, and returned the citizens hearty thanks for their great expressions of care for the safety of the commonwealth, proceeded to take into consideration the Propositions for Peace sent from the Lords; and, after a long debate, the house divided on this question, Whether they should take those Propositions into a more particular consideration? The Yeas went out, Mr. Hollis and sir J. Holland, tellers for the Yeas, and sir Robert Harley with sir Tho. Barrington, for and with the Noes; who brought in the number of 81 of the former, and 79 of the latter. This near division occasioned a stricter scrutiny; for the house, not being satisfied with the report of the tellers, divided again, when the number of the Yeas that went forth were 81, as before, but the number of the Noes that sat amounted now to 88. A very odd circumstance, unless we may suppose that 9 members came into the house at that interval.—Thus all hope of an Accommodation between king and parliament was stopped by the commons; for another question arising at the same time, Whether that house would concur with the lords in their Propositions, or not? it passed in the negative without any division.* But the commons, to soften the harshness of this Vote to the lords, appointed a committee to prepare Reasons to be offered to them, why they dissented from them; and particularly to desire their lordships, at the next conference, 'not to desert the defence of the Kingdom at this time; for the commons would do their utmost in the defence of the lords, as much as for themselves.' They also resolved to recommend it to the lord mayor, to take some course to prevent all tumults; who accordingly issued an Order, prohibiting, on the utmost penalties the law could inflict, the making of any unlawful assemblies, or printing any papers, &c. for that purpose.

A Petition from the Women of London, &c. for Peace.] Aug. 9. As a counterpoise to the foregoing Petition for continuing the War, another was presented to the commons for Peace. This was from the Women; the men, as lord Clarendon remarks, being deterred from any attempt of this sort by the late execution of Mr. Tomkins and Mr. Chaloner, and the severities which followed the discovery of Mr. Waller's Plot. This Petition runs thus:

To the Hon. the House of Commons in Parliament assembled: The Humble PETITION of many CIVILLY-DISPOSED WOMEN, inhabiting in the Cities of London, Westminster, the Suburbs and Parts adjacent;

"Sheweth; That your poor petitioners, though of the weaker sex, do too sensibly perceive the ensuing desolation of this kingdom, unless, by some timely means, your honours provide for the speedy recovery thereof. Your honours are the physicians that can, by God's special and miraculous blessing, (which we humbly implore) restore this languishing nation, and our bleeding sister the kingdom of Ireland, which hath now almost breathed her

* Lord Clarendon says, The people about the doors behaved so imperiously, as to tell the members of both houses, as they passed by them, 'That if they had not a good answer, they would be there the next day with double the number.'

last gasp. We need not dictate to your eagle-eyed judgments the way; our only desire is, That God's glory in the true Reformed Protestant Religion may be preserved; the just prerogatives and privileges of king and parliament maintained; the true liberties and properties of the subject, according to the known laws of the land, restored; and all honourable ways and means for a speedy Peace endeavoured. May it therefore please your honours, that some speedy course may be taken for the settlement of the true Reformed Protestant Religion for the glory of God, and the renovation of trade for the benefit of the subject, they being the soul and body of the kingdom. And your petitioners, with many millions of afflicted souls, groaning under the burden of these times of distress, shall (as bound) pray, &c."

We have before taken notice of a Petition from the Female Sex at the beginning of the troubles, and Mr. Pym's speech to them at that time;* but this gentleman seems now to have been greatly out of the ladies' favour, by what follows in Mr. Rushworth's account of this matter. He tells us, "That this Petition was brought up by 2 or 3000 Women, generally of the meanest sort, (whom lord Clarendon calls a great multitude of the wives of substantial citizens) with white silk ribbons in their hats; and was, by some of their number, presented to the house of commons, who received and read the same; and sent out sir John Hippisley and 2 or 3 members more, to return them an Answer, 'That the house were no way enemies to Peace, and that they did not doubt, in a short time, to answer the ends of their Petition; and desired them to return to their habitations.' But the Women, not satisfied, remained thereabouts, and, by noon, were increased to 5000 at the least; and some men of the rabble, in women's cloaths, mixed themselves amongst them, and instigated them to go up to the commons door, and cry 'Peace! Peace!' which they did accordingly, thrusting to the door of the house at the upper stairs-head. The Trained Band advised them to come down, and first pulled them; and afterwards, to fright them, shot powder: but they cried out, 'Nothing but powder;' and some of them in the yard having brick bats, threw them a-pace at the Trained Band, who then shot bullets. Yet the women, not daunted, cried out the louder at the door of the house of commons, 'Give us those Traitors that are against Peace, that we may tear them to pieces: give us that dog Pym, &c.'"

Mr. Martin committed to the Tower for reviling the King and Royal Family.] Aug. 16. A circumstance which happened, this day, in the house of commons, is expunged in their Journals, as appears in the margin, by an Order made Jan. 6, 1645; by which means this affair is rendered so obscure, that nothing can be made of it in that authority. We are obliged to Mr. Whitlocke for an explanation, who tells us, "That one Mr. Saltmarsh, a minister, had published a Book, in which were these bold positions: 1. 'That all means should be used to keep the king and his people from a sudden union. 2. To cherish the war, under the notion of Popery, as the surest means to engage the people. 3. If the king would not grant their demands, then to root him out and the royal line, and to collate the crown upon somebody else.' This strange doctrine gave offence, says our author, to sober men; and Saltmarsh was sent for and examined, before the commons, about it; when some exceptions being taken against it, Mr. Henry Martin said, 'That he saw no reason to condemn Mr. Saltmarsh; and that it was better one Family should be destroyed than many.' Sir Nevile Poole moved, 'That Mr. Martin should explain, What one Family he meant;' who boldly answered, 'The king and his Children.' Upon this some members urged the height and danger of these words, and taxed him with his lewd life; and, many speaking very sharply against him, he was committed to the Tower: but, shortly after (on the 2d of Sept.) released, and re-admitted to his seat in parliament."

Ordinance for removing Images, Altars, &c. out of Churches.] Aug. 27. An Ordinance for removing superstitious Images, Crucifixes, Altars of Stone, &c. passed the lords, which had been formerly sent up by the other house: it ran in these words:

"The lords and commons in parliament, taking into their serious consideration how well pleasing it is to God, and conduceable to the blessed reformation in his worship, so much desired by both houses, that all the Monuments of Superstition or Idolatry should be removed and demolished, do ordain, That in all and every the churches and chapels, as well cathedral and collegiate as other churches and chapels, and other usual places of public prayer, authorized by law within this realm of England and dominion of Wales, all Altars and Tables of Stone shall, before the 1st day of Nov. 1643, be utterly taken away and demolished: and also all Communion-Tables removed from the East end of every such church, chapel, or place of publick prayer, and chancel of the same; and shall be placed in some other fit and convenient place or places of the body of the said church, chapel, or other such place of publick prayer, or of the body of the chancel of every such church, chapel, or other such place of public prayer: and that all rails whatsoever, which have been erected near to, before, or about any Altar or Communion-Table in any of the said churches or chapels, or other such place of public prayer as aforesaid, shall, before the said day, be likewise taken away; and the chancel ground of every such church or chapel, or other place of public prayer, which hath been, within 20 years last past, raised for any Altar or Communion-Table to stand upon, shall, before the said day, be laid down, and

levelled as the same was before the said 20 years last past: and that all tapers, candlesticks, and basons, shall, before the said day, be removed and taken away from the Communion-Table in every such church, chapel, or other place of public prayer; and neither the same, nor any such like, shall be used about the same at any time after the said day: and that all crucifixes, crosses, and all images and pictures of any one or more persons of the Trinity, or of the virgin Mary; and all other images and pictures of saints, or superstitious inscriptions in, or upon, all and every the said churches or chapels, or other places of public prayer, church-yards, or other places to any the said churches and chapels, or other places of public prayer belonging, or in any other open place, shall, before the 1st of Nov. be taken away and defaced; and none of the like hereafter permitted in any such church or chapel, or other places as aforesaid.—And be it further ordained, That all and every such removal of the said Altars, Tables of Stone, Communion-Tables, Tapers, Candlesticks and Basons, Crucifixes and Crosses, Images and Pictures as aforesaid, taking away of the said rails, levelling the said grounds, shall be done and performed; and the walls, windows, grounds, and other places which shall be broken, impaired, or altered by any the means aforesaid, shall be made up and repaired in good and sufficient manner, in all and every of the said parish churches or chapels, or usual places of public prayer belonging to any parish, by the church-wardens for the time being respectively; and in any cathedral or collegiate church or chapel, by the dean or sub-dean, or other chief officer for the time being; and in the universities, by the several heads and governors of every college or hall respectively; and in the several Inns of Court, by the benchers and readers of every of the same respectively, at the cost and charges of all and every such person or persons, body politic or corporate, or parishioners of every parish respectively, to whom the charge of the repair of any such church, chapel, chancel, or place of public prayer, doth or shall belong.—And in case default be made in any of the premises, by any of the person or persons thereunto appointed by this Ordinance, from and after the said 1st of Nov. 1643, that then every such person or persons, so making default, shall, for every such neglect or default by the space of 20 days, forfeit and lose 40s. to the use of the poor of the said parish wherein such default shall be made; or if it be out of any parish, then to the use of the poor of such parish whose church is, or shall be, nearest to the church or chapel, or other place of public prayer, where such default shall be made; and if default shall be made after the 1st of Dec. 1643, then any one justice of the peace of the county, city, or town, where such default shall be made, upon information thereof to him to be given, shall cause or procure the premises to be performed, according to the tenor of this

Ordinance, at the cost and charges of such person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, or inhabitants in every parish, who are appointed by this Ordinance to bear the same.—Provided that this Ordinance, or any thing therein contained, shall not extend to any Image, Picture, or Coat of Arms in Glass, Stone, or otherwise, in any church, chapel, church yard, or place of public prayer as aforesaid, set up or graven only for a Monument of any king, prince, or nobleman, or other dead person, which hath not been commonly reputed or taken for a Saint: but that all such Images, Pictures, and Coats of Arms, may stand and continue in like manner and form, as if this Ordinance had never been made.*

Sir J. Hotham and his Son examined by the Commons, and expelled.] Sep. 7. Sir J. Hotham was brought to the bar of the commons by order, before he took his trial; and being acquainted by the Speaker, That he had liberty to speak to the house if he desired it, he said, He had some petitions to present to them; which was, That his lady might come up with her coach and horses, children, servants, and evidences; and some goods and plate he had left, for their maintenance. He desired also, that he might continue where he was till his trial: he protested his own innocence, and did not doubt, when he knew his charge, but to make it appear as clear as the sun. Being demanded, Whether he knew of any members of that house, or of the lords, that had conveyed any treasure beyond seas? He answered, He knew of none, if he were to die tomorrow. And being again asked, Whether he knew that Mr. Pym had conveyed any treasure in like manner? With some astonishment he asked, If that question was asked him in earnest? Protested he knew nothing of it, and that he had never reported any such thing.—Then the Examination taken by the committee, concerning the Correspondence he held with lord Digby, was read to him. And, being demanded by the Speaker, Whether it was true or not which he had there expressed? He answered, It was true; only in that concerning sir Hugh Cholmley, and Keyes, his son's servant, were some mistakes: for when Keyes came to him at Hull, he, wondering to see him, said, 'How the Devil camest thou hither? How couldest thou come through the Queen's Army?' and that was all he said to him. Further, he said, the lord Digby did send a Declaration to him, to publish to the world his reasons for his turning to his allegiance to the king; but he tore it in pieces, and told him, That he could not serve the king, till he had sent just propositions to the parliament. And being pressed by the committee to answer to some farther questions about lord Digby, he said, He was not bound to accuse himself; made no farther answer, and confessed that he did refuse to sign this examination. After this the commons proceeded to expell sir John their house, and to commit him close prisoner to the Tower.

Sept. 8. The son of this unfortunate father, was likewise brought to the same bar, the serjeant standing with his mace within it, when the Speaker told him, If he had any thing to say the house would hear him. Upon which he made a long narration of the whole carriage of affairs from the first time he took possession of Hull, to that of his commitment; acknowledging he had committed many errors and offences, but nothing to betray the trust reposed in him by the parliament. Being asked, If he could tell what monies, treasure, or other goods, the lord Say, Mr. Pym, or any other member of either house, had transported beyond sea? He answered, He knew of none, nor ever heard of any that knew any such thing.—Notwithstanding this the commons expelled captain Hotham, and remanded him to the same custody he was before; but ordered, that a warrant should be made to bring up both their ladies, children, servants, &c. as his father had desired.

A Charge against Mr. Pym for indirect Practices, voted false and scandalous.] Sept.

9. In the course of these Examinations, the reader may observe that Mr. Pym is mentioned, along with others, as charged with some indirect practices. To do justice to his memory, on the same day sir Edw. Bainton, a member, was sent for, charged with saying, That the lord Say and Mr. Pym had betrayed the West and North. And being demanded, Whether he had spoke these words charged upon him? Answered, He did not speak them as they were there laid down. Being then demanded, What he had spoken to that purpose? Answered, That he had learned, since he had sat here, that he ought not to speak any thing here that reflected to the prejudice of another member; and therefore desired to be excused, unless he were enjoined and commanded. Whereupon he was enjoined to speak the whole truth: and then he said, That he did not say that Mr. Pym had betrayed the West, but that he had betrayed his country; which he did, by being a means of detaining him in prison, who only was able to maintain and preserve that county, till the said county was quite lost, notwithstanding many Orders made for his bringing up: * As for betraying the North, he knew nothing more of that than he had heard in the house, which sounded bad enough, viz. That the offer of the lord Savile and sir Wm. Savile, to deliver up, to the parliament's forces, York and that whole county, if they might not be prejudiced in their persons and estates, was prevented. Adding, That he had heard it said and affirmed, with solemn and deep oaths and protestations, That the lord Cottington had treated with his majesty for the pardon of the lord Say and Mr. Pym; and that if they had had the preferments they expected, we had not been brought to the condition we now are in. Being demanded from whom he heard this, answered, It was from the lord Grandison's brother, lieut. colonel Brett, and serjeant-major Juques, all officers in the king's army, and prisoners with him at Gloucester.

Mr. Pym, in Answer to this Charge, protested solemnly, 'That he never had intercourse with the lord Cottington, by one means or other, since the difference between the king and parliament: that he never received but two messages from him since this parliament began; the one was by sir Arthur Ingram, long before he died; the other by sir Benj. Rudyard.'—Upon the whole, the commons voted the Charge false and scandalous; and that the said sir Edw. should be forthwith sent to the Tower, there to remain a prisoner during the pleasure of the house. But, soon after, the question being put, Whether sir Edward should be now called to the bar, and from thence sent to the Tower, the house divided into 20 yeas and 40 noes; so it passed in the negative.

The Commissioners from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, propose their SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT to the Parliament of England.] At this time it was, that the Scots sent over Commissioners from the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, with some Propositions to be presented to the English parliament. These commissioners were some noblemen and others, called Ruling Elders, with ministers, &c. who delivered their credentials to a committee of both houses, appointed for that purpose. There had been a Declaration of parliament, sent some time before into Scotland, concerning Religious Matters, to which these commissioners brought the following Answer.

The ANSWER of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, to the DECLARATION of the Hon. Houses of Parliament in England.

The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, having received a Declaration from the hon. houses of the parliament of England, by their Commissioners now residing here, hath thought good to make known unto the lords and commons in parliament, That all the members of this Assembly, and others well affected here, do, with most thankfulness, take special notice of the expressions which they have been pleased to make in the forementioned Declaration; not only concerning their approbation of the desires and endeavours of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland for the Reformation of the Church of England, and the Union of both Churches in Religion and Church Government; but also concerning the Resolution of both houses fully to concur with them in those pious intentions. With the same thankfulness and due reverence, they acknowledge the high respects expressed towards them by both houses, in directing unto them their commissioners assisted by two reverend divines; and in desiring some of the godly and learned of this church to be sent unto the assembly sitting there.—The Assembly doth bless the Lord, who hath not only inspired the houses of parliament with desires and resolutions of the reformation of religion, but hath advanced, by several steps and degrees, that blessed work; by which, as they shall most approve themselves to the reformed churches and to their brethren abroad, so shall they most powerfully draw down from Heaven the blessing of prosperity and peace upon England. And as it is the earnest wish of their brethren here, that the true state and ground of the present differences and controversies in England may be more and more cleared concerning religion; and that both houses may incessantly prosecute that good work first and above all other matters, 'giving no sleep to their eyes nor slumber to their eye-lids, until they find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob,' whose favour alone can make their mountain strong, and whose presence, in his own ordinances, shall be their glory in the midst of them: so it is our confidence that the begun Reformation is of God, and not of man; that it shall increase and not decrease through his help, to whom nothing is too hard; who can make mountains valleys, crooked things streight, and rough ways smooth; and shall lead along, and make perfect, this most wonderful work, which shall be remembered to his glory, in the church, throughout all generations.—And least, through any defect upon the General Assembly's part, the work of Reformation, which hitherto, to the great grief of all the Godly, hath moved so slowly, should be any more retarded or interrupted, they have, according to the renewed desires of both houses and their own former promises, nominated and elected Mr. Alex. Henderson, Mr. Rob. Douglas, Mr. Samuel Rutherford, Mr. Rob. Bailey, and Mr. George Gillespie, ministers of God's Word; John earl of Cassels, John lord Maitland, sir Archibald Johnston of Warriston, Ruling-Elders, (all of them men much approved here) with commission and power to them, or any 3 of them, whercof two shall be ministers, to repair unto the Assembly of Divines, and others of the church of England, now sitting at Westminster, to propound, consult, treat, and conclude with them, and with any commissioners deputed by the houses of parliament, if it shall seem good to the honourable houses, in their wisdom, to depute any for that end, in all such things as may conduce to the utter extirpation of popery, prelacy, heresy, schism, superstition, and idolatry; and for the settling of the so much desired Union of this whole island in one form of church-government, one confession of faith, one common catechism, and one directory for the worship of God, according to the instructions which they have received, or shall receive, from the commissioners of the General Assembly appointed to meet at Edinburgh, from time to time, with the Assembly's power to that end. And as the General Assembly doth most gladly and affectionately receive, and fully trust, the Commissioners and Divines sent hither; so do they hereby commend the aforementioned commissioners not only to the like affection and trust of the Assembly there, but also to the favour and protection of both houses of parliament.—And for the further satisfaction and encouragement of their brethren of England, the whole assembly, in their own name, and in the name of all the particular churches in this kingdom whom they represent, do hereby declare, That, from their zeal to the glory of God and propagation of the Gospel, from their affection to the happiness of their native king and of the kingdom of England, and from the sense of their own interest in the common dangers of religion, peace, and liberty, they are most willing and ready to be united and associated with their brethren in a nearer LEAGUE and SOLEMN COVENANT, for the maintenance of the truly reformed protestant religion, against popery and prelacy, and against all popish and prelatical corruptions in doctrine, discipline, worship or church-government; and for the settling and holding fast of unity and uniformity of religion, betwixt the churches of this island and with the best reformed churches beyond the sea, which union and covenant shall, by God's assistance, be seconded by your co-operating with their brethren in the use of the best and most effectual means that may serve for so good ends: for the more speedy effecting whereof, to the comfort and enlargement of their distressed brethren, whose hope deferred might make their hearts to faint, the whole Assembly, with great unanimity of judgment and expressions of much affection, have approved, for their part, such a draught and form of a mutual League and Covenant betwixt the kingdoms as was the result of the joint debates and consultations of the commissioners from both houses of parliament, assisted by the two reverend divines and the commissioners deputed from the convention of the estates of this kingdom, and from the General Assembly; expecting and wishing the like approbation thereof by the right hon. the lords and commons in parliament, and by the rev. assembly there, that thereafter it may be solemnly sworn and subscribed by both kingdoms; as the surest and strictest obligation to make both stand and fall together, in the cause of religion and liberty.—And as the states of this kingdom have often professed, in their former Declarations, the integrity of their intentions against the common enemies of religion and liberty in both kingdoms, and their great affections to their brethren of England, by reason of so many and so near relations; so doubtless, in this time of need, they will not fail to give real proof of what before they professed: 'A friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity.' Neither shall the Assembly, nor their commissioners, be wanting in exhorting all others to their duty, or in concurring, so far as belongeth to their place and vocation, with the states now convened, in any lawful and possible course which may most conduce to the good of religion and reformation, the honour and happiness of the king's majesty, the deliverance of their brethren of England from their present calamitous condition, and to the perpetuating a firm and happy peace betwixt the kingdoms."—Both houses ordered this Answer to be sent to the Assembly of Divines at Westminster:

The Scots Solemn League and Covenant agreed to by the English Parliament.] Sept. 18. This day the famous instrument, called THE SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT, was debated. The form of this test runs thus:*

"We noblemen, barons, knights, gentlemen, citizens, burgesses, ministers of the gospel, and commons of all sorts, in the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by the providence of God living under one king, and being of one reformed religion, having before our eyes the glory of God, and the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the honour and happiness of the king's majesty and his posterity, and the true public liberty, safety, and peace of the kingdoms, wherein every one's private condition is included; and calling to mind the treacherous and bloody plots, conspiracies, attempts, and practices of the enemies of God, against the true religion, and professors thereof, in all places, especially in these three kingdoms, ever since the reformation of religion, and how much their rage, power, and presumption, are of late, and at this time, increased and exercised; whereof the deplorable estate of the church and kingdom of Ireland, the distressed estate of the church and kingdom of England, and the dangerous estate of the church and kingdom of Scotland, are at present public testimonies; we have now at last, (after other means of supplication, remonstrance, protestations, and sufferings) for the preservation of ourselves and our religion from utter ruin and destruction, according to the commendable practice of these kingdoms in former times, and the example of God's people in other nations, after mature deliberation, resolved and determined to enter into a mutual and solemn League and Covenant; wherein we all subscribe, and each one of us for himself, with our hands lifted up to the most high God, do swear, 1. That we shall sincerely, really, and constantly, through the grace of God, endeavour, in our several places and callings, the preservation of the reformed religion in the church of Scotland, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government according to the Word of God, and the example of the best reformed churches; and we shall endeavour to bring the churches of God, in the three kingdoms, to the nearest conjunction and uniformity in religion, confession of faith, form of church-government, directory for worship and catechizing; that we, and our posterity after us, may, as brethren, live in faith and love, and the Lord may delight to dwell in the midst of us. 2. That we shall in like manner, without respect of persons, endeavour the extirpation of popery, prelacy, (that is, church-government by archbishops, bishops, their chancellors and commissaries, deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, and all other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy) superstition, heresy, schism, profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found to be contrary to sound doctrine and the power of Godliness; lest we partake in other men's sins, and thereby be in danger to receive of their plagues; and that the Lord may be one, and his name one in the three kingdoms. 3. We shall, with the same sincerity, reality, and constancy, in our several vocations, endeavour, with our estates and lives, mutually to preserve the rights and privileges of the parliaments, and the liberties of the kingdoms; and to preserve and defend the king's majesty's person and authority, in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms, that the world may bear witness with our consciences of our loyalty, and that we have no thoughts or intentions to diminish his majesty's just power and greatness. 4. We shall also, with all faithfulness, endeavour the discovery of all such as have been, or shall be, incendiaries, malignants, or evil instruments, by hindering the reformation of religion, dividing the king from his people, or one of the kingdoms from another, or making any faction or parties amongst the people contrary to this League and Covenant, that they may be brought to public trial, and receive condign punishment, as the degree of their offences shall require or deserve, or the supreme judicatories of both kingdoms respectively, or others having power from them for that effect, shall judge convenient. 5. And whereas the happiness of a blessed peace between these kingdoms, denied in former times to our progenitors, is, by the good providence of God, granted unto us, and hath been lately concluded and settled by both parliaments, we shall each one of us, according to

* From the original edition, published by Edward Husband, Sept. 22, 1643. In the title page it is called, 'A Solemn League and Covenant, for Reformation and Defence of Religion, the Honour and Happiness of the King, and the Peace and Safety of the three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland.' After which follow these texts of Scripture, which the commons ordered to be printed in the title. 'Jer. l. 5. Come let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual Covenant that shall not be forgotten. Prov. xxv. 5. Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness. 2 Chron. xv. 15. And all Judah rejoiced at the Oath, for they had sworn with all their heart, and sought him with their whole desire, and he was found of them; and the Lord gave them rest round about.'

our places and interests, endeavour that they may remain conjoined in a firm peace and union to all posterity; and that justice may be done upon the wilful opposers thereof, in manner expressed in the precedent Article. 6. We shall also, according to our places and callings, in this common cause of religion, liberty, and peace of the kingdoms, assist and defend all those that enter into this League and Covenant, in the maintaining and pursuing thereof; and shall not suffer ourselves, directly or indirectly, by whatsoever combination, persuasion, or terror, to be divided and withdrawn from this blessed union and conjunction, whether to make defection to the contrary part, or to give ourselves to a detestable indifferency or neutrality in this cause which so much concerneth the glory of God, the good of the kingdoms, and honour of the king; but shall, all the days of our lives, zealously and constantly continue therein, against all opposition, and promote the same, according to our power, against all lets and impediments whatsoever; and what we are not able ourselves to suppress or overcome, we shall reveal and make known, that it may be timely prevented or removed: all which we shall do as in the sight of God.—And because these kingdoms are guilty of many sins and provocations against God and his son Jesus Christ, as is too manifest by our present distresses and dangers the fruits thereof, we profess and declare, before God and the world, our unfeigned desire to be humbled for our own sins, and for the sins of these kingdoms; especially, that we have not, as we ought, valued the inestimable benefit of the gospel; that we have not laboured for the purity and power thereof; and that we have not endeavoured to receive Christ in our hearts, nor to walk worthy of him in our lives, which are the causes of other sins and transgressions, so much abounding amongst us; and our true and unfeigned purpose, desire, and endeavour for ourselves, and all others under our power and charge, both in public and private, in all duties we owe to God and man, to amend our lives, and each one to go before another in the example of a real reformation, that the Lord may turn away his wrath and heavy indignation, and establish these churches and kingdoms in truth and peace. And this Covenant we make in the presence of Almighty God, the Searcher of all Hearts, with a true intention to perform the same, as we shall answer at that great day when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed; most humbly beseeching the Lord to strengthen us by his Holy Spirit for this end, and to bless our desires and proceedings with such success, as may bring deliverance and safety to his people, and encouragement to the Christian Churches groaning under, or in danger of, the yoke of Anti-Christian tyranny, to join in the same, or like association and Covenant, to the glory of God, the enlargement of the kingdom of Jesus-Christ, and the peace and tranquillity of all Christian Kingdoms and Commonwealths.”

Before this Covenant was wholly agreed to by both houses, the commons having referred it, as a case of conscience, to the assembly of Divines at Westminster, they appeared before the house, and expressed themselves as follows: “That they had, after a particular Seeking of God for his special direction in this business, fully debated and considered of it, in all its several particulars: That they did approve of the said Covenant, and judged it lawful, in point of conscience, to be taken: That they did humbly advise, that the following Explications should be subjoined to the Covenant, viz. 1. By the clause in the first Article of the Covenant, ‘According to the word of God,’ they understood, ‘So far as we do, or shall, in our consciences, conceive the same to be according to the will of God.’ 2. By ‘Prelacy,’ in the second Article, they understood, ‘Church-Government by archbishops, bishops, their chancellors, commissaries, deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, and other ecclesiastical officers, depending upon the hierarchy.’ The prolocutor made a pious speech after the delivery of these Opinions; in which he desired that, in the taking of this Covenant, the people might be thoroughly informed of the grounds, reasons and consequences of it, being a matter of so vast importance: concluding with the prayers of the Assembly, ‘That God would be pleased to return in mercy to his people, and pitch his tents over and about them.’—Matters being thus settled in foro conscientie, this new Oath was first taken by all the lords and commons, then in town; all the officers in their army were strictly enjoined to do the same; and afterwards, it was ordered to be taken throughout the kingdom.

Battle of Newbury.] Sept. 23. A conference was held between the two houses, at which the commons presented to the lords a Letter they had received from the earl of Essex’s secretary, dated from Reading the day before. This Letter was to inform the parliament of a Battle between the two armies. It was fought on the 20th of Sept. near Newbury, in Berkshire, and is related at large by Clarendon, Rushworth, &c. Here both sides again claimed the victory, as in the first Battle at Edge-hill. The parliament, particularly, made themselves sure of it, and ordered a committee of both houses to send to their lord-general and the army forthwith, to let them know, How great value and esteem the houses had for his excellency’s conduct, and the great service done by them all, with the blessing of God; to acquaint him also, That they were using all endeavours to supply the army, and sending additional forces, in order to take this opportunity for the prosecuting and perfecting of the work. They also sent a committee into the city, to inform them of this great victory, and the advantages that might be hoped for from it: to urge the citizens to send a reinforcement of men, with a supply of money and provisions; and to use all diligence to hinder any such from being sent to the king's army: likewise to order a day of thanksgiving, within London and Westminster, and the liberties thereof, for the great success of their lord-general.

The Manner of taking the Solemn League and Covenant by both Houses.] Sept. 25. This day having been appointed by parliament for their taking the Solemn League and Covenant, both houses, with the Assembly of Divines, and Scots Commissioners, met at St. Margaret's, Westminster, for that purpose. It appears, by the Commons Journals, that an order was made, by them, for printing a Narrative of the whole Proceedings and Manner of taking this Covenant, together with the Prayers, Exhortations, and Psalms used upon that occasion. But as this piece, published by authority, has never fallen into our hands, we shall content ourselves with giving Mr. Whitlocke's and lord Clarendon's account of the ceremonial. The former tells us, that, "Mr. White, one of the assembly, prayed an hour to prepare them for taking the Covenant; then Mr. Nye, in the pulpit, made some observations touching the Covenant, shewing the warrant of it from scripture, the examples of it since the creation, and the benefit to the church. Mr. Henderson, one of the Scots commissioners, concluded in a Declaration of what the Scots had done, and the good they had received, by such Covenants; and then he shewed the prevalency of ill counsels about the king, and the resolutions of the states of Scotland to assist the parliament of England. Next Mr. Nye, in the pulpit, read the Covenant, and all present held up their hands, in testimony of their assent to it. The Divines of the Assembly, and the Scots Commissioners, subscribed it: and then Dr. Gouge, in the pulpit, pray'd for a blessing upon it. Afterwards the members of parliament, in their respective houses, subscribed their names in a parchment roll, where the Covenant was written." Thus far Mr. Whitlocke. Lord Clarendon's account runs thus: "The lords and commons, and their Assembly of Divines, met together at the church, with great solemnity, to take the Covenant on the 25th of September; a double holyday, by the earl of Essex's return to London, and this religious exercise. There two or three of their divines went up into the pulpit successively, not to preach, but to pray; others, according to their several gifts, to make orations upon the work of the day. They were by them told, 'That this Oath was such, and in the matter and consequence of it, of such concernment, as it was truly worthy of them, yea of those kingdoms, yea of all the kingdoms of the world: that it could be no other but the result and answer of such prayers and tears, of such sincerity and sufferings, that three kingdoms should be thus born, or rather new born, in a day: that they were entering upon a work of the greatest moment and concernment to themselves, and to their posterities after them, that ever was undertaken by any of them, or any of their fore-fathers before them: that it was a duty of the first commandment, and therefore of the highest and noblest order and rank of duties; therefore must come forth, attended with choicest graces, fear, humility, and in the greatest simplicity and plainness of spirit, and respect of those with whom they covenanted: that it was to advance the kingdom of Christ here upon earth, and make Jerusalem once more the praise of the whole earth, notwithstanding all the contradictions of Men.'—As soon as this solemnity was over, Mr. Henderson, one of the ecclesiastical Commissioners from Scotland, magnified what they had done, and assured them, 'of great success after it, by the experience of that nation, who, from their union in the first Covenant, found nothing hard they proposed to themselves; and told them, That were that Covenant now painted upon the wall within the Pope's palace, it would doubtless put him into Belshazzar's quaking condition; with many such high expressions, as can hardly be conceived without the view of the records and registry that is kept of them.'—Several lords then in town, the earl of Northumberland for one, did not appear at this ceremony; many members of the commons were also absent, and sent their excuses, next day, for ill health, or otherwise; but took it afterwards.

Ordinance for sequestering the Revenue of the Royal Family.] Sept. 26. An Ordinance was agreed to by both houses for an absolute Sequestration of the King's Revenue, with those of the Queen's and Prince of Wales, and seizing them for the use of the parliament; to be printed and published all over the Kingdom.

Sept. 28. The earl of Essex, being come up to town, was complimented by the Speakers of both houses, on his late victory; and this day he presented to the Lords several colours taken, at the late Battle of Newbury, from the king's army; one of which had the picture of the parliament house with two traitors heads upon each end of it, and this motto, 'Ut extra sic intra.' Another was a cavalier in pursuit of a Round-head; the word of the round-head, 'Quarter;' the cavalier's, 'Qui sequitur vincit.'

The French Ambassador's Remonstrance, on account of the arresting Mr. Montague in his retinue.] October 8. A remarkable affair came on before the lords. The French king had sent over an ambassador extraordinary, in order to compose the differences between the parliament, and so near a relation to him as the king of England. The houses being informed, That this Ambassador came with good affections, ordered a deputation of lords and commons to go down to Gravesend; to welcome him on his arrival, and wait upon him to his lodgings at Somerset-House, which was fitted up for that purpose. Soon after this Ambassador's arrival, Mr. Walter Montague, who followed him out of France, in his retinue, was arrested at Rochester; and, by the commons, committed prisoner to the Tower. A motion was also made, That the letters which he had brought over with him, sealed with the arms of France, and directed to both their majesties of England, should be opened: but that passed in the negative. On the imprisonment of this gentleman, the Ambassador addressed the following Memorial to the house of lords. It was originally in French, and was translated on purpose to be read in that house, and entered in their Journals:

“My lord the prince of Harcourt, peer of France, and master of the horse to the most Christian king, ambassador extraordinary to the king of Great Britain, being informed that Mr. Walter Montague left Paris since his excellency, and came over into England, from the queen, disguised amongst the retinue of M. De Gressy, hath been arrested at Rochester; and though he was charged with the care of her majesty's letters, for their majesties of Great Britain, was committed, nevertheless, prisoner to the Tower of London: his excellency declares to the houses of parliament, that he knew nothing of his person, nor of his disguise, neither did M. De Gressy; but, for the respect and consideration of her majesty's letters, which make it appear that the said Mr. Montague had the honour to belong to her, and she avoweth him, the said Ambassador demandeth, in the name of her majesty, and intreats them, in his own, that Mr. Montague may be put into his hands, with all the letters he was bearer of; to avoid the consequences that the just complaint of such a detention may produce.”

After this is entered, what is, in the Lords Journals, called the Sense of that House, on the reading this Paper, viz. “That this Walter Montague, being a renegado, and a man banished the kingdom, for the mischief he did here; for him to be demanded of the two houses of parliament, in so high a manner as this, by an ambassador that pretends he comes to endeavour to procure peace; and giving himself so high a title, and treating the two houses so low; is a thing of so extraordinary a nature, that, though the houses desire to maintain a good correspondency with France, yet this kingdom needs not fear any ill consequence that may follow upon this business; but hope that God will bless them and protect them, as he hath hitherto done.”—It was also ordered to have a conference with the other house, on the subject of this Paper, and the lord-general Essex to deliver the sense of this house to the commons concerning it. The lord-general hereupon acquainted the lords, That it was reported the French Ambassador, lately come, had brought many attendants along with him, several of whom were conceived to be officers and commanders; and that if they should go to the king with him, it was likely they would not return. And it being probable that before the Ambassador goes, he would apply to his lordship for a Safe-Conduct, he desired to know what he should do in this case. Whereupon the house ordered, That, when the Ambassador sends to his lordship for a Safe-Conduct, for himself and followers to go to the king, his lordship shall desire to see a list of all those he intends to take with him.

The Parliament justify their Conduct therein.] Oct. 9. At a conference between the two houses, it was agreed that the Answer to the French Ambassador's Message should be drawn up by a committee; which being done, it was agreed to, in these words;—“The lords and commons have considered of the Message in writing, delivered to the earl of Pembroke, and by him presented unto them, from the prince D' Harcourt, ambassador extraordinary from the French king; by which he complains that Mr. Walter Montague, sent hither, unknown to him, by the queen regent of France, with letters unto the king and queen; and, under a disguise, having put himself into the company of M. De Gressy, had been arrested at Rochester, and carried prisoner to the Tower; and the said ambassador therein desires, in regard it appears by these letters, that the said Mr. Montague belongs unto the queen regent, that both he and the letters may be delivered to him: to this they return for Answer, That they are most sorry they must deny him any part of his request: that the letters shall be restored, according to his desire; but for Mr. Montague, a person heretofore questioned for disservices to this state; and so dangerous, that, in the beginning of this parliament, they made it their humble suit unto the king, that he might be banished the court; and afterwards being, upon his own offer and of his friends, permitted to retire himself out of the kingdom; that he should now return, and in such a concealed manner; which, if nothing else, were cause enough for his apprehension, and to render him incapable of the patronage of that great queen: this is a crime of so high and bold a nature, as the houses of parliament cannot pass by, neither in justice for what is already done; nor, in prudence, to secure the state, for the time to come, from the practices and machinations of so turbulent and disaffected a spirit: nor can it be any just offence unto her majesty of France, whom they highly honour and esteem, as a good and glorious queen; nor any disobligation to the ambassador the prince D' Harcourt, whom likewise they desire to treat with all demonstrations of civility and respect; if, according to the laws of all nations, the law of this kingdom be put in execution against one who is a native, a subject, a delinquent; who was in the nature of a banished man, and returns in a disguised habit (so disavowing himself, not to be avowed by any); a dangerous person, that formerly did, and in all likelihood will again, practise against the state; and whom they have cause to believe, by the manner of his coming, to be now come for that very purpose: these things considered by the lord ambassador, and by him represented to the queen, will, they doubt not, give her majesty ample satisfaction, and clear and satisfy the proceedings of the parliament to her princely wisdom ; which they passionately desire, as in this, so in all things else, not out of fear of any ill consequence by the contrary, but as knowing the justice of their ways, must needs meet with the approbation of so wise a queen ; as it will also draw down the blessing of God Almighty, which alone carries them above the consideration of all earthly power."

A Misunderstanding between the Parliament's two Generals, Essex and Waller, reconciled.] The earl of Essex and sir Wm. Waller, the two generals for the parliament, had long differed in their respective commands ; and this day, the earl made it his request to both houses, That he might have leave to resign his commission, and go beyond the sea, in regard that the commission granted to sir Wm. Waller was inconsistent with his own ; and in respect to the many discouragements he had received since his being general. The lords, conceiving this to be a business which concerned the present safety of the whole kingdom, resolved to have a conference with the commons about it ; and to declare, that the sense of this house is, That the commission to sir Wm. Waller be delivered up, being inconsistent with that to the lord-general, from both houses ; whereby it was voted, That all commissions should be granted by the lord-general and be under his command, being necessary for the present affairs and the safety of the kingdom.—The commons were before-hand apprised of this matter, and, at the same time, sent a message to the lords, to let them know, That sir Wm. Waller had offered to give up his last commission ; and that they were of opinion the best way to discover the conveniency or inconveniency of it, was, to appoint a committee to go to the lord-general, with power to consider of, and advise with his excellency, what course was fittest for settling this business the most for the safety of the kingdom. A committee of both houses was immediately appointed to wait upon the lord-general, on this affair, each house, though late, resolving to sit till their return ; after which the lords received the following Votes from the commons :—" The lords and commons do declare, That, by virtue of their last commission, sir Wm. Waller is under the command of the lord-general, and is bound to obey him, notwithstanding any thing in his commission ; and sir Wm. Waller, being present at this debate, did declare, That he ever had been, and is, willing and ready to obey his excellency the lord-general's commands. And, whereas, by the words of the last commission to sir Wm. Waller, it is mentioned, That he was to receive his instructions from both houses, it is this day ordered, by the lords and commons, That sir Wm. Waller shall, from time to time, receive and observe such instructions as the lord-general shall give him."

The Commons further Reasons for desiring the Lords concurrence in making a new Great Seal.] Oct. 11. A Report was made to the lords of a conference held the day before, between the two houses, of a matter which had long lain dormant, the lords having absolutely refused to accede to it ; namely the making of a new Great Seal : viz.

" That the commons, divers months since, presented to their lordships several Votes, concerning the Great Seal, wherein they desired their lordships concurrence : and since, because of the absence of the Great Seal, which should attend the parliament, new mischiefs have sprung up ; which causes a necessity to have the Great Seal more at this time than ever, is in respect of the use which hath been made of the Great Seal, at Oxford, against the parliament and their proceedings : 1. Considering the clandestine going away of the lord-keeper, who is a sworn officer, with the Great Seal from the parliament ; and as soon as he came to Oxford it was taken from him, and put into another hand ; as appeareth by the lord-keeper's own letter, when writs were sent to him to be sealed, he returned for answer, That the seal was not in his hands, but Mr. Porter's. 2. There hath, by virtue of the Great Seal's being at Oxford, commissions for raising armies against the parliament, issued out ; commissions to new sheriffs, and an extraordinary power put into their hands ; commissions of array ; proclamations to proclaim his majesty's good subjects to be traitors ; commissions of Over and Terminer, to proceed against those that have held with the parliament ; and, one, instar omnium, the commission to one Mr. Tomkins and others, for destruction of the parliament, city, and kingdom ; also a proclamation lately come forth, for seizing the estates of all parliament men, and any that adhere to the parliament. 3. That the Great Seal is now put into the hands of sir George Ratcliffe, a person impeached of high treason by the parliament ; whereas the Great Seal should be in the hands of a sworn officer, and none else. Besides these considerations, the absolute necessity of preserving the government of the kingdom, and of the ministration of the justice thereof, enforces the parliament to provide a new Great Seal to attend the parliament according to the law ; for there is now a general stop and denial of justice, none being permitted to have the use of the Great Seal at Oxford ; whereby the dissolution of this present parliament is in great danger, for new writs of election have been denied to supply the house of commons with members in the room of those that are void by defection, apostacy, and death : therefore it is absolutely necessary to have a Great Seal to attend the parliament for the preservation and continuance of it. Also the ordinary proceedings at the law are obstructed whereby the subject should be relieved ; as no writs of error can be granted for reversal of erroneous judgments ; nor original writs of assize, which are Festina Remedia ; writs to supply churches within six months, which admits no delay ; no fines or recoveries ; writs of Habeas Corpus, or dower, judges commissions ; and many other writs as are for the speedy relief and benefit of the subject, cannot be had by reason the Great Seal is at Oxford. All these considered, the commons desire their lordships concurrence in the Votes for making of a new Great Seal to attend the parliament, for the dispatch of the business of the kingdom."

The Lords give their Consent thereto.] The Lords taking into consideration the necessity of preserving the government of this kingdom, his majesty's authority in parliament, and the being thereof, and the preservation of the administration of the justice of this kingdom; and perceiving, by these mischiefs, how absolutely necessary it is to have the Great Seal attending the parliament, for the reasons aforesaid, after a mature debate, this question was put, Whether a Great Seal of England shall be forthwith made, to attend the parliament, for dispatch of the affairs of the parliament and the kingdom? It passed affirmatively. And accordingly, the next day the lords sent a message to the commons, to acquaint them with their concurrence in the Vote for making a new Great Seal of England.—We before observed (p. 143), that the lords having refused their consent to the Vote of the commons for making a new Great Seal, the latter gave orders for making one; the form of which was, a representation of the house of commons, the members sitting, on one side; and the arms of England and Ireland, on the other. But the lords having now given their consent, another Great Seal was ordered to be made in the same form and manner as the king's.

Oct. 16. The Scots Army, being now ready to enter this kingdom, only stayed for the stipulated sums, which had been agreed upon at Edinburgh, some time before, by commissioners on both sides appointed for that purpose. To this end the commons sent up an Ordinance this day, to the lords, which they had framed to hasten their march, which was readily agreed to by the latter.—Some time after this, the Scots finding that the money from England did not come so soon as was expected, they sent a Remonstrance over, alledging, "That they saw plainly, by the Cessation of arms in Ireland, that the Protestant religion was to be rooted out there, and the whole force of the rebels turned against the Scots army in that kingdom; which made the Scots take the Covenant unanimously; and they were resolved, their eyes being now opened, to join with their brethren of England in defence and preservation of religion against the common enemy. That they had named all their officers and listed all their soldiers; their artillery and ammunition was at Leith, and they were making provisions of victual, as far as they were able. But they confessed, nay they said they were not ashamed to confess their want of money; therefore they desired to have a speedy supply, whereby they might be able to keep their army together when it was in a body. And whenever they should have proper notice, from parliament, of the agreements, they would be ready to march to their rendezvous in 48 hours time. Lastly, they desired that the towns, stipulated for, might be taken into consideration."

It is necessary to be remembered in this place, that about the middle of August, the estates of Scotland had published a Proclamation in the king's name, requiring all persons, from 16 to 60, to appear in arms, in support and defence of the Solemn League and Covenant. This the king was so highly incensed at, that, on the 16th Sept. he wrote a letter to the council, setting forth, "That he had, with great amazement, seen a Paper, most impudently published without his privy or authority, tending to cast the beloved people of his native kingdom into the like bloody combustions and rebellious violation of their religion and allegiance, as those already in England: forbidding all obedience to the said Proclamation, and all other papers published in his name, which should not immediately be warranted by himself: and commanding this his Letter to be published, and also recorded in the books of the Privy Council there."—What regard was paid to this letter will shortly appear.

The Earl of Holland, who had joined the King at Oxford, returns to the Parliament.] Nov. 6. An account was brought to the house of lords, that the earl of Holland, who had been with the king some time, was taken by a party of the parliament's forces: hereupon he was ordered to be committed to the custody of the black rod. But, upon examination, it being found, that his lordship had left the king and was returning to parliament, he was set at liberty. However, this earl had a narrow escape in the house of commons; for a motion for sending him to the Tower passed in the negative, by only 59 against 58; as did another for his being made prisoner elsewhere, by 59 against 56.

Ordinance for making a new Great Seal.] Nov. 10. The commons had framed an Ordinance relating to their new Great Seal, which the lords were not over hasty to agree to; at last, on repeated messages from the commons, the lords passed it this day, as follows:

"Whereas the Great Seal of England, which, by the laws of this realm, ought to attend the parliament, being the supreme court of justice and judicature within this realm, for the dispatch of the great and weighty affairs of the commonwealth, which is especially interested and concerned therein, was, above a year last past, that is to say, the 22d of May, 1642, by the then lord-keeper thereof, Edward lord Littleton, then a member and speaker of the house of peers, contrary to the great trust in him reposed, and duty of his place, secretly and perfidiously conveyed away from the parliament into the king's army, raised against the parliament; the said lord-keeper departing therewith into the said army, without the leave or privy of the said house; by means whereof, great mischiefs and inconveniences have ensued to this kingdom, and the kingdom of Ireland.—And whereas the said Great Seal ought constantly to remain in the hands and custody of one or more officer or officers, sworn for that service, and to be used and employed for the weal and safety of his majesty's people; which, notwithstanding, hath been divers times, since the conveying away thereof as aforesaid, put into the hands of other persons not sworn, and popishly and dangerously affected, who have had the disposing and managing thereof at their own wills and pleasures; and hath been traiterously and perniciously abused, to the ruin and destruction of the parliament and kingdom, by granting and issuing out divers illegal commissions of array, and other unlawful commissions for raising of forces against the parliament; by issuing out most foul and scandalous Papers, under the name and title of Proclamations, against both houses of parliament, and divers members thereof, and others adhering to them, and proclaiming them traitors and rebels; commissions of Oyer and Terminer, to proceed against divers of them as traitors, and other commissions to seize and confiscate their estates, for no other cause, but for doing their duties and services to the commonwealth; as likewise by granting that horrid commission, for executing of that most bloody and detestable design of Waller and Tomkins, and others, for the destruction of the parliament, and city of London, and of the army raised for their just defence; and (as if massacres and assassinations had been but light and venial crimes) another commission hath been granted, under the same seal, for a Cessation of Arms with the barbarous and bloody rebels in Ireland, after the effusion of so much innocent blood, and slaughter of above 100,000 protestants, men, women, and children, by their merciless and bloody hands; whereby a cessation of arms is accordingly concluded, and those brutish rebels thereby emboldened to prepare themselves, not only for a total extirpation of the protestants remaining there, but for a conquest also of this kingdom: and further, by granting of several commissions, and offices of trust and command, to notorious papists, who by the laws and statutes of this realm, are made incapable thereof; and by conferring of honours and dignities, and granting of lands and estates to divers exorbitant delinquents, who stand legally impeached of high treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors in parliament: All which, and many other unlawful and enormous acts have passed under the said Great Seal, since the removal thereof from the parliament, as aforesaid: which the lords and commons taking into their consideration, and finding all ways and means obstructed for the procuring of any redress from his majesty in the premises, notwithstanding their long hopes, and incessant labours for the obtaining thereof, are bound, in duty and of necessity, to provide some speedy remedy for these insupportable mischiefs.—Be it therefore declared and ordained by the said lords and commons, That as well all and every the said acts formerly mentioned, which have passed under the said Great Seal, as also all letters patents and grants of any lands, goods, or estates, of any person or persons whatsoever, for adhering to the parliament; all compositions or grants of any wardships, or leases of any wards, lands, liveries, premier seisins et ouster les maines, since the said 22d of May, 1642, which have not, according to the due course of law, passed through the court of wards and liveries, established by law: all grants since the said 22d of May, 1642, of any honours, dignities, manors, lands, hereditaments, or other thing whatsoever, to any person or persons, which have voluntarily contributed, or shall voluntarily contribute, any aid or assistance to the maintenance of the unnatural war raised against the parliament; and all pardons granted to any such person or persons; and all other acts or things whatsoever, contrary to, or in derogation of, the proceedings of both, or either houses of parliament, which have passed under the said Great Seal, since the removal thereof from the parliament, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, utterly invalid, void, and of none effect, to all intents and purposes.—And that all and every act or thing, which, after the publication of this Ordinance, shall pass by, or under, the said Great Seal, or under any Great Seal of England, (other than what is hereby appointed and established) shall be utterly void, frustrate, and of none effect; and every person or persons, which shall put the same in use, or shall claim any thing thereby, shall be held and adjudged a public enemy of this state.—And be it further ordained by the said lords and commons, That a Great Seal of England, already by them made and provided, shall be forthwith put in use; and shall be, and is hereby authorized and established to be, of like force, power, and validity, to all intents and purposes as any Great Seal of England hath been, or ought to be. And that it shall be put into the hands and custody of the persons hereafter named, who are hereby ordained commissioners for that purpose; that is to say, John earl of Rutland, and Oliver earl of Bolingbroke, members of the house of peers; Oliver St. John, esq. his majesty's solicitor-general,* John Wilde, serjeant at law, Samuel Brown and Edm. Prideaux, esqrs. members of the house of commons; which said persons, or any three or more of them, whereof one member or more of the lords house, also one member or more of the house of commons shall be present, shall have, and are hereby authorized to have, the keeping, ordering, and disposing thereof; as also all such and the like power and authority, as any lord chancellor, or lord keeper, or commissioner of the Great Seal, for the time being hath had, used, or ought to have."

A few days after the new Great Seal was carried up by the Speaker of the house of commons, the whole house attending him, and delivered to the Speaker of the lords house; who, in the presence of both houses, delivered it to the commissioners; and they all took an oath, to execute the office of keepers of the Great Seal of England, in all things according to the orders and directions of both houses of parliament; the Speaker of the peers swearing the two lords, and Mr. Brown, clerk to the parliament, the four commoners. It was then carried to Mr. Brown's house, in the Old Palace, and put into a chest with three different locks, not to be opened but when three of the commissioners were present.

The Parliament's Answer to the French Ambassador's Proposal for an Accommodation.] Nov. 11. A Memorial was presented to the house of lords, from the Ambassador of France, and read: it was in French, and the purport of it was to make proposals, in general, for an Accommodation between the king and parliament, in the name of the French king. The lords having communicated this Memorial to the commons, after a day or two's consideration, returned this Answer:—"The lords having received from the prince D'Harcourt, ambassador extraordinary in England, by the earl of Northumberland, a Paper in hæc verba, &c. and having communicated it to the commons, both houses, upon consideration thereof, do think fit that this Answer shall be returned thereunto: That the lords and commons will always, with due respect, acknowledge such good affection, as from the king his master and the queen his mistress shall be, at any time, expressed to the king and these kingdoms: professing that they desire nothing more than such a peace, as may as well procure honour and happiness to the king, as the preservation of the true reformed religion, the privileges of parliament, and the liberty of the subjects in his majesty's three kingdoms according to their late solemn League and Covenant. And when the prince D'Harcourt shall, from and in the name of the king his master, propose any thing to the lords and commons, they will thereupon do that which shall be fit, and which shall justify their proceedings to all the world; and that they had been forced to take up arms for their own just and necessary defence."

The Abp. of Canterbury pleads, Not Guilty.] Nov. 13. The Abp. of Canterbury was brought to the bar of the house of lords, and required, by them, to give in his Answer to the Impeachment of the commons against him. Which Answer was very short; for it only says, "That all exceptions to the said Articles of Impeachment to this defendant saved, he saith he is not guilty of all or any the matters charged by the said Impeachment, in such manner and form as are, by the said Articles charged against him." The abp. then made a speech and was remanded to the Tower.

Petition from the Assembly of Divines, to appoint Godly Magistrates, &c.] Dec. 1. The lords were informed that some Divines were ready at the door, to offer something to this house, from the Assembly; hereupon they were ordered in, and Dr. Burgesse, Mr. Calamy, Mr. Obadiah Sedgewick, and Mr. Chambers, presented a Petition, which was as follows:

"To the Right Hon. the LORDS assembled in Parliament, The humble MESSAGE and PETITION of the Assembly of Divines.

"The Assembly of Divines, in all humility and discharge of their duty to God and to this honourable house, do inform your lordships of the sad complaints brought unto them from many Godly and reverend divines in and about London, concerning the daily increase and growth of all manner of outrageous and intolerable abominations; such as drunkenness, swearing, uncleanness, and other crying sins, in very many places in this kingdom, for want of Godly and zealous Magistrates to repress the same; which cannot but highly provoke the Lord to more wrath against this kingdom, in this day of his wrath already broken out upon his people, and render fruitless all your pious endeavours for the reformation and weal of this kingdom, unless it be effectually and speedily cured. The Assembly, therefore, most humbly prayeth, that, according to your great wisdom and zeal for the publick, there may be a speedy appointing and settling of some able, Godly, prudent Magistrates, that may reside in all places of the kingdom where your wisdom shall find it necessary; to give a speedy stop to those high provocations of Almighty God, and the most dangerous supplanters of all our hopes of good from the parliament or the Assembly. Moreover, the Assembly having received a Paper, in the behalf of some Godly and hopeful students of the University of Oxford, with request to recommend it to the honourable houses of parliament; the Assembly, in all humble wise, presenteth the same to this most hon. house, conceiving it worthy of your noble thoughts and favour, yet not presuming to interpose their sense; and albeit they apprehend it to be a business of extraordinary consequence, for which much might be said, they lay all at your lordships feet. Lastly, The assembly having divers weighty business imposed on them by one or both the hon. houses of parliament, which do occasion extraordinary labour to the scribes, and lay upon them more work than they are able to dispatch; the assembly prayeth, That the hon. houses of Parliament would be pleased to add Mr. John Wallis, a judicious and Godly young man, to be an amanuensis and assistant to the scribes in the Assembly, in this public service. All which the Assembly, most humbly submitteth to the wisdom and prudence of your lordships, incessantly importuning the Throne of Grace to pour down richly and daily the choicest of his graces upon your honours, and to follow all your noble endeavours with a blessing to the king's majesty, the church, kingdom, and yourselves. Henry Roborough, Adoniram Byfield, Scribes."

Dec. 4. The lord-general Essex informed the lords, That he had received advice from sir William Waller, acquainting him the king was advancing to Basing, which place sir William had besieged. That the parliament's army under sir William was very weak, and desired them to consider of a speedy way both to recruit and maintain it. Referred to a conference.

The E. of Warwick appointed Lord High-Admiral of England by the Parliament.] Dec.

9. The lords and commons having made an Ordinance for constituting Robert earl of Warwick lord high admiral of England; this day, his lordship moved in the house, that the lords would take it into their present consideration, how to make provision of flesh, ammunition, and other necessities, for setting forth the next year's navy: that this was the month proper for such provision, or else it would be impossible to get the navy fitted out in time: that, upon advice, it was thought fit to have, at least, 46 ships to guard the seas; and 60,000*l.* was required to be presently advanced for provisions, &c. as appeared by the following Estimate made for that purpose:

"The CERTIFICATE and ESTIMATE of the Charge of the Fleet, sent to the Lord-Admiral from the Commissioners of the Navy.

"According to your lordship's order, we have seriously debated what number of men are requisite for a Fleet for the next year's service; and do humbly conceive there cannot be less than 5000 allotted for the service of the fleet, if the state resolve to keep the seas in safety. These 5000 men will supply 46 sail of ships, viz. 2 of the second, 9 of the third, 20 of the fourth, 10 of the fifth, and 5 of the sixth rank. Of these 46 ships there are 26 of his majesty's that may be fitted for the service, the rest, viz. 20, must be taken up in the river from the merchants. We also conceive that those 46 sail of ships may be distributed thus: 10 to the West, 16 for Ireland and the Severn, 12 for the Downs, and 8 for the coasts of Scotland, according to the parliaments agreement. We do also conceive that 3000 men, in 30 of his majesty's and the merchant ships, will be a competent winter guard for the next year.—If your lordship shall resolve to fix upon this number of men and ships, for the next year's service, we humbly desire your lordship to represent to the house the State of the whole Navy for this and the next year's service, in the Heads following, viz.

For the charge of 5000 men in 26 of his majesty's and 20 merchant ships, for 8 months service in the year 1644	£. 130,000
For the charge of 3000 men, in 30 ships, for the next winter's guards, for 5 months	60,000
For the ordinary expence of the whole Navy, in harbour, for the year 1644	18,000

For the charge of the extraordinary and ordinary expence of the next year's service, in the office of the Ordinance, per estimation

20,000

For the victuals of 4000 men, for 6 months, in 40 ships, supposed to be set at sea, as reprizals, according to a late Ordinance

24,000

For the payment of the Ordinary for this year's Winter Guard, now at sea, the freight of sundry merchant men already discharged, and for divers other provisions due to sundry men in this and the last year's service

Total . . . £. 292,000

Which said sum of 292,000*l.* we desire may be settled out of the revenues of the customs and excise, to be paid to the treasurer of the navy, before your lordships proceed in the service. We are confident little or nothing can be abated with safety; yet if the houses shall not think fit to allow so great a number of men or ships, we desire your lordships that whatsoever they shall think fit to order, the money may, in the first place, be assigned to be paid into the treasurer of the navy before the service be undertaken; for we are not able to wade any further in the service, unless our credit be preserved by current payments. The payment of the aforesaid sum of 292,000*l.* may be seasonably supplied as followeth:

For victuals and stores for the Summer's fleet

50,000

For victuals of merchant ships supposed to be set forth as reprizals

The rest as the service may require, and the state shall be enabled. We have propounded the business of the Victuals to Mr. Alcock, who absolutely refuseth it by way of contract, but yet offers his endeavours in it by way of account; provided he may be enabled with monies to proceed cheerfully therein, and have some other able men joined with him in the management of that service. We believe we shall not be able to get any men to undertake the business by contract, and therefore desire your lordship to send unto Mr. Alcock, and settle the business upon him as your lordship shall think fit, that the service may not suffer for want of settling that office: all which we leave to your lordships wisdoms, and remain, at your lordships command, Richard Carnley, John Morris, John Holland. December 5, 1643."

The earl of Warwick moved, That a conference might be had presently with the commons, to communicate this Estimate to them, and desire that some course may be speedily taken to procure monies and other provisions, that no time be lost to expedite this business. This was done accordingly.

*Death of Mr. Pym—The Commons order a Monument to be erected to his Memory; and vote 10,000*l.* for payment of his Debts.]* Dec.

11. Some Orders, made by the house of commons this day, give us occasion to mention the Death of Mr. Pym, one of the most active members that ever sat in that house. The respect shewed to his memory, is without a precedent in the whole course of this History. For we find, in the Journals, "That a committee was appointed to consider of the Estate of Mr. Pym, deceased, and to offer what they think fit to be done in consideration of it to the house; likewise to take care to prepare a Monument for him, at the charge of the commonwealth." It was also ordered, that the body of Mr. Pym be interred in Westminster-Abbey, without any charge for breaking open the ground there; and that the Speaker, with the whole house, do accompany his body to the interment."—Mr. Whitlocke ascribes Mr. Pym's death, chiefly to his excessive fatigue in the service of parliament. Lord Clarendon says, he died of the Morbus Pediculosus; and, after the highest commendation of his abilities, and the heaviest censure of his actions, concludes with saying, "That as, during his sickness, he was a very sad spectacle, so that none were admitted to him who had not concurred with him, it is not known what his last thoughts and considerations were." But Mr. Rushworth says, "The report of his dying of the distemper beforementioned was not true; and that, for public satisfaction therein, his dead body was for some time exposed to, and viewed by many hundreds of people: the true natural cause of his death seeming to be the great pains he took, joined with a competent old age, and, at best, but an infirm constitution."—By some subsequent Orders, it appears that Mr. Pym died greatly in debt, though possessed of the place of lieutenant of the ordinance; for, Jan. 13, we find the commons referred it to the aforesaid committee "to consider of some other way for a recompence to the posterity of Mr. Pym, and payment of those Debts he had contracted for the service of the commonwealth, than they had yet thought on; and to use all diligence to find out some fit return, answerable to the memory and merit of so great a man." Accordingly, afterwards, the whole house undertook to pay the Debts of Mr. Pym, not exceeding 10,000*l*.

Origin of the Self-Denying Ordinance.
Dec. 12. It was moved in the lords, "That this house should declare it, as their opinion, that no Member of either House of parliament might be admitted to execute any Place of Profit; and a committee of 7 lords were ordered to draw up an Order, and word it to that sense." These withdrawing, soon returned with such an Order; and then the question was put, Whether that paper, now read, should be entered as the Opinion and Resolution of this house? Which passed in the affirmative.—Ordered, by the lords and commons assembled in parliament, "That the Opinion and Resolution of this house is, from henceforth, not to admit the Members of either House of Parliament into any Place or Office, excepting such places of great trust as are to be executed by persons of eminency and known integrity, and are necessary for the government and safety of the kingdom."—But another Question being put, Whether this shall be drawn up into an Ordinance? it passed in the negative. Thus this political test was quashed for this time, but it most probably gave rise to the Self-denying Ordinance which passed afterwards.

Dec. 20. A conference was held between the two houses, wherein the lords communicated some Letters they had received from the lord general Essex, relative to the State of the Parliament's Army. The Votes passed by the lords, after reading the said Letters, to which the commons also agreed, were, That they approved of the counsel given to the lord-general by the committee of safety; and that he be desired to pursue it; and that letters should be written to him and the rest, to that effect. A committee of both houses was appointed to draw them up accordingly.—The same day, in the afternoon, copies of these Letters, so ordered, were read in the house of lords, and, afterwards, approved by both houses, as follows:

"Our very good lord; We are commanded, by both houses, to acquaint your lordship, That they have received your letter of the 18th present, with the enclosed copies of Letters between the Committee of Safety and your excellency; and having well weighed the grounds expressed in the letters from the committee of safety to your lordship, and taking into consideration how necessary it is that the passages should be secured, where the forces of the enemy may break into Surrey, Middlesex, and Kent, they have thought fit to approve of the advice given to your lordship by the committee of safety, for the speedy drawing your lordship's forces towards Windsor, or those parts; especially seeing sir Wm. Waller is now marched towards Arundel with all his forces, and left only a garrison in Farnham-Castle; and that sir Ralph Hopton (as the houses are informed) hath drawn all the forces he can make towards Basing. And to the end that the counties, where your lordship's army is now quartered, may not be exposed to danger, by the breaking in of the enemy's forces upon your lordship's marching from thence, the two houses have written a letter (a copy whereof they send your lordship here enclosed) to the earl of Manchester, in pursuance of the advice lately given your lordship by the committee of safety, and the directions from your lordship in that behalf, for to draw up speedily the forces under his lordship's command, for the security of those counties. The houses have likewise sent another letter (the copy whereof is here enclosed) unto the committee of the Militia of Hertfordshire, for the speedy sending into Newport-Pagnell the forces intended for that garrison: and therefore we are ordered by both houses, to desire your lordship, that Newport-Pagnell being secured, your lordship do pursue the advice given your excellency by the committee of safety, for the drawing your forces towards Windsor, or those parts; which will be, as they conceive, of the greatest security to this city, and the counties most threatened and subject to danger. And so we bid your lordship heartily farewell, being your, &c. WHARTON, Speaker of the House of Peers pro tempore. WM. LENTHALL, Speaker of the Commons House in Parliament. Westminster, Dec. 20, 1643."

The Earl of Bedford, who had joined the King, returns to the Parliament.] Dec. 30. A Letter was this day read in the house of lords, from the earl of Bedford; who, with the earls of Clare and Holland, had deserted the parliament, and gone over to the king at Oxford. The latter had already made his peace at Westminster; the other found means to escape from the guard his majesty had set over him, and retired to his seat in Nottinghamshire. Lord Clarendon condemns the manner in which these peers were received by the king and his council at Oxford; his opinion being that penitents of such consequence ought to have been received with open Arms. And Mr. Whitlocke observes, "That it was said, in drollery, these three earls had much confirmed others to continue with the parliament; for they having tried both parties, found, by experience, that this was the best to be in and adhere to.—The earl of Bedford's Submission was ushered in by the following Letter from the lord-general Essex, directed to the Speaker of the house of peers:

"My Lord; There hath been a strict and long obligation betwixt the families of my lord of Bedford's and mine; yet, in this general cause that we are engaged in, which is for the maintenance of religion, and the liberty and just freedom of the subjects of England; and the plotters against all these growing every day more maliciously bent to the ruin of them all, would have made me laid aside all particular ends of my own; but hearing, by an intimate friend of his lordship's, his desire to return to serve the parliament with his life and fortune, being very sensible of his fault in deserting them, and being an eye-witness of their ill intentions to the destruction of this kingdom, he desired a pass to return, and my reception of him to this side, which I did by that great favour and trust the parliament was pleased to entrust me with; and which, by my utmost care, with the hazard of my life, I shall use for your safety, being your lordship's, &c. ESSEX. St. Alban's, Dec. 30, 1643."

Next was read the earl of Bedford's Letter, directed to the Speaker of the house of peers, as follows:

"My Lord; The great sense I had of the miseries and distractions of this kingdom, and the small probability that appeared, to my judgment, of any speedy end thereof, made me think I could do the kingdom no better service, as matters then stood, than by using my best endeavours, and those of my friends, to procure his majesty to comply with his parliament; for which purpose I went to Oxford, where I was no sooner arrived, but I perceived contrary counsels to be too prevalent, and that my endeavours would be altogether fruitless; wherefore, presently seeing my former mistake, I resolved thenceforth, whatsoever prejudice might befall me thereby, to cast myself wholly upon the favour and the mercy of the parliament, and to make no longer stay at Oxford, than I could find means and opportunity for my safe return; whereupon I made use of my nearest friends to procure me a pass from my lord-general, which he nobly granted me. Therewith I am come safe to St. Alban's, and have now put myself into his excellency's custody; where I intend to remain until I shall receive your lordships commands and directions; being ready to undergo what censure your lordships shall please to impose upon me for my sudden and unadvised departure from your lordships, without your leaves and consents; not expecting or thinking myself worthy of the honour to sit again amongst you, until your lordships shall be fully satisfied of the reality of my faithfulness to the parliament and kingdom; which I shall be very ready to express and manifest by any act, way, or means whatsoever, which your lordships, in your wisdoms, shall think fit to prescribe or appoint. Expecting your lordship's answer, I rest, your lordship's most humble servant, BEDFORD. St. Alban's, Dec. 30, 1643."

Hereupon the lords ordered that, for the present, the earl of Bedford should stand committed to the safe custody of the gentleman usher attending that house; there to remain until their pleasure be further signified.

Articles between the English and Scots Parliaments, concerning the latter's marching their Army into England.] This day, several Papers were read, which came from the parliament's commissioners in Scotland, relating to the Treaty then just concluded with that kingdom, concerning the Solemn League and Covenant, and the assistance demanded in pursuance of the ends expressed therein: the Articles of which had been sent up by the commons with their approbation of them, and were referred by the lords to a committee then appointed for that purpose; and are as follows:

"Whereas the two houses of the parliament of England, out of a just and deep sense of the great and imminent danger of the true protestant religion, in regard of the great forces of papists, prelates, malignants, and their adherents, raised and employed against the constant professors thereof in England and Ireland, thought fit to send their Commissioners unto the kingdom of Scotland, to treat with the Convention of Estates and General Assembly there, concerning such things as might tend to the preservation of religion, and the mutual good of both nations: and, to that end, to desire a more near and strict union betwixt the two kingdoms; and the assistance of the kingdom of Scotland, by a considerable strength to be raised and sent by them into the kingdom of England.—And whereas, upon a consultation held betwixt the Commissioners of the Parliament of England, and the Committees of the Convention of Estates and General Assembly, no means was thought so expedient to accomplish and strengthen the union, as for both nations to enter into a Solemn League and Covenant, and a form thereof to be drawn and presented to the two houses of the parliament of England, the Convention of Estates, and General Assembly, of Scotland; which hath accordingly been done, and received their approbation.—And whereas the particulars, concerning the assistance desired by the two houses of the parliament of England, from their brethren of Scotland, were delivered in by the English Commissioners, August 19, to the Convention of Estates; who did thereupon give power to their committee to consider and debate farther with the English commissioners, of what other Propositions might be added or concluded; whereby the assistance desired might be made more effectual and beneficial. And, in pursuance thereof, these Propositions following were considered of, and debated by the committee and commissioners aforesaid, to be certified, with all convenient speed, to the two houses of the parliament of England, and the convention of estates of Scotland, by their respective committees and commissioners, to be respectively taken into their consideration, and proceeded with as they shall find cause: which being accordingly done, and these ensuing Propositions approved, agreed, and concluded of by the two houses of the parliament of England, and the committee of the estates of Scotland respectively, and power by them given to their respective committees and commissioners, to agree and conclude the same, as may appear by the Votes of both houses, dated Nov. 1, and the Order of the Committee, bearing date of Nov. 17. We the said commissioners and committees, according to their Votes and Orders, do formally conclude and agree upon these Articles following; and, in confirmation thereof, do mutually subscribe the same. I. It is agreed and concluded, That the Covenant represented to the Convention of Estates and General Assembly of Scotland, and sent to both houses of the parliament of England, in the same form as it is now returned from the two houses of the parliament of England to their brethren of Scotland, and allowed by the Committee of Estates and Commissioners of the General Assembly, be sworn and subscribed by both kingdoms, as a most near tie and conjunction between them, for their mutual defence against the papists and prelatical faction, and their adherents, in both kingdoms, and for pursuance of the ends expressed in the said Covenant. II. That an Army to this purpose shall be levied forthwith, consisting of 18,000 foot effective, 2000 horse, and 1000 dragoons effective, with a suitable train of artillery, to be ready at some general rendezvous, near the borders of England, to march into England for the purposes aforesaid, with all convenient speed: the said horse and foot to be well and completely armed, and provided with victuals and pay for 40 days; and the said train of artillery to be fitted in all points ready to march. III. That the Army be commanded by a general appointed by the estates of Scotland, and subject to such resolutions and directions as are and shall be agreed and concluded on mutually between the two kingdoms, or by committees appointed by them in that behalf, for pursuance of the ends before-mentioned. IV. That the charge of levying, arming, and bringing the said forces together furnished, as also the fitting the train of artillery in readiness to march, be computed and set down, according to the same rates, as if the kingdom of Scotland were to raise the said army for themselves and their own affairs: all which, for the present, is to be done by the kingdom of Scotland upon account, and the account to be delivered to the commissioners of the kingdom of England; and when the peace of the two kingdoms is settled, the same to be repaid, or satisfied, to the kingdom of Scotland. V. That this army be likewise paid, as if the kingdom of Scotland were to employ the same for their own occasions; and towards the defraying thereof (it not amounting to the full month's pay) shall be monthly allowed and paid the sum of 30,000*l* sterling, by the parliament of England, out of the estates and revenues of the papists, prelates, malignants, and their adherents, or otherwise. And in case the said 30,000*l*. monthly, or any part thereof, be not paid at the time when it shall become due and payable, the kingdom of England shall give the public faith for the paying of the remainder, unpaid, with all possible speed, allowing the rate of 8 pounds per cent. till the time of the performance thereof. And in case that, notwithstanding the said monthly sum of 30,000*l*. paid as aforesaid, the states and kingdom of Scotland shall have just cause to demand farther satisfaction of their brethren of England; they shall, for the pains, hazard, and charges they have undergone in the same, by way of Brotherly Assistance, have due recompence made unto them by the kingdom of England, when the peace of both kingdoms is settled; and that out of such lands and estates of the papists, prelates, malignants, and their adherents, as the two houses of parliament shall think fit; and for the assurance thereof the public faith of the kingdom of England shall be given them. VI. And to the end the said Army, in manner aforesaid, may be enabled and prepared to march, the kingdom of England is to pay, in ready money, to their brethren of Scotland, or such as shall have power from the estates of that kingdom, the sum of 100,000*l*. sterling, at Leith or Edinburgh, with all convenient speed, by way of advance before-hand; which is to be discounted back again unto the kingdom of England, by the kingdom of Scotland, upon the first monthly allowance, which shall grow due to the Scots Army, from the time they shall make their first entrance into the kingdom of England. VII. That the kingdom of Scotland, to manifest their willingness to their utmost ability to be helpful to their brethren of England in this common cause, will give the public faith of the kingdom of Scotland to be jointly made use of with the public faith of the kingdom of England, for the present taking up 200,000*l.* sterling, in the kingdom of England or elsewhere, for speedy payment of the said 100,000*l.* as aforesaid, as also a considerable sum for satisfying, in good proportion, the arrears of the Scots Army in Ireland. VIII. That no Cessation, nor any Pacification or Agreement of peace whatsoever, shall be made by either kingdom, or the armies of either kingdom, without the mutual advice and consent of both kingdoms, or their committees in that behalf appointed, who are to have full power for the same; in case the houses of the parliament of England, or the parliament or convention of estates of Scotland, shall not sit. IX. That the public faith of the kingdom of Scotland shall be given to their brethren of England, that neither their entrance into, nor their continuance in, the kingdom of England, shall be made use of to any other ends than are expressed in the Covenant, and in the Articles of this Treaty; and that all matters of difference, that shall happen to arise between the subjects of the two nations, shall be resolved and determined by the mutual advice and consent of both kingdoms, or by such committees as for this purpose shall be by them appointed, with the same power, as in the precedent Article. X. That in the same manner, and upon the same conditions, as the kingdom of Scotland is now willing to aid and assist their brethren of England, the kingdom of England doth oblige themselves to aid and assist the kingdom of Scotland, in the same or like cases of straits and extremities. Lastly, It is agreed and concluded, That during the time that the Scots army shall be employed as aforesaid, for the defence of Scotland, there shall be fitted out, as men of war, 8 ships, whereof 6 shall be of burden betwixt 120 and 200 ton, the other betwixt 3 and 400 ton, whereof two shall be in lieu of the two ships appointed by the Irish treaty; all which shall be maintained at the charge of the kingdom of England, to be employed for the defence of the coast of Scotland, under such commanders as the earl of Warwick, for the time of his being admiral, shall nominate, with the approbation of the committees of both kingdoms; which commanders shall receive, from the said earl, general instructions, that they do from time to time observe the directions of the committees of both kingdoms."

Next follow the several Declarations, &c. of the Convention of Estates of Scotland, before and at their army's entering into England. With the former papers, came receipts for 50,000*l.* paid at Edinburgh, as part of the 200,000*l.* stipulated for.—The king to obviate as much as possible this confederacy of the parliaments of both kingdoms against him, issued a Proclamation, inviting all such members of both houses as had already left their seats at Westminster, or were inclined to do so, to meet him at Oxford, and consult of the best measures for his own safety. So great a number obeyed this summons, that they, soon after, formed a Convention or Anti-Parliament, as will appear in the sequel.

VOL. III.

Impeachment of the Queen.] Jan. 3. This day we find an entry in the lords Journals, which runs thus:—"Next was read the Impeachment of High Treason against the Queen, brought up formerly from the house of commons," (p. 117). A space is then left where the entry of the said Impeachment was; but in the margin is written, vacat. per order, 16 Julii, 1660; so that the lords, after the Restoration, thought this proceeding of such a nature, as not to suffer the memorial of it to remain longer on their records. However, it is plain they were in earnest against her at this time, by the subsequent entry which still stands in their Journals. Ordered, "That the following lords be appointed commissioners to consider what method of proceeding, for bringing the Queen to her Trial, is most agreeable to a parliamentary way; and peruse precedents for settling a sure course therein, for others to do the like for the future, viz. Northumberland, Essex, Kent, Lincoln, Denbigh, Bolingbroke, Say and Sele, Wharton, and Howard. Their lordships, or any five of them, to meet in two days time, in the Prince's Lodgings, and afterwards when they please; and have, hereby, power to call such persons to assist them, as they shall think fittest to advise them therein."

The King's Proclamation for calling the Members to meet at Oxford.] Jan. 6. The lord general presented to the lords an intercepted Letter, from the lord Digby,* directed to sir Henry De Vic; with a Proclamation inclosed, inviting the members of parliament to come to Oxford. The Proclamation was as follows:

By the King: A PROCLAMATION for assembling the Members of both Houses at Oxford, upon Occasion of the Invasion by the Scots.

"C. R. Whereas we did, by our Proclamation, bearing date the 20th day of June last, upon due consideration of the miseries of this kingdom and the true causes thereof, warn all our good subjects no longer to be misled by the Votes, Orders, and pretended Ordinances of one or both houses, by reason the members do not enjoy the freedom and liberty of parliament, which appears by several instances of force and violence, and by the course of their proceedings, mentioned in our said Proclamation and several of our Declarations; since which time our subjects of Scotland have made great and warlike preparations to enter and invade this kingdom with an army, and have already actually invaded the same, by possessing themselves, by force of arms, of our town of Berwick, upon pretence that they are invited thereunto by the desires of the two houses; the which, as we doubt not all our good subjects of this kingdom will look upon as the most insolent act of ingratitude and disloyalty, and to the apparent breach of the late act of Pacification, so solemnly made between the two kingdoms; and is indeed no other than a design of conquest and to impose new laws upon this nation, they not so much as pretending the least provocation or violation from this kingdom; so we are most assured that the major part of both houses of parliament do, from their souls, abhor the least thoughts of introducing that foreign power, to increase and make desperate the miseries of their unhappy country: and, therefore, that it may appear to all the world how far the major part of both houses is from such actions of treason and disloyalty, and how grossly those few members remaining at Westminster have and do impose upon our people, We do will and require such of the members of both houses, as well those who have been, by the faction of the Malignant Party, expelled for performing their duty to us, and into whose rooms no persons have been since chosen by their country, as the rest who have been driven thence, and all those who, being conscious of their want of freedom, shall now be willing to withdraw from that rebellious city, to assemble themselves together at our city of Oxford, on Monday the 22d of Jan.; where care shall be taken for their several accommodations, and fit places appointed for their meeting; and where all our good subjects shall see how willing we are to receive advice (for the preservation of the religion, laws, and safety of the kingdom, and, as far as in us lies, to restore it to its former peace and security, our chief and only end) from those whom they have trusted, though we cannot receive it in the place where we appointed.—And for the better encouragement of those members of either house to resort to us, who may be conscious to themselves of having justly incurred our displeasure, by submitting to, or concurring in, unlawful actions; and that all the world may see how willing and desirous we are to forget the injuries and indignities offered to us, and, by an union of English hearts, to prevent the lasting miseries which this foreign invasion must bring upon this kingdom, we do offer a free and general Pardon, without exceptions, to all the members of either house who shall, at or before the said 22d of Jan. appear at our city of Oxford and desire the same; which (considering the manifest treasons committed against us, and the condition we are now in, which is improved, by God's wonderful blessing, to a better degree than we have enjoyed at any time since these distractions) is the greatest instance of princely and fatherly care of our people that can be expressed, and which malice itself cannot suggest to proceed from any other ground; and therefore we hope, and are confident, that all such, who, upon this our gracious invitation, will not return to their duty and allegiance, shall be no more thought promoters of the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom; (which this way may be, without doubt, settled and secured) but persons engaged, from the beginning, out of their own pride, malice, and ambition, to bring confusion and desolation upon their country; and, to that purpose, having long since conceived the design, to invite and join with a foreign nation to ruin and extinguish their own; and shall accordingly be pursued as the most desperate and malicious enemies of the kingdom. And our pleasure is that this our Proclamation be read, in all churches and chapels, within this our kingdom and dominion of Wales. Given at our Court at Oxford, Dec. 22, 1643."

The lords conceiving this business to be of great consequence, ordered, That the clerk of the parliament shall bring in an account tomorrow of all the Impeachments brought up from the commons against delinquents; that so this house may know how far they have been proceeded in, and take such farther course for bringing of delinquents to a trial as they shall think fit: and that all the lords have notice given them to be at this house tomorrow morning; and that the foregoing Proclamation be communicated to the commons at a conference.

Project for a Treaty between the King and the City of London without the Parliament. Jan. 8. The parliament was once more alarmed with the discovery of another Plot, which was communicated from the commons to the lords, at a conference; it was said to be a dangerous design to make a difference and division between the king and the parliament; and to dishearten the Scots from coming in to the assistance of this kingdom. It was contained in the following Letters, exhibited at the same time, to the lords, which were read: 1. A Letter sent to Mr. Ryley, a member of the commons, under the name of the 'Man in the Moon.' 2. Tho. Violet's Letter to Mr. Ryley, Jan. 3, 1643. 3. A second Letter to Mr. Ryley. 4. The lord Digby's letter to sir Basil Brooke, Dec. 29, 1643. 5. The King's Letter to the lord mayor and aldermen of London, and all other well-affected subjects of that city.—The intent of this Project, or Plot, was for the city of London to petition his majesty for Peace, and to set on foot a Treaty immediately between the king and the city: and for the grounds of such Treaty, sir Basil Brooke, Mr. Ryley, and Mr. Violet, framed these Propositions, viz. I. "That the city might be satisfied that the king would settle the Protestant religion, for without that neither the parliament nor the city would admit any Treaty.

II. That the debts contracted upon the public faith on either side, by king or parliament, should be satisfied; and the most likely way for doing thereof was to settle the Excise for those purposes. III. That it was conceived that (in respect of the king's late Declaration that the two houses at Westminster were no free parliament, and that therefore the king could not treat with them any more) the Treaty was to be immediately between the king and the city; and the city was to be the medium between the king and parliament. But if any parliament men would join with the city in this Treaty, they also might come with them to Oxford, under the same Safe-Conduct granted to the city, though their names were not particularly mentioned; and so much was to be declared and expressed. IV. That there must be an act of oblivion for all parties and delinquents whatsoever, and a general pardon; and that no cessation be expected during the Treaty." But in these Propositions there was no mention made either of Scotland or Ireland.

The Votes of the house of commons, on this business, were these, viz. "That these Letters contain a seditious and jesuitical practice and design, under the fair and specious pretence of Peace, having its rise from known jesuits and papists, to work divisions between the parliament and city of London, to raise factions in both, and thereby make them fit for the design of the enemy: tending, also, to the breach of the public faith of this kingdom, unto our brethren of Scotland; engaged by the late solemn Covenant and Treaty, entered into by both nations; thereby not only to weaken us in our united forces against the common enemy, the Popish army; but to embroil the two nations in unhappy differences. Further; That the house of Commons had appointed a committee to go into the city, and communicate this business to them at a common-hall, as also the king's last Proclamation; and they desired their lordships to nominate another, to join with theirs and go along with them to the city." All which the lords agreed to; and a committee of 8 lords and 16 commoners was appointed for this purpose. This day a Message was sent from the lords to the commons to acquaint them, That they had appointed a committee to consider of the Proceedings against the Queen; and that they had occasion to advise with Mr. Solicitor-General, Mr. Selden, Mr. Glynn, and others, concerning precedents and records; and because they were members of their house, they desired leave to call on them, occasionally, for their assistance. This was readily granted by the commons.

Jan. 10. At a conference between the two houses, sir Wm. Strickland brought up an Impeachment of High Treason against George lord Goring, in the name of the commons; and that they, in due time, would send up Articles against him. In the Lords Journals we find a copy of an intercepted Letter, from the lord Goring to the queen, which was read at the same time.—The commons, after this, informed the lords, That a valise, full of letters, was brought to them, along with the former; upon which it was ordered, That they should be carried to the committee of safety, with a power to open all, or as many of them as they think meet, and report their observations on them to the house. But the earl of Essex moved, That it might be entered in the Journal Book of the lords, that it should be no precedent, that a copy of a letter, of such consequence as the lord Goring's should be brought up from the house of commons, instead of the original.

The Citizens of London invite the Lords and Commons to dine with them.] Jan. 13. The sheriffs of London, with divers aldermen and common council-men, came to the house of lords; and in the name of the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London, gave their lordships thanks for their pains and care in the preservation of the kingdom and city; in making good laws and appointing such a general, who is so much approved both for his counsel here and courage in the field, for the defending them and maintaining those laws against the force of the enemy, who endeavoured to take away the fruit of them: and likewise for their lordships vigilancy and industry in discovering plots, tending to divide the city from the parliament. And for a demonstration of a firm unity between the parliament and the city, they said, they were commanded, in the name of the whole city, to invite the members of both houses of parliament, and his excellency the lord-general, to dinner, at Merchant-Taylors-Hall, either on Tuesday or Thursday next; whereby the city may, in an humble way, express their thankfulness to the parliament. And further, Mr. Alderman Foulk declared, 'That he was commanded to express, from the whole city, that they were resolved to live and die with the parliament and the lord-general in this cause.'—Hereupon the sheriffs, &c. being withdrawn, the house appointed the earls of Northumberland, Essex lord-general, Sarum, and Manchester, with viscount Say and Sele, to consider what Answer is fitting to return to the city of London for this kind invitation. Presently the committee withdrew, and the earl of Manchester reported what was conceived, by them, fit to be returned as an Answer to the Invitation of the City, which was read and approved of, and their Speaker was appointed to return the following Answer, "To let them know that their lordships will come to them on Thursday next, according to their invitation; and that the lords conceive this invitation as a very great expression of that good affection which this famous city hath, upon all occasions, so eminently manifested for the assistance of the parliament, in the defence of religion, the laws and liberties of this kingdom, and privileges of parliament, by their example, contributions of money, and their readiness to employ their forces whensoever they have been desired; which the lords acknowledge to have been a principal means, next under the divine providence, of those good successes which we have had in the several late expeditions wherein they have assisted; and as the lords have endeavoured, to their utmost, not only the preservation of this kingdom, but, with particular care, tendered the good and safety of this city, as the metropolis thereof; so they will continue with constancy in the same resolution for the future."

Trial of the Abp. of Canterbury.] Jan. 16. A great many witnesses, in the cause of the Abp. of Canterbury, had been sworn in the house of lords; and this day came on the Trial of that great prelate at their bar; when serjeant Wylde, in the name of the commons and of all the commons of England, accused him of high treason, and of high crimes and misdemeanors; and desired, That the several Impeachments against him might be read, which was done accordingly. The serjeant then demanded the archbishop's Answer to these Articles, but none being given at this time, the Lords ordered, That the abp. should put in his Answer in writing, peremptorily, on Monday the 22nd instant. The whole proceedings in the Trial of this unfortunate prelate, having been many times printed in single volumes, and also published in the State-Trials, we think it unnecessary to croud this work with what is already in the libraries of every collector of English History.

Jan. 18. The earl of Essex informed the lords, that he had received intelligence, That sir Henry Vane, the younger, did keep a correspondence with the enemy, and that letters had passed between him and the lord Lovelace; and unless some course be taken to prevent this, he cannot, as lord-general, discharge his duty therein. No further notice is taken of it at this time: but Mr. Whitlocke informs us, 'That the house authorized sir Henry, Mr. St. John, and Mr. Brown, to keep a correspondence with the lord Lovelace, to sift what they could out of him; and that his lordship was too weak for these gentlemen.'

A Call of both Houses; When the Commons expell 50 of their Members.] Jan. 22. The archbishop of Canterbury's Trial came on again this day in the lords; when a call of that house was ordered, and made accordingly, by their titles. Several lords were excused; and for the rest who were with the king, or in his service, or would not attend, a committee was appointed to consider what was fit to be done with them.—The same day, there was a call of the house of commons, when 50 Members were disabled from sitting during this parliament, 'For deserting the service of the house, being in the king's quarters, and adhering to that party.' About 20 more were allowed only 14 days respite to appear in; otherwise they were to undergo the same fate. Mr. Whitlocke informs us that 280 members were present at the Call, besides which there were 100 employed in the service of the parliament in the several counties. It is observable that the Calls of both houses were made, at Westminster, the very day on which the king had appointed his Convention to meet at Oxford.

Plot against the Parliament, discovered.] Jan. 26. The lord Wharton made a report to the lords of the discovery of a design to divide the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, and also to betray the town and garrison of Aylesbury to the king. The effect of which was to get the moderate men and Independants together, to declare for suppressing the Presbyterian party, and keeping the Scots out of the kingdom. The design on Aylesbury was to gain some of the garrison to blow up the magazine, at the same time the king's forces were to storm the town. The Letters being read and witnesses examined, the lords came to the following Resolutions: 1. "That it doth appear, upon the whole matter, That the king and council at Oxford do endeavour to embrace all ways to raise and foment divisions, betwixt us and our brethren of Scotland, and amongst ourselves, under the pretence of easing tender consciences. 2. That, during these fair pretences, their immediate design was the ruin of the kingdom, by the destroying and burning the towns and magazines thereof." Ordered, also, "That the persons concerned in the discovery of this Plot should have the thanks of both houses, and suitable rewards for their faithfulness. And that this whole business should be communicated to the commons at a conference; and to the assembly of Divines, as a matter of religion." Two things are naturally observable in these Votes; namely, That this is the first time the lords accused the king personally; their former expressions being, 'That the king, seduced by evil counsels, &c.' but now he is made the principal. The next is, That the Independants, are here first named; who afterwards proved so formidable as to overthrow the Presbyterian government.

The Scots Army enter England.] Jan 30. The Scots had now entered England, with an army of 18,000 foot, 3000 horse, and 5 or 600 dragoons, commanded by Lesly earl of Leven: the first news of which was brought by Mr. Cheisley this day, to the house of commons, who made him a present of 100*l.* for his intelligence.—The Commissioners for Scotland were also arrived, by sea, at London; and, by order of parliament, the bishop of Worcester's house was appointed for them. The lords, also, fully agreed to the Scots Declaration on their entering England, and ordered it to be printed by their own printer, and published through the kingdom. The Names of these Commissioners were John earl of Loudon, chancellor of Scotland, John lord Maitland, sir Archibald Johnston of Warriston, and Mr. Barclay. They were sent with powers to treat with the commissioners appointed by parliament, about the management of the affairs of both kingdoms.

Daily Allowance to the Scots Army.] By a Schedule referred to in one of the Declarations of the committee of both kingdoms, the Daily Allowance to the Scots Army was as follows: Horse; a major, 6s. a rout-master, or captain, 6s. lieutenant, 4s. cornet, 2s. 6d. corporal, quarter-master, and trumpeter, 1s. 6d. every trooper for his own diet, 1s. every horse officer, or trooper, for his horse, 5 sheaves of straw, or a stone of hay, 4d. oats, 3 gallons, English, at 6d. Foot; a lieut. colonel, 5s. major, 4s. captain, 3s. lieutenant, 2s. ensign, 1s. 6d. quarter-master and serjeant, each 1s. corporal and drummer, each 8d. common soldier, 6d. Dragoons; lieut. colonel, 6s. major, 5s. captain, 4s. lieutenant, 3s. ensign, 2s. 6d. serjeant, 1s. 4d. corporal and drummers, each 10d. every dragoon is to have for himself 8d. a day, and for his horse 3d. worth of straw or hay, and a groatsworth of oats.

The E. of Essex presents a Letter from the Lords and Commons at Oxford.] Feb. 1. The earl of Essex presented a packet of Letters to the house of lords unopened, which had been sent to him by a trumpet from the Earl of Forth, general of the king's army. A committee of lords and commons were immediately appointed to open these letters, and communicate the contents to the houses: the report of which was, That they had opened the packet, and found therein a large parchment, signed by divers lords and gentlemen at Oxford, with a Letter from the earl of Forth. But because it was not directed to parliament, the opinion of the committee was, That it should be returned to the lord general, Essex, and sent back to the earl of Forth, with an Answer to his Letter, together with the Scots Declaration on their coming into England, the Declaration lately passed both kingdoms, and the National Covenant; with what other matters his excellency should think fit. And it was done, accordingly, along with the following Letter: "My lord, I received this day, a Letter of the 29th ult, from your lordship, and a parchment subscribed by the Prince, the duke of York and divers lords and gentlemen; but it neither having address to the two houses of parliament, nor there being therein any acknowledgment of them, I could not communicate it to them. My lord, the maintenance of the parliament of England, and the privileges thereof, is that for which we are all resolved to spend our blood, as being the foundation whereon all our laws and liberties are built. I send you herewith a National Covenant, solemnly entered into by both the kingdoms of England and Scotland, and a Declaration passed by them both, together with another Declaration of the Kingdom of Scotland. I rest, &c. ESSEX. Essex-House, Feb. 1, 1643."

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CONVENTION AT OXFORD.

The Parliament at Westminster being now busy in settling affairs with the Scots commissioners, and in making new Orders for the conduct of the war, both by sea and land, we shall turn our eyes to the Convention at Oxford, from whom the lords had received the Parchment mentioned in the foregoing Letter from the earl of Essex. The king's reasons for summoning this meeting appear by the Proclamation, inclosed in an intercepted Letter of lord Digby's already given at p. 194. As this Assembly bore the face of a Parliament, by having the king at their head, a much greater number of the peers than were then left at Westminster, and nearly 200 members of the house of commons, their proceedings cannot be omitted. But as the Journals carefully avoid the very mention of them, we shall content ourselves with Mr. Rushworth's account of this Anti-Parliament, compared with the pamphlets printed at this time, by the king's authority, at Oxford.

"My lords and gentlemen; When I consider your public interests and concernments in the happiness and honour of this nation, and your continual sufferings in this Rebellion, for your affection and loyalty to me, I must look upon you as the most competent considerers and counsellors how to manage and improve the condition we are all in; for sure our condition is so equal, that the same violence hath oppressed us all.—I have therefore called you together to be witnesses of my actions, and privy to my intentions; and certainly if I had the least thought, disagreeing with the happiness and security of this kingdom, I would not advise with such counsellors. I doubt not but your concurrence with me, will so far prevail over the hearts and understandings of this whole kingdom, who must look upon you as persons naturally and originally trusted by and for them, that it will be above the reach and malice of those, who have hitherto had too great an influence upon the people, to discredit my most intire actions, and sincere promises; you will be the best witnesses for the one, and security for the other.—Very many of you can bear me witness with what unwillingness I suffered myself to take up these defensive arms; indeed with so great, that I was first almost in the power of those, who, in two set battles, have sufficiently informed the world how tender they have been of the safety of my person. I foresaw not only the rage and oppression which would every day break out upon my subjects, as the malice of these ill men increased, and their purposes were detected; but also the great inconveniences my best subjects would suffer even by my own army, raised and kept for their preservation and protection; for I was not so ill a soldier, as not to foresee how impossible it was to keep a strict discipline, I being to struggle with so many defects and necessities; and I assure you the sense I have of their sufferings, who deserve well of me, by my forces, hath been a greater grief to me, than any thing for my own particular. My hope was, that, either by success on my part, or repenitance on theirs, God would have put a short end to this great storm; but guilt and despair have made these men more wicked than I imagined they intended to be; for, instead of removing and reconciling these bloody distractions, and restoring peace to this languishing country, they have invited a foreign power to invade this kingdom, and that in your names, and challenge this invasion from them as a debt to the commonwealth.—You, my lords, have, like yourselves, as good patriots, expressed your dissent, and vindicated yourselves from that imputation; and I doubt not, but you, gentlemen, will let your countries know, how far you are from desiring such assistance, and how absolute and peremptory a breach this raising of arms of my Scots subjects is of that Pacification, which was so lately and solemnly made by you, and can intend nothing but a conquest of you and your laws. I shall send you all the advertisements I have of that business which is threatened from Scotland, and what is already acted from thence; and shall desire your speedy advice and assistance, what is to be said or done, both with reference to this and that kingdom.—Our ends being the same, I am sure there will be no other difference in the way, than what, upon debate and a right understanding, will be easily adjusted: let our religion in which we are all most nearly concerned, and without care of which, we must not look for God's blessing, be vindicated and preserved: let my honour and rights, which you find to have an inseparable relation with your own interest, be vindicated and restored: let your liberties, properties, and privileges, without which I would not be your king, be secured and confirmed; and there is nothing you can advise me to, I will not meet you in; and I doubt not we shall, together, inform posterity, how much our trust and confidence in each other, is a better expedient for the peace and preservation of the kingdom, than Fears and Jealousies. I shall keep you no longer from consulting together, than in telling you, that I have prepared fit places for your meeting, to which I desire you to repair this night; assuring you, that I will be always ready to receive any thing from you, admitting you to me, or coming to you myself, whensoever you shall desire; and so God direct you the best way."

A Letter from the Lords at Oxford to the Scots Privy Council, touching their Expedition into England, and shewing how few Peers were left at Westminster.

"Our very good lords; If for no other reason, yet that posterity may know we have done our duties, and not sat still, whilst our brethren of Scotland were transported with a dangerous and fatal misunderstanding, that the resolution now taken among them, for an Expedition into England, is agreeable to their obligation by the late Treaty, and to the wishes and desires of this kingdom, expressed by the two houses of parliament; we have thought it necessary to let your lordships know, That if we had dissented from that act, it could never have been made a law; and when you have examined and considered the Names of us who subscribe this Letter, (who we hope are too well known to your lordships and both kingdoms, to be suspected to want affection to religion, or to the laws and liberty of our country, for the defence and maintenance whereof we shall always hold our lives a cheap sacrifice;) and when you are informed that the earls of Arundel and Thanet, and the lords Stafford, Stanhope, Coventry, Goring, and Craven, are in parts beyond the seas; and the earls of Chesterfield, and Westmoreland, and the lord Montague of Boughton, under restraint at London, for their loyalty and duty to his majesty and the kingdom; your lordships will easily conclude how very few now make up the peers at Westminster; there being in truth not above 25 lords present or privy to these counsels, or, being absent, consenting or concurring with them; whereas the house of peers consists of above 100 besides minors and recusant lords, neither of which keep us company in this address to your lordships.—How we and the major part of the house of commons come to be absent from thence, is so notorious to all the world, that we believe your lordships cannot be strangers to it: How, several times, during our sitting there, multitudes of the meanest sort of people, with weapons not agreeing to their condition or custom, in a manner very contrary and destructive to the privileges of parliament, filled up the way between both houses, offering injuries both by words and actions unto, and laying violent hands upon, several members; and crying out, many hours together, against the established laws in a most tumultuous and menacing way; how no remedy would be submitted to for preventing these tumults: after which, and other unlawful and unparliamentary actions, many things received and settled, upon solemn debate in the house of peers, were again, after many threats and menaces, resumed, altered, and determined, contrary to the law and custom of parliaments; and so many of us withdrew ourselves from thence, where we could not sit, speak, and vote with honour, freedom, and safety, and are now kept from thence for our duty and loyalty to our sovereign; and must therefore protest against any invitation which hath been made to our brethren of Scotland, to enter the kingdom with an army, the same being as much against the desires as against the duty of the lords and commons of England.—And we do conjure your lordships, by our common allegiance and subjection under our gracious sovereign, by the amity and affection between the two nations, by the Treaty of Pacification, (which by any such act is absolutely dissolved) and by all obligations, both divine and human, which can preserve peace upon earth, to use your utmost endeavours to prevent the effusion of so much Christian blood, and the confusion and desolation which must follow the unjust invasion of this kingdom, which we (and we are confident all true Englishmen) must interpret as a design of conquest, and to impose new laws upon us; and therefore your lordships may be assured, we shall not so far forget our own interest, and the honour of our nation, as not to expose our lives and fortunes in the just and necessary defence of this kingdom; but if your lordships, in truth, have any doubts or apprehensions that there is now, or hereafter may be, a purpose to infringe your laws or liberties, from any attempt of this kingdom, we do engage our honours to your lordships, to be ourselves most religious observers of the act of Pacification; and if the breach and violation do not first begin within that kingdom, we are confident you shall never have cause to complain of this: and having thus far expressed ourselves to your lordships, we hope to receive such an Answer from you as may be a means to preserve a right understanding between the two nations, and lay an obligation upon us to continue your lordships most affectionate humble servants, Ed. Littleton, C. S. Richmond, Hertford, Newcastle, Huntingdon, Bath, Southampton, Dorset, Northampton, Devonshire, Bristol, Berkshire, Cleveland, Marlborough, Rivers, Lindsey, Dover, Peterborough, Kingston, Newport, Portland, Carbery, Conway, Falconberg, Wilmot, Savil, Cottington, Mowbray and Maltravers, Darcy and Coniers, Wentworth, Cromwel, Rich, Paget, Digby, Howard of Charlton, Deincourt, Lovelace, Pawlet, Mohun, Dunsmore, Seymour, Herbert, Cobham, Capel, Piercy, Leigh, Hatton, Hopton, Jermyn, Loughborough, Byron, Widdrington."

The Answer.] This Letter was sent by the marquis of Newcastle to the earl of Argyle, to be delivered as directed: To which the Lords of the Council in Scotland, and the Conservators of the Peace, returned the following Answer, dated March 18, 1643-4.

"Right honourable; We have, yesterday, received and considered your lordship's Letter, concerning our expedition into England, and do know that your lordships are not so great strangers to our proceedings, as not to know that this was not intended, till all other means were first essayed and disappointed. We will not deny, That the invitation of the honourable houses of parliament, in the behalf of our brethren in England, (who are shedding their blood in defence of that power, without which religion can never be defended nor reformed, nor unity of religion with us and other reformed churches be attained) is a special motive; but our Christian duty to religion, our loyalty and tender regard of his majesty's honour and safety, and preservation of ourselves from ruin and destruction, are the principal cause of this undertaking.—That this invitation and act of the hon. houses of parliament is null; and not to be respected, because it wants your lordships assent, and of those lords beyond seas, or under restraint, is that which we think not proper for us to dispute; but how this parliament, that sought so earnestly for reformation of Religion, for redress of Grievances, and settlement of the great affairs of that kingdom, and which was indicted by his majesty for these ends, and is ratified by a special act of parliament, not to be raised without advice and consent of both houses, is null and void by the absence of those lords beyond sea, or by your lordships withdrawing yourselves; or that those who stay in parliament are not a sufficient number without your lordships, is more than we do apprehend. And as we are more deeply affected with unfeigned grief for these unhappy differences betwixt his majesty and his subjects, and more sensibly touched with the sufferings of our brethren, than desirous to judge of the laws and practices of another kingdom; so do we hold ourselves, in duty, obliged to our country, to clear this kingdom of that unjust aspersion of Invasion. Our Remonstrance to his majesty, to the hon. houses of parliament, and to all the world, and our whole former deportment, are more plain and sure evidences of the zeal of this kingdom to religion, of our loyalty to our native king, and of true affection to our brethren of England, than all that malice can devise, or calumny express against us. And if the difficulties of the passage had not stopped our Declarations, concerning our present expedition into England, or the industry of our adversaries suppressed the same from coming to your lordships hands, you would never have so far misinterpreted our entry into England, as to have named it to be an Invasion, nor a design of conquest of that kingdom; where we desire the throne of our native king to be established to all ages.—But the question rightly stated is, Whether, against the popish, prelatical, and Malignant Party, and their adherents, prevailing in England and Ireland, we be not bound to provide for our own preservation? or, Whether we ought not to endeavour, so far as our power can reach, to rescue our native king, his crown and posterity, out of the midst of so many dangers, and to preserve his people and kingdoms from utter ruin and destruction? And that this is the true state of the question, and the sincerity of our intentions towards so pious and necessary a duty, we remit your lordships, for more full information, to the Declaration of the Estates of this kingdom, concerning the present Expedition into England, from their meeting at Edinburgh, (August, 1643, p. 166), and the Covenant betwixt the two kingdoms, which we do herewith send; and if your lordships shall join in this pious and solemn oath, for reformation and defence of religion, his majesty's true honour and happiness, and the peace of his dominions, which this kingdom, with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, have, with God's assistance, resolved to maintain; then may we certainly expect that God's judgments, which the sins and provocations of both nations do justly deserve, shall be averted; the effusion of more Christian blood shall be eschewed, and the confusion and desolation, which farther threaten the ruin of these kingdoms, shall be turned into a happy pacification, for establishing of truth and peace in all his majesty's dominions. For which ends, we shall, in every noble and just way, be ready, according to our Covenant, to contribute our utmost endeavours, as a real testimony of our desires to continue your lordships, &c. Edinburgh, March 18, 1644."

Votes of the Lords and Commons at Oxford, touching the Scots coming into England.]

Jan. 26, 1643-4. Resolved, upon the question, nem. con. 1. "That all such subjects of Scotland, as have consented to the Declaration, intituled, 'The Declaration of the kingdom of Scotland, concerning the present Expedition into England, according to the commission and order of the Convention of Estates, from their meeting at Edinburgh, August, 1643,' have thereby denounced war against England, and broke the act of Pacification. 2. That all such of the subjects of Scotland, as have, in an hostile manner, entered into the town of Berwick upon Tweed, have thereby broke the act of Pacification. 3. That all his majesty's subjects of the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales are, both by their allegiance and the act of Pacification, bound to resist and repress all such of the subjects of Scotland, as have, in an hostile manner, already entered, or shall hereafter enter, into the town of Berwick upon Tweed, or any other part of his majesty's realm of England or dominion of Wales, as traitors, and enemies to the state. 4. That all such of his majesty's subjects of the realm of England, or dominion of Wales, that shall be abetting, aiding, and assisting to the subjects of Scotland, in their hostile invasion of any part of his majesty's realm of England, or dominion of Wales, shall be deemed and taken as traitors, and enemies to the state. 5. That all his majesty's subjects of Scotland are bound by the act of Pacification, to resist and repress all of that kingdom, that already have raised arms, or shall rise in arms, to invade this kingdom of England or dominion of Wales."

The King's Second Speech to the Lords and Commons at Oxford, Feb. 7, 1643-4.

"My lords and gentlemen; I have hardly, thus long, forborne to give you thanks, for the care and pains you have taken for the public safety, since your coming together. And, first, I thank you for your inclination to Peace; to which, as my willingness of complying shewed the constancy of my endeavours in the best way for the public good; so the rebels, by their scornfully rejecting your overtures, as they have done heretofore mine, have shewed their constancy in their way. Next, I must thank every one of you, for so chearfully applying yourselves to the maintenance and recruiting of my army; which I hope God will so bless, that thereby these enemies of peace shall have their due reward. And truly, my lords and gentlemen, this alacrity of yours in providing for my army, doth please me in no consideration so much, as that it is the best way for Peace: for certainly this strange arrogance of refusing to treat with you, can proceed from nothing but their contempt of our forces. But it is your present honour, and will be more to posterity, that God hath made you instruments to defend your sovereign, and to preserve your country; to see that religion and law to flourish, which you have rescued from the violence of rebellion; for which I hope, in time, to recompence every one of you; but if I shall not, here is one" [pointing to the Prince] "I hope will, in which he shall but perform my commands; for I have no greater sadness for those that are my ill subjects, than I have joy and comfort in your affections and fidelities; and so God prosper your proceedings."

Votes of the Lords and Commons at Oxford, concerning the Earl of Essex's Army, the New Great Seal, &c.] March 12, 1643-4. Resolved, upon the question, nem. con. 1. "That the lords and commons, now remaining at Westminster, that have given their votes or consent to the raising of forces under the command of the earl of Essex, or have been abetting, aiding, or assisting thereunto, have levied and made war against the king, and are therein guilty of high treason. 2. That the lords and commons, now remaining at Westminster, that have given their votes and consent for the making and using of a new Great Seal, have thereby counterfeited the king's great seal, and therein committed high treason. 3. That the said lords and commons, now remaining at Westminster, that have given their consent, or have been abetting, aiding, or assisting to the present coming in of the Scots into England, in a warlike manner, have therein committed high treason. 4. That the lords and commons, now remaining at Westminster, who have committed the crimes mentioned in the three former Votes, have therein broken the trust in them reposed by their country, and ought to be proceeded against as traitors to the king and kingdom. 5. That all the endeavours and offers of Peace and Treaty, made by his majesty, by the advice of the lords and commons in parliament assembled at Oxford, have been refused and rejected by the lords and commons remaining at Westminster."

A DECLARATION of the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Oxford, of their Proceedings touching a Treaty for Peace, and the Refusal thereof; and the several Letters and Answers that passed therein.

"If our most earnest desires and endeavours could have prevailed for a Treaty, our proceedings therein, without this Declaration, would have manifested to all the world the clearness of our intentions for the restoring the Peace of this kingdom; but seeing all the means, used by us for that purpose, have been rendered fruitless, we hold ourselves bound to let our countries know, what, in discharge of our duty to God and to them, we, on our parts, have done since our coming to Oxford, to prevent the further effusion of Christian blood, and the desolation of this kingdom. His majesty having, by his Proclamation, upon occasion of the Invasion from Scotland, and other weighty reasons, commanded our attendance at Oxford, upon the 22d of January last, there to advise him for the preservation of the religion, laws, and safety of the kingdom, and to restore it to its former peace and security: these motives, with the true sense of our country's miseries, quickened our duty to give our ready obedience to those his royal commands, hoping, by God's blessing, to have become happy instruments for such good ends. Upon our coming hither, we applied ourselves, with all diligence, to advise of such means as might most probably settle the Peace of this kingdom, the thing most desired by his majesty and ourselves; and because we found many gracious offers of Treaty for Peace, by his majesty, had been rejected by the lords and commons remaining at Westminster, we deemed it fit to write in our own names, and thereby make trial, whether that might produce any better effect for accomplishing our desires and our country's happiness. And they having, under pain of death, prohibited the address of any letters or messages to Westminster, but by their general; and we conceiving him a person who, by reason of their trust reposed in him, had a great influence in, and power over, their proceedings, resolved to recommend it to his care, and to engage him in that pious work; with our earnest desire to him to represent it to those that trusted him, to prevent all exceptions and delay; and thereupon, the 27th of the same Jan. dispatched a Letter away under the hands of the Prince's highness, the duke of York, and of 43 dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons of the house of peers, and 118 members of the house of commons there present; many others of us, by reason of distance of place, sickness, and employments in his majesty's service, and for want of timely notice of the Proclamation of Summons not being then come hither; which Letter we caused to be inclosed in a Letter from the earl of Forth, the king's general. A true copy of which Letter from us to the earl of Essex, hereafter followeth, viz.

"My lord; His majesty having by his Proclamation of the 22d of Dec. upon occasion of the Invasion threatened, and in part begun, by some of his subjects of Scotland, summoned all the members of both houses of parliament to attend him here at Oxford; we, whose names are under-written, are here met and assembled in obedience to those his majesty's commands. His majesty was pleased to invite us, in the said Proclamation, by these gracious expressions, 'That his subjects should see how willing he was to receive advice (for the preservation of the religion, laws, and safety of the kingdom; and, as far as in him lay, to restore it to its former peace and security, his chief and only end) from those whom they had trusted, though he could not receive it in the place where he appointed.' This most gracious invitation hath not only been made good unto us, but seconded and heightened by such unquestionable demonstrations of the deep and princely sense, which possesses his royal heart, of the miseries and calamities of his poor subjects in this unnatural war; and of his most entire and passionate affections to redeem them from that sad and deplorable condition by all ways possible, consistent either with his honour, or with the future safety of the kingdom; that as it were impiety to question the sincerity of them, so were it great want of duty and faithfulness in us (his majesty having vouchsafed to declare, 'That he did call us to be witnesses of his actions, and privy to his intentions) should we not testify and witness to all the world the assurance we have of the piety and sincerity of both: we, being most entirely satisfied of this truth, cannot but confess that, amidst our highest afflictions, in the deep and piercing sense of the present miseries and desolations of our country, and those farther dangers threatened from Scotland, we are at length erected to some chearful and comfortable thoughts, that possibly we may yet (by God's mercy, if his justice have not determined this nation, for its sins, to total ruin and desolation) hope to be happy instruments of our country's redemption, from the miseries of war, and of its restitution to the blessings of peace.—And we being desirous to believe your lordship, howsoever engaged, a person likely to be sensibly touched with these considerations, have thought fit to invite you to that part in this blessed work; which only is capable to repair all our misfortunes, and to buoy up the kingdom from ruin; that is, by conjuring you, by all the obligations that have power upon honour, conscience, or public piety, that, laying to heart, as we do, the inwardly bleeding condition of your country, and the outward more menacing destruction by a foreign nation upon the very point of invading it, you will co-operate with us to its preservation; by truly representing to, and faithfully and industriously promoting with, those by whom you are intrusted, this following most sincere and most earnest desire of ours, That they, joining with us in a right sense of the past, present, and more threatening calamities of this deplorable kingdom, some persons be appointed on either part, and a place agreed on, to treat of such a Peace as may yet redeem it from the brink of desolation.—This Address we should not have made, but that his majesty's summons, by which we are met, most graciously proclaiming pardon to all without exception, is evidence enough that his mercy and clemency can transcend all former provocations, and that he hath not only made us witnesses of his princely intentions, but honoured us also with the name of being security for them.—God Almighty direct your lordship, and those to whom you shall present these our most real desires, in such a course as may produce that happy Peace and Settlement of the present Distractions, which is so heartily desired and prayed for by us, and which may make us your, &c. Oxford, Jan. 27, 1643-4." [The Names of the Lords and Commons, who subscribed this Letter, are in the General List of those Members who formed the Convention at Oxford, which will speedily follow.]

"We are not ashamed of that earnest, meek, and Christian request we made in that Letter, though it was cried through London streets in scorn, as the Petition of the prince and duke of York, for Peace; and we thought it would have prevailed to have procured a Treaty for so blessed a thing as Peace, and for such an end as redeeming the kingdom from desolation, the only desire of that our Letter: but instead of a compliance with us in this Christian work of Treaty and Accommodation, we received a mere frivolous Answer, or rather a paper of scorn, in form of a Letter directed to the earl of Forth; wherein was inclosed a printed paper, called, 'A National Covenant of the Kingdoms of England and Scotland,' and two other papers, in writing, one called, 'A Declaration of both those kingdoms,' and the other, 'A Declaration of the kingdom of Scotland;' pamphlets full of treason, sedition, and disloyalty; which, being public, are needless here to be inserted." [For a copy of this Letter see p. 201.] Whosoever considers this Letter, will easily find it was fully understood to whom ours was desired to be communicated, under the expression of those by whom their general was trusted; and although it be pretended, because there was no address to the two houses of parliament, nor acknowledgment of them, it could not be communicated to them, it is notoriously known he did so far impart it, that a committee of theirs advised the Answer; and it appears by the penning, they all concurred in the resolution therein mentioned; whereby it is evident, that this was but an excuse framed to avoid a Treaty; and what could that printed Covenant and two Declarations inclosed signify, but to let us know, that before we come to any Treaty, we must also join in that Covenant with them, for the absolute extirpation of church government here, (without, nay though against, the king's consent) submit the lives, liberties, and estates of us, and all those, who, according to their allegiance, have assisted his majesty, to their mercy; and admit and justify the invasion from Scotland, according to the plain sense of their Declaration? Which all indifferent men will think strange preparatives to a Treaty for Peace; and, after such a yielding and submission, we know not what is left to treat upon.—These things are too apparent to every ordinary understanding; and yet we are not forward to apprehend the scorn of that Letter, or to take it for a denial of a Treaty; but, being still solicitous for that happy Peace, which alone could redeem this kingdom from ruin, we resolved to try another way; and, for avoiding delay or cavil about names or titles, or descants upon words, to forbear writing, and humbly besought his majesty to send messengers with instructions, to desire a Treaty for Peace; who was pleased to name Mr. Rd. Fanshaw and Mr. Tho. Offley, gentlemen of clear repute and integrity; and, to avoid their danger in repairing to Westminster, at our desire, commanded the earl of Forth, his general, to write to theirs for a Safe-Conduct for those two messengers; for such is our condition at present, that a free-born subject, sent upon the king's message, cannot, but with such leave, repair to London or Westminster, without danger of his life. To this was returned a Letter, directed to the earl of Forth, in these words:

"My lord; You shew your nobleness in declaring your willingness to write to me in no business so much as that of Peace; and I join with you in the same opinion, that it ought to be a principal duty of those who are trusted in places of our command; and, therefore, whensoever I shall receive any directions to those who have intrusted me, I shall use my best endeavours; and when you shall send for a Safe-Conduct for those gentlemen, mentioned in your letter, from his majesty to the houses of parliament, I shall, with all cheerfulness shew my willingness to further any way that may produce that happiness, that all honest men pray for, which is a true understanding between his majesty and his faithful and only council, the parliament. Your, &c. ESSEX. Essex-House, Feb. 19. 1643."

"That this doth neither grant a Safe-Conduct, or give any direct answer to the earl of Forth's request, every ordinary eye may see, and yet such requests amongst generals are rarely denied; and we may easily thereby discern how fearful they at Westminster are, lest the poor distressed people of this kingdom should, by the advantage of a Treaty and free debate of the present differences, see how grossly they had been deceived and misled, and so obtain an end of their miseries; for otherwise who could have believed, that when these differences arose, and were continued for want of a free convention in parliament, and that a main end of the Treaty was to resolve how we, according to our duty and the trust reposed in us by our countries, might with them freely debate and advise his majesty in those things that concerned the maintenance of our religion, parliament's privileges, the king's rights, and the subject's liberty and property, that this letter should tell us, That the party we are to treat withal is the king's only council, excluding all others, not only ourselves called by the same authority to council as they were, but his privy council also, and council at law; so that we could have no hopes of a Treaty, unless we should first agree that they are the parliament and the king's only council; whereby they that are parties would become the only judges of all things in question; which would be a Submission, and not a Treaty.—Having received these frivolous delays, which we might have interpreted absolute denials of any Treaty of Peace, we yet resolved not to give over our endeavours for that which so much concerned the good of our country, and the welfare of all professors of the true protestant religion, but by our humble and earnest desires to his majesty, prevailed with him to write his royal letters, and once more desire a Treaty for Peace, though it had been so often formerly rejected; and to avoid all colour of exception, to direct it, 'To the lords and commons of parliament assembled at Westminster;' which was done and inclosed in a Letter from the earl of Forth to their general. A copy of both which Letters hereafter follow:

"My lord; I have received your letter of the 19th of this month, which, according to my duty, I shewed to his majesty; who, observing in it your expressions concerning peace, 'That whensoever you shall receive any directions to those that have intrusted you, you shall use your best endeavours,' is graciously pleased to send this inclosed, which it is desired may be delivered according to the directions. Your &c. FORTH."

"To the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Westminster.

"C. R. Out of our most tender and pious sense of the sad and bleeding condition of this our kingdom, and our unwearied desires to apply all remedies, which, by the blessing of Almighty God, may recover it from an utter ruin; by the advice of the lords and commons of parliament assembled at Oxford, we do propound and desire, That a convenient number of fit persons may be appointed and authorized by you to meet with all convenient speed, at such place as you shall nominate, with an equal number of fit persons, whom we shall appoint and authorize, to treat of the ways and means to settle the present distractions of this our kingdom, and to procure an happy Peace: and particularly, how all the members of both houses may securely meet, in a full and free convention of parliament, there to treat, consult, and agree upon such things, as may conduce to the maintenance and defence of the true reformed Protestant religion, with due consideration to all just and reasonable ease of tender consciences; to the settling and maintaining of our just rights and privileges; of the rights and privileges of parliament, the laws of the land, the liberty and property of the subject; and all other expedients that may conduce to that blessed end of a firm and lasting peace both in church and state, and a perfect understanding betwixt us and our people; wherein no endeavours or concurrence of ours shall be wanting: and God direct your hearts in the ways of peace. Given at our court at Oxford, March 3, 1643-4."

"We now appeal to all the world, what could more have been done by his majesty, or us, in order to a Peace; here being so great a condescending from a king to subjects, all indifferent advantages left to them, both for time and place of treaty, and choice of persons to treat: but what their intentions to Peace are, will appear by their Letter inclosed in one from their general to the earl of Forth; both which are as followeth:

"My lord; I am commanded by both houses of parliament, to send a trumpeter with the inclosed Letter to his majesty, which I desire your lordship may be most humbly presented to his majesty. I rest, &c. ESSEX. Essex-House, March 9, 1643."

"May it please your majesty, We the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, taking into our consideration a Letter sent from your majesty, dated the 3rd day of March instant, and directed 'to the lords and commons of parliament assembled at Westminster,' (which by the contents of a Letter from the earl of Forth unto the lord-general, the earl of Essex, we conceive was intended for ourselves) have resolved, with the concurrent advice and consent of the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, to represent unto your majesty, in all humility and plainness, as followeth: That as we have used all means for a just and safe Peace; so will we never be wanting to do our utmost for the procuring thereof: but when we consider the expressions in that Letter of your majesty's we have more sad and despairing thoughts of attaining the same than ever; because thereby those persons now assembled at Oxford, who, contrary to their duty, have deserted your parliament, are put into an equal condition with it; and this present parliament, convened according to the known and fundamental laws of the kingdom, (the continuance whereof is established by a law consented unto by your majesty) is, in effect, denied to be a parliament; the scope and intention of that Letter being to make provision how all the members, as is pretended, of both houses may securely meet in a full and free convention of parliament; whereof no other conclusion can be made, but that this present parliament is not a full nor free convention; and that to make it a full and free convention of parliament, the presence of those is necessary, who, notwithstanding that they have deserted that great trust, and do levy war against the parliament, are pretended to be members of the two houses of parliament.—And hereupon we think ourselves bound to let your majesty know, That seeing the continuance of this parliament is settled by a law, (which, as all other laws of your kingdoms, your majesty hath sworn to maintain, as we are sworn to our allegiance to your majesty, these obligations being reciprocal) we must, in duty, and accordingly are resolved, with our lives and fortunes, to defend and preserve the just rights and full power of this parliament; and do beseech your majesty to be assured, That your majesty's royal and hearty concurrence with us herein will be the most effectual and ready means of procuring a firm and lasting Peace in all your majesty's dominions, and of begetting a perfect understanding between your majesty and your people; without which your majesty's most earnest professions, and our most real intentions, concerning the same, must necessarily be frustrated. And in case your majesty's three kingdoms should, by reason thereof, remain in this sad and bleeding condition, tending, by the continuance of this unnatural war, to their ruin, your majesty cannot be the least, nor the last sufferer.—God, in his goodness, incline your royal breast, out of pity and compassion to those deep sufferings of your innocent people, to put a speedy and happy issue to these desperate evils, by the joint advice of both your kingdoms now happily united in this cause, by their late Solemn League and Covenant; which, as it will prove the surest remedy, so is it the earnest prayer of your majesty's loyal subjects, the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England. Westminster, March 9, 1643."

"Whosoever considers that this should be a Letter from subjects, might well think it very unbecoming language in them, to call his majesty's earnest endeavours for Peace, but professions, and their own feigned pretences, most real intentions; but much more menacing language, 'that his majesty cannot be the least or last sufferer;' which expressions from subjects in arms to their sovereign, what dangerous construction they may admit, we are unwilling to mention.—But we need not wonder at the manner of their expressions, when we see in this Letter, the parliament itself, as far as in them lies, destroyed; and those who here style themselves, 'The lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England,' not to resolve upon their Answer to their king, without the concurrent advice and consent of the commissioners, as they call them, of the kingdom of Scotland.—If they had only taken the advice of the Scots commissioners, they had broken the fundamental constitution of parliament; the very writs of summons, the foundation of all power in parliament, being in express terms for the lords to treat and advise with the king and the peers of the kingdom of England, and for the commons to do and consent to those things, which, by that common council of England, should be ordained, thereby excluding all others.—But their League, it seems, is gone further; the Scots must consent as well as advise, so that they have gotten a negative voice; and they, who, in the former Letter, would be the king's only council, are now become no council without the Scots commissioners. The truth is, they have (besides the Solemn League and Covenant with the Scots, which their Letter mentions, a strange and traiterous presumption for subjects to make a Covenant and League with subjects of another kingdom without their Prince) made a private bargain with the Scots touching our estates, and a private agreement, not to treat without their consent, as some of themselves, being afraid of a Treaty, openly declared to the common council of London; and therefore it is no wonder, that, being touched to the quick, with the apprehension that they are not, nor can be, in this condition, a full and free convention of parliament, they charge us with deserting our trust; and would have us to be no members of the parliament. They may remember it was our want of freedom within, and the seditious tumults without, their many multiplied treasons there, and imposing traiterous Oaths, which enforced our absence: but concerning that, and the want of freedom in parliament, we shall say no more here, that being the subject of another Declaration; only we wish them to consider by what fundamental laws of the kingdom, which they have lately wrested to serve all turns, they can exclude us from our votes in parliament, who were duly summoned, chosen, and returned members of parliament, and take in those of another kingdom to their resolutions, who are not bound by our laws.—But what violation soever they make of the laws, they are forward to put the king in mind of his duty; and therefore tell him, 'That he is sworn to maintain the laws, as they are sworn to their allegiance to him, these obligations being reciprocal.' It is true, in some sense, that the oath of the king and subjects is reciprocal; that is, each is bound to perform what they swear, the king as well as the subject; but he that will well weigh their Letter, and make one part have connection with the other, and examine that part of their Covenant, whereby they swear they will defend the king's person and authority, (no further or otherwise than in preservation of their religion and liberties) may easily find another construction, viz. That the subjects allegiance is no longer due than the king performs his duty; nay, no longer than he, in their opinion, observes his duty, whereof they themselves must be judges; and if he fail in his duty, they may take up arms against him; a principle which, as it is utterly destructive to all government, so we believe, they themselves dare not plainly avow it; lest as they now make use of it against the king, so the people, finding their failure of duty and breach of trust, should hereafter practise it, by taking up arms against them; and so shake off that yoke of tyranny imposed by their fellow-subjects, which lies so heavy upon them, that it were well, as they still press upon the king's maintenance of the laws, if they would also know that their obligation to observe the same is reciprocal; and while they here resolve to defend and preserve the full power of this parliament, (which in their sense can be no other than the power they have exercised this parliament) they would take notice that they are therein so far from observation of the laws, that they desperately resolve an utter subversion of them; for what can more tend to the destruction of the laws, than to usurp a power to themselves without the king, and against his will to raise arms; to attribute to their Orders, or pretended Ordinances, the power of laws and statutes; to im-

force contributions, loans, and taxes of all sorts from the subject; to imprison without cause shewed, and then prohibit writs of Habeas Corpus for their enlargement; to lay excises upon all commodities; to command and dispose of the lives and estates of the free-born subjects of this kingdom at their pleasure; to impose tonnage and poundage, contrary to the law declared in the late act for tonnage and poundage; and all this done and justified, as by a legal civil power founded and inherent in them? All which are manifest breaches of the Petition of Right and Magna Charta, the great evidence of the liberties of England; which charter, by express words, binds them and us, though assembled in parliament, as well as the king; and though it be not now, as heretofore it hath been, taken by solemn Oath on the people's part as well as on the king's; nor a curse, as heretofore, pronounced on the violators; yet they, having taken a Protestation to maintain the laws, liberties, and the properties of the subject, and inclusively that charter, let them take heed, whilst they make use of this their pretended power to the destruction of the few, lest a curse fall upon them and upon their posterity.—God knoweth, and it is too certain a truth, that ourselves, and many other good subjects in this kingdom, even under the power of the king's army, have suffered exceedingly in liberty and estate, during this present rebellion, by many heavy charges; the sad consideration whereof makes our hearts bleed, because we can see no way for relief, so long as this unnatural rebellion continues: but as these things were first practised by them, and thereby necessitated upon the king's army, so it was never yet pretended that they were done by virtue of a law; but either by consent, or by the unhappy and unavoidable exigencies of war, and to expire with the present rebellion; which God in mercy hasten.—For our parts we have the inward comfort of our own consciences, witnessing with us, that we have improved all opportunities and advantages for the restoring of this kingdom to its former peace; and we must witness for his majesty his most hearty desires thereof; and though both his majesty's and our endeavours therein have been frustrated, yet God, in his great goodness, hath raised up our spirits, not to desert our religion, our king, our laws, our lives, the liberties of us English free born subjects; and, by God's assistance and his majesty's concurrence, we do resolve to unite ourselves as one man, and cheerfully adventure our lives and estates for the maintenance and defence of the true reformed protestant religion of the church of England, of which we profess ourselves to be; for the defence of the king's person and rights of his crown; for the regaining and maintaining the rights and privileges of parliament, and the liberty of the subject's person, and property of his estate, according to the known laws of the land; to repel those of the Scots nation that have, in a warlike manner, entered this realm, and to reduce the subjects thereof, now in rebellion, to the king's obedience; and we doubt not but the same God will enlighten the eyes of the poor deceived people of this land, like true-hearted honest Englishmen, to join unanimously with us in so just and pious a work. And the God of Heaven prosper us according to the goodness of the cause we have in hand."

“ Whoever now considers how many have retired themselves into several counties, and so are absent from Westminster, and yet cannot, through the danger of travelling, be present at Oxford; how many have withdrawn themselves into the parts beyond the seas; how many of their own principal instruments are voted out of the house by themselves, as sir John Hotham and his son, sir Alex. Carew, Mr. Martin, Mr. Fiennes, and many others; and how many now are imprisoned by them; how many members, from the beginning, have been factiously kept from the house upon questions of election; and how many, without any colour, are kept in, by not suffering their elections to be reported; and that there are 35 members dead, into whose rooms no new persons are chosen; how many since are become barons by descent or creation, will easily conclude how small the number is which remains, and of those how few, in truth, have right to sit there.”

This Declaration of the lords and commons of parliament assembled at Oxford, was ordered, by the king, March 19, to be read in every church and chapel throughout England and Wales.

Declaration of the Parliament and the Scots Commissioners, concerning a Treaty of Peace. About the same time the two houses at Westminster set forth a Declaration, touching the same proceedings relating to a Treaty for Peace; which was as follows:

A DECLARATION of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, with the Advice and Concurrence of the Commissioners of Scotland, touching a Treaty of Peace.

"We the lords and commons, in this present parliament assembled, having notice given us by the earl of Essex, lord general of the forces raised for the defence of the king and parliament, of divers Letters sent unto him by the earl of Forth; and of a writing in parchment, dated at Oxford, and subscribed by divers lords and gentlemen, inclosed in one of those Letters, and directed to the said earl of Essex; and likewise of another Letter, subscribed by his majesty, and directed thus, 'To the Lords and Commons in parliament, assembled at Westminster;' which, by the intimation given by the earl of Forth in his Letter, wherein it was inclosed, seemed to be intended for the two houses of parliament, (all which we have caused to be herewith printed*) did take the same into our serious consideration; and the rather, because it carried with it a rumour and pretence of a Treaty of Peace, which, being accompanied with truth, hath always been our earnest desire, and shall be our faithful endeavours to effect: and having truly weighed the same, with the circumstances thereof, do find it so far from any aim or intention to Peace, that, under the mask and title thereof, it appears to be an endeavour to make our unhappy distractions and miseries more lasting, and the war more irreconcilable.—For now, what the authors and fomenters of our sad calamities from the beginning intended, they have procured to be in substance openly professed; that is, the overthrow and destruction of this present parliament, being, under God, the only basis and support of our religion and liberty, the very bulwark between us and tyranny, popery, and superstition, which are pressing hard to over-run all the three kingdoms; and, because they foresaw the subversion of this parliament would be of hard digestion with the people, they would first digest it under the disguise of Peace; and therefore his majesty, in his application thereunto, must, by his Letter, deny the freedom and continuance thereof, and make way to the setting up of another at Oxford, in stiling that Convention by the name of 'The Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Oxford;' being the same title which is therein given to the parliament, and owning this proceeding towards Peace to be by their advice: and then if, upon these terms, the two houses entertained this overture, they have gained an acknowledgment from us of being no parliament, or, at least-wise, a tacit consent of an assembly at Oxford to be in equal condition with us; but in case this address should be rejected, then they would take advantage thereby to persuade the world, that they at Oxford did labour for Peace, and the parliament was averse to Peace; and so, by this subtle insinuation, poison the affections of the people, to make the better way to ruin both parliament and people.—And therefore, that the sincerity of our actions, and the malice and subtilty of our adversaries, may be more clearly discovered, we thought it our duty, with the advice and concurrence of the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, to publish our proceedings to the kingdom; and to declare, That as it hath always been, and ever shall be, our earnest and faithful endeavours to put an end to the troubles and dangerous distempers of this kingdom, by a happy well-grounded Peace; so it is our settled resolution, in discharge of the trust reposed in us, never to purchase it with the loss and ruin of our religion and liberty; having before our eyes the sad spectacle of that woful kingdom of Ireland; which, after the expence of so much innocent blood, in defence of the protestant religion, is, under the false gloss of Peace, subjected and brought under the power of popery and superstition: and those bloody rebels, having effected their ends in that kingdom, are brought over hither to bring us under the same yoke; which upon this occasion, we are necessitated to publish, being now tempted by that specious pretence, to acknowledge the dissolution of this parliament; which, had we assented to, would not only deprive us and our posterity of the present, but of the hopes and capacity of any future parliament; and so, at one blow, cut in sunder the chief support and pillar of our laws and liberties; for what better assurance can we have, either of our present or future liberty, than the laws and statutes of the kingdom; and what greater obligation can we expect of the observance thereof, than his majesty's personal consent to that law, and his sacred and solemn Oath to observe the laws? And yet both these are not thought holds strong enough to secure us our own; insomuch that not only this present parliament, convened according to the common law and usage of the realm, and enacted by a law, consented unto by himself, to have continuance, and herewith printed, is attempted to be dissolved; but another endeavoured to be set up at Oxford. And if the king, notwithstanding all these obligations, shall, at his pleasure, dissolve this, the kingdom is not only deprived of the present, but made incapable of enjoying the benefit of any future parliament or laws, any longer than shall stand with the will and pleasure of the king; and consequently the fundamentals of all our laws and government are subverted.—And we very well know this design to be long since contrived at Oxford, as appeareth by the lord Digby's intercepted Letter dated the 27th December last; and of such expectation, that he, in that Letter, expresseth it to carry along with it 'Probability of the surest and readiest way, &c. of any course that hath yet been attempted; knowing very well that, through the evils and miseries himself and his wicked confederates have brought upon this distressed kingdom, they can expect no safety but by attempting more.—And truly they could not think of any more likely way to involve themselves in the same guilt, than those lords and gentlemen now met at Oxford, who had already, contrary to their duty, and the trust reposed in them by their country, deserted the parliament, and assisted in a war against it; and had there been any doubt or suspicion of their concurrence in that design, the very place of meeting being the head quarters of a popish army, whose cause they were there to consult, of, would be a rod sharp enough to secure them from that fear. And it doth sufficiently appear, that they have answered their expectation; for they have assumed the form and exercised the power of parliament; they sit in two distinct places, terming the one the 'House of Peers,' and the other the 'House of Commons,' and they have made the Lord Littleton Speaker of that which they call the 'House of Peers,' and serjeant Eure of the other which they name the 'House of Commons.'—They have granted the sum of 100,000*l.* for the maintenance and recruiting of the forces raised against the parliament and kingdom, and have advised the same to be levied upon the people in an arbitrary way, by Privy-Seal, under the colour of Loan; which, by their consent and pretended authority, is accordingly put in execution, as appeareth by the Privy Seals themselves, signed by the lord Littleton and serjeant Eure, a copy of one of which we have caused to be herewith printed: and, what is beyond all, and without the power and capacity of a parliament, they have declared another kingdom, and the parliament itself, guilty of high treason; having voted our brethren of Scotland, (who, upon our invitation, and according to the act of Pacification, are come in to assist us, in maintenance of our religion and just privileges) and the two houses, who having raised forces for their own just defence, and the maintenance of their religion and liberty, traitors and rebels.—And now we refer to any sober and indifferent judgment, whether there can be a higher attempt to shake off and cut in sunder all bands of law and government, and to bring the people under the yoke and bondage of an absolute tyranny, than this is?—And we cannot chuse but admire and lament, that this kingdom should produce such unnatural monsters, who, like vipers, to make way for their own safety, would destroy the womb that bare them; and because themselves are justly cut off, as rotten and destructive branches of the representative body of the kingdom, would therefore pluck up the tree by the root, and destroy both parliament and kingdom. But when we consider the persons this idol is composed of, it produceth no great wonder; consisting not only of such, who, for betraying the trust reposed in them by their country, and their duty to the common wealth, have been justly excluded the parliament; but of the lord Digby, Piercy, Jermyn, and others, who, even before these unhappy differences, have been legally impeached or questioned in parliament for high treason; and, being convinced in their consciences of the guilt thereof, fled the kingdom to avoid their trial; and therefore, by Proclamations in his majesty's name, when his majesty was here present, summoned to appear to answer to that charge.—But our greatest grief is, That their counsels should so far prevail, as to procure his majesty, under the pretence of Peace, to be their instrument in an attempt so destructive to himself, kingdom, and people; and to endeavour the consent of the parliament to destroy itself, and their own religion and liberties; an attempt not to be paralleled by the precedents of the most pernicious times; and, if effected, would, in the end, prove as dangerous to his majesty as to the kingdom, which may be made apparent by the example of some of his predecessors, unhappily misled by the desperate counsels of private and ill-affected persons; which consideration necessitated us to return his majesty the Answer herewith printed; wherein we take the boldness, with all humility and plainness, to declare as well the duty we owe to our country, for whom we are intrusted, as the allegiance we owe to him: and that, without apparent breach of both, we could not assent to any Treaty, upon the terms expressed in his majesty's Letter; and likewise to tender unto him our humble advice of a safe and ready way to put an end to the present sad condition of his majesty's dominions; and we shall never cease, by our continual and earnest prayers to Almighty God, to implore him, that, yet at length, he would incline his royal heart to be thoroughly sensible of the unhappy divisions that have occasioned so much innocent blood to stain the land; and, by hearkening to the joint advice of both kingdoms, now happily united in this common cause by their late Solemn League and Covenant, put an happy issue to all these troubles.—This we thought necessary to declare, to the end the world may see, as well our own real endeavours to attain a safe and just Peace, as the indefatigable practices of those popish and jesuitical councils, the instruments of all our miseries; who are content to appear in all shapes, and leave no means unattempted to compass their own ends.—First, They would have undermined us by secret practices; then they would have forced us by open war; and now they would allure us, with the specious pretence of Peace, to disavow this parliament, and our just rights and privileges; and consequently resign ourselves, religion, laws, and liberties to the power of idolatry, superstition, and tyranny.—But we are constantly resolved, in discharge of the duty we owe to our God, the trust reposed in us by our country, and our late Solemn Oath and Covenant, with the hazard of our lives and fortunes, to defend our lawful rights and liberties, the freedom and privileges of this present parliament, and, which is above all, the true Protestant religion; wherein we shall not doubt but to receive the hearty concurrence and assistance of all well-affected protestants, and true lovers of their country and liberty; and the Lord of Hosts, whose cause it is we stand for, and upon whose assistance we principally rely, grant our endeavours a blessed and happy success."

A COPY of the King's PRIVY SEAL for borrowing of Money, mentioned in the foregoing Declaration: To our Trusty and Well-beloved RICHARD TILNEY of Rotherwick, Gent.

"C. R. Trusty and Well-beloved, we greet you well; Whereas all our subjects of the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales are, both by their Allegiance and the act of Pacification, bound to resist and suppress all such of our subjects of Scotland, as have, in an hostile manner, already entered, or shall hereafter enter into this kingdom; and, by law, your personal service, attended in a warlike manner, for the resistance of this invasion, may be required by us, which we desire to spare; choosing rather to invite your assistance for the maintenance of our army in a free and voluntary expression of your affections to our service, and the safety of this kingdom:— And whereas the members of both houses of parliament, assembled at Oxford, have taken into their consideration the necessity of supporting our army, for the defence of us and our people against this invasion, and for the preservation of the religion, laws, and liberties of this kingdom; and thereupon have agreed upon the speedy raising of 100,000*l.* by Loan, from particular persons, toward the which themselves have advanced a very considerable proportion; and, by their examples, hope that our well-affected subjects, throughout the kingdom, will, in a short time, make up the remainder; whereby we shall not only be enabled to pay and recruit our army, but likewise be enabled to put our armies in such a condition, as our subjects shall not suffer by free quarter, or the unruliness of our soldiers; which is now in present agitation, and will (we no way doubt, by the advice of the members of both houses assembled) be speedily effected.— We do, toward so good a work, by the approbation and advice of the said members of both houses here assembled, desire you forthwith to lend us the sum of 200*l.* or the value thereof in plate, touched, at 5*s.* and untouched plate, at 4*s.* 5*d.* per ounce; and to pay or deliver the same, within 7 days after the receipt hereof, to the hands of our high sheriff of that our county, or to such whom he shall appoint to receive the same, upon his acquittance for the receipt thereof; who is forthwith to return and pay the same at Corpus-Christi College in Oxford, to the hands of the earl of Bath, the lord Seymour, Mr. John Ashburnham, and Mr. John Fettiplace, or any of them, who are appointed treasurers for the receiving and issuing thereof by the said members, (by whose order only the said money is to be disposed,) and to give receipts for the same; the which we promise to repay, as soon as God shall enable us.—This sum being to be advanced with speed, we are necessitated to apply ourselves to such persons as yourself, of whose ability and affection we have confidence; giving you this assurance, that in such farther charges, that the necessity of our just defence shall inforce us to require of our good subjects, your forwardness and disbursements shall be considered to your best advantage. And so, presuming you will not fail to express your affection herein, we bid you farewell. Given at our court at Oxford, Feb. 14, 1643. By the advice of the members of both houses, assembled at Oxford. ED. LITTLETON, SAMPSON EURE."

The DECLARATION of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, assembled at Oxford according to his Majesty's PROCLAMATION, concerning their Endeavours since they came thither for the Peace of the Kingdom, and the reasons enforcing their absence from Westminster.*

"We the lords and commons of parliament, being, upon just and important reasons, absent from the city of Westminster, whither we were legally called or sent by the power and authority of his majesty's writ, when he summoned his parliament; and being, by his gracious Proclamation of the 22d of Dec. convened at Oxford, with full liberty to present our humble advice to his majesty, for the preservation of the religion, laws, and safety of the kingdom; thought it most agreeable to our duty to God, our zeal and tenderness of his majesty's honour and safety, and our affection and compassion of the bleeding condition of our miserable country, to use our utmost and earliest endeavour, to prevent the effusion of more Christian English blood; and close those wounds, through which this kingdom is in danger, in a short time, to languish even to dissolution. And finding the ill success which had attended all the overtures of Treaty and Accommodation made by his majesty; his majesty's most gracious message from Nottingham being with so much contempt rejected, which being sent by members of both houses, those messengers were not suffered to deliver it as members, or to sit in the house whilst the same was debated, contrary to the privilege of parliament; and that to the two last Messages sent by him, of the 12th of April and 19th of May, (in both which are most gracious expressions of his princely and passionate inclinations to Peace) there hath not been the least answer returned to his majesty; but, on the contrary, his messenger imprisoned, and to this day detained;* and an Order that, on pain of death, none should presume to come thither from his majesty, upon what business soever, without leave from the earl of Essex: in pursuance of which Order, though the same passed only the commons, a sworn messenger of his majesty's hath been barbarously put to death, for carrying a legal writ to London;† we thought any address for Peace would most successfully pass through his hands; and that when he had considered how unhappily he had been made an instrument of so much blood and devastation, he would, with great cheerfulness have interposed in a business of reconciliation, and at least have met us half way in so blessed a work; and therefore, with his majesty's leave, (which he most readily and graciously gave us, and for which we doubt not he shall receive the thanks and prayers of all his good subjects) we directed a Letter to that purpose to him, signed under our hands. Whosoever reads that Letter, (and we hope it will be read by all men) will bear us witness, (and it will be a witness against those who have rejected it) that we have done our parts. Instead of vouchsafing us any Answer, or proposing to us any other way towards Peace, (if that which we proposed was not thought convenient) he writes a short Letter to the earl of Forth, general of his majesty's army, acknowledging the receipt of ours, but saying, 'That it neither having address to the two houses of parliament, nor therein there being any acknowledgment of them, he could not communicate it to them;' whereas the Address was in the way prescribed under pain of death, no address being allowed, as aforesaid, but by the earl of Essex; and he being desired to represent to, and promote with those by whom he is trusted, our most sincere and earnest desire of a Treaty; so that if there had been the least inclination to, or enduring of, an overture of Peace, he might have as easily communicated it to all those by whom he is intrusted, as to a committee, by whose advice, it is well known, his Answer was sent; and with it, and as a part of it, a Paper entitled, 'The Declaration of the kingdom of Scotland,' and 'A Declaration of the kingdom of England and Scotland,' and another, 'A Solemn League and Covenant;' the Declarations and Covenant being against the king of both kingdoms, without the consent of and against the major part of the nobility, and, we are confident, the gentry and commonalty of this. And if his lordship would make good his own Letter, and spend his blood, or but use his endeavours, for the maintenance of the parliament of England, being indeed the foundation whereupon all our laws and liberties are supported, we should not treat at this distance, at least a Treaty would not be rejected.—We suffered not ourselves to be discouraged with this refusal, but a Safe-Conduct was desired for two gentlemen (against whom there neither was, nor could be, the least exception) to go to Westminster, to present such Propositions as might best conduce to the peace of the kingdom; conceiving that, by such means, our meaning and intentions might best appear, and all formalities and unnecessary insisting and mistakes upon words might be removed. This Safe-Conduct (which had never been denied by his majesty, or his generals, to any person who hath desired to have admittance to him) was likewise absolutely refused by the earl of Essex; yet with some expressions, 'That if any Proposition should be sent to those by whom he was intrusted, he would use his utmost endeavours to advance the Peace;' which, though it seemed nothing agreeable to his former Answers, obtained yet so much credit with us, that we besought his majesty once more, in his own royal name, to press and desire a Treaty; and to direct his Message under such a title, that they who call themselves the two houses of parliament could not take any exception, but should be compelled to return some Answer or other. And an Answer it hath drawn from them, but such a one as will sufficiently inform the world (if there could yet have remained any doubt of it) how much they are enemies to Peace.—Those Answers and Declarations, and that Covenant, are likewise public to all men; God and the world must judge between us. In the meantime we must, without bitterness or sharpness of language, to which neither example or provocation shall transport us) tell these men, That most of us are too well known, even to themselves, to be suspected to incline to be either papists or slaves; or that we can possibly be made instruments to advance either popery or tyranny. And since the defence of the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom, seems to be (and in truth is on our part) the argument of this bloody contention; and that we are endeavouring all ways to destroy one another, in the behalf of that we all do, or all pretend to desire: we think ourselves obliged to truth, to the present age, and to posterity, to let the world know, That as we are much more tender of the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom, than of our lives and fortunes; so the uneasy condition wherein we are, and the heavy judgments and proscriptions imposed on us by our equals, have proceeded, and been caused, from that conscience, loyalty, and duty, in which we have been born and bred; and from which we could not swerve, without the manifest breach of our allegiance and those civil oaths we are obliged by; as, we hope, will appear to all men by this our ensuing Declaration.—We shall pass over (only acknowledging his majesty's abundant care and favour to his people) those excellent laws made this parliament, for the vindication and removal of those mischiefs and inconveniences, which seemed to threaten our rights and liberty; to all which there are very few amongst us who concurred not fully, however we are now traduced with the negligence of both; and that most gracious offer of his majesty, to consent to an act for the ease of tender consciences in matters indifferent; which, if it had been accepted, would have prevented many of the miseries which have since befallen this poor kingdom. And because the name and privilege of parliament is pretended in defence of those actions, which are done contrary to the known laws, by which only right and wrong can be measured and determined; and, by that venerable name, many of our companions and friends have been led into unwarrantable actions: before we come to consider the state and condition of the religion, laws, and liberty of the kingdom by these distractions, we shall let the world know how much the inherent and essential privileges of parliament have been violated; how we, being called by his majesty, and trusted by our country with their suffrages in that council, have been driven, and are now kept, from the place whither we were first called by his majesty, and where some members still sit; and, lastly, how far this miserable, and, to say no more, this unjustifiable civil war, and this desperate and odious invitation of a foreign power to invade this kingdom, is from having the countenance, authority, and approbation of the two houses of parliament.—The great industry and ill arts used by those who have since been principal instruments of the present rebellion, to bring in persons of their faction into the house of commons; the admitting and receiving such who were neither lawfully chosen, or lawfully returned by their country, and the putting and keeping out others whose opinions were not liked: the reprehending, reproaching, and imprisoning of members for speaking freely according to their consciences in matters in debate: the posting and setting up men's names in public places, and proscribing them as enemies to their country, who dissented, in the houses, in opinion in matters debated, and, being complained of, no reparation granted: the sitting at unparliamentary hours, thereby wearying and tiring many members from attendance; and so, in a thin house, altering and reversing the Resolutions taken in a full house: The refusing to receive and the suppressing Petitions against persons in favour, though in point of bribery and corruption in judicatory;* and the like of other Petitions from whole counties, for the preservation of the government of the church, as from Nottinghamshire and Somersetshire, whilst others against it were received with great countenance and approbation, from mean, unknown people: the getting with great labour, and faction, several hands to Petitions from counties, and then framing new Petitions at London, and annexing the hands formerly gotten in the country to those Petitions of which they who subscribed their hands knew nothing, as in the Petition of Buckinghamshire: the setting names in London to Petitions in the name of,

as if they had been subscribed in, remote counties: the usurping of jurisdictions to supersede acts of parliament, and to dispense with the breach of laws in force: the suffering undutiful and disloyal language against the sacred person of the king, without so much as reprehension, and the denying his majesty's negative voice, we insist not so much on (though very prejudicial and scandalous to the privileges and honour of parliament) as on those acts of force and violence, which are contrary and destructive to the freedom and liberty of parliament.—Shortly after his majesty returned from Scotland, there being a very long debate in the house of commons concerning an unparliamentary Remonstrance to be published to the people of the state of the kingdom, which many of us then thought might prove prejudicial to the peace thereof, capt. Venn, then a member of the house of commons, who had before bragged of having brought down the people upon the two houses, and so drawn resolutions from them, sent notes in writing, under his hand, into the city, that the people should come down to Westminster, for that 'the better part of the house was like to be overpowered by the worser part; whereupon, both at that time and some days after, multitudes of the meanest sort of people, with weapons not agreeing with their condition or custom, in a manner very contrary and destructive to the privilege of parliament, filled up the way between both houses, offering injuries both by words and actions to, and laying violent hands upon, several members; proclaiming the names of several of the peers, as 'evil and rotten-hearted lords', crying out many hours together against the established laws, in a most tumultuous and menacing way.—This action of capt. Venn's was complained of to the house of commons, and witnesses offered to prove it; a fellow who had assaulted and reproached a member of the house of commons in those tumults was complained of, and shewed to the house, in the number of those who brought a Petition to the bar; and yet, in neither of these cases, justice, or so much as an examination, could be obtained.—Upon a suggestion and pretence of danger, and suit made to his majesty, a guard was allowed and appointed by him for the security of both houses: shortly after, this guard was refused and discharged by themselves, and a new guard appointed by them without his majesty's consent, thereby to awe all those who concurred not with them. A legal writ issuing out by the direction of the house of peers, under the Great Seal of England, to prevent those tumults, which daily infested both houses; the justices of the Peace, for executing that writ according to their oaths, were imprisoned by the house of commons. A commission under the great Seal of England, for enquiry after riots committed in Southwark, was likewise superseded by an Order of the house of commons; and when the lords desired, by several Messages, that the house of commons would join with them in a Declaration against tumults, they refused or neglected to join with them; it being said by Mr. Pym, in the House of commons, 'God forbid we should dishearten our friends who come to assist us.' And albeit some of the lords professed, That if the people were again drawn down into that tumultuous manner, they would no more come to the house; and albeit an Order was made, That, in such a case, the house should be presently adjourned; yet those tumults again appearing, that Order, though urged by several lords, was not suffered to be executed.—The house of commons having desired the house of peers to join with them, in desiring his majesty that the Militia of this kingdom might be put into such hands as both houses did confide in; and this desire having been put to the question, and carried negatively by much the major part of the lords: it being again resumed at another time, contrary to the course of parliament, the debate was begun with a Declaration made by several of those lords, against whom that question was twice carried by Votes, and that by much the major part, that 'whosoever refused in this particular to join with the house of commons, were in their opinions, enemies to the state;' words destructive to the liberty and freedom of debate.—During the time that this business of the Militia was in debate, (that is, before it had the approbation and consent of the house of peers) a Petition, in a tumultuous manner, was delivered to the house of lords, in the name of the 'Knights, gentlemen, freeholders, and others the inhabitants of the county of Hertford,' reckoning up the causes of the present fears, troubles, and distractions; and, among them, the want of compliance in that honourable house with the house of commons, in entertaining those many good motions, and passing those necessary bills presented to them from that house, for the public good; and desiring liberty to protest against all those, as enemies to the public, who refused to join with the lords, whose endeavours were for the public good, and with the commons for the putting the kingdom into a posture of safety, under the command of such persons as the parliament should appoint.—Several Petitions of the same nature; particularly one under the title of 'The Knights, gentlemen, freeholders, and other inhabitants of the county of Surrey,' directed to the house of peers; concluded, thus, 'That they should be in duty obliged to maintain their lordships, so far as they should be united with the commons in their just and pious proceedings;' sufficiently intimating, That if they joined not with the commons, they then meant as much as others had plainly professed.—About the same time, a citizen saying at the bar of the house of commons, 'That they heard there were lords who refused to consent and concur with them, and that they would gladly know their names,' or words to that effect: a Petition, in the name of many thousand poor people, in and about the city of London, was directed to the house of commons, 'taking notice of a malignant faction that made abortive all their good motions, which tended to the peace and tranquillity of this kingdom; desiring that those noble worthies of the house of peers, who concurred with them in their happy votes, might be earnestly desired to join with that honourable house, and to sit and vote together, as one entire body;' and professing, 'that unless some speedy remedy were taken for the removing all such obstructions, as hindered the happy progress of their great endeavours, their petitioners should not rest in quietness; but should be forced to lay hold on the next remedy which was at hand, to remove the disturbers of the peace, and (want and necessity breaking the bounds of modesty) not to leave any means un- essayed for their relief:' lastly, adding, 'That the cry of the poor and needy was, That such persons, who were the obstacles of their peace, and the hinderers of the happy proceedings of this parliament, might be forthwith publickly declared, whose removal they conceived would put a period to those distractions.' And this Petition was brought up to the house of lords by the commons, at a conference; and after the same day, Mr. Hollis, a member of the commons, in a Message from that house, pressed the lords at their bar to join with the commons in their desire about the Militia; and farther, with many other expressions of like nature, desired, in words to this effect, 'That if that desire of the house of commons was not assented unto, those lords who were willing to concur would find some means to make themselves known, that it might be known who were against them, and they might make it known to those that sent them.' After which Petition so strangely framed, countenanced, and seconded, many lords thereupon withdrawing themselves, the Vote in order to the Militia, twice before rejected, was then passed.—After these and other unparliamentary actions, many things, rejected and settled upon solemn debate, were again, after many threats and menaces, resumed, altered and determined, contrary to the custom and laws of parliament: and so many of us withdrew ourselves from thence, where we could not, sit, speak, and vote with honour, freedom, and safety; and are now kept from thence for our duty and loyalty to our sovereign. And though some of us sat and continued there long after this, hoping that we might have been able to have prevented the growth and progress of farther mischief; yet since the privilege of parliament is so substantial and entire a right, that as the invasion of the liberties of either house is an injury to the other, and the whole kingdom; so the violence and assaults upon any of our fellow-members, for expressing their opinions in matters of debate, were instances to us what we were to look for when we should be known to dissent from what was expected; and, under that consideration, every one of our just liberties suffered violation.—Many of us, for these and other reasons, after his majesty himself was by many indignities and force driven from Westminster, have been, contrary to the right and freedom of parliament, voted out of the house, without committing any crime; and some of us without a hearing, or so much as being summoned to be heard; and so our counties, for which we were and are trusted, have been without any proxies or persons trusted on their behalf; an army hath been raised without and against his majesty's consent; and a Protestation enjoined to live and die with the earl of Essex, their general of that army; and a member, now amongst us (Mr. Gamull) refusing to take that Protestation, was told, 'That if he left not the town speedily, he should be committed to the Tower, or knocked on the head by the soldiers.' All persons, even the members of both houses, have been, and now are, forced or enjoined to contribute for the maintenance and support of that army.—A traitorous Covenant is since taken by the members who remain, and imposed upon the kingdom, 'That they will, to their power, assist the forces raised and continued by both houses of parliament, against the forces raised by the king;' with many other clauses, directly contrary to their allegiance; and another for the alteration of the government of the church established by law; and such members as have refused, according to their duty and conscience, to take those Covenants, have been imprisoned or expelled; so as they have suffered none to reside with them, but those who are engaged with them in their desperate courses.—The whole power and authority of both houses is delegated, against the law and nature of parliament, to a close committee; which assumes and usurps the power of king, lords, and commons, and disposes of the persons, liberties and estates of us and our fellow-subjects without so much as communicating their Resolutions to those that sit in the houses. And when an Order hath been reported, to be confirmed by them, it hath been only put to the question, no debates being suffered; it having been said in the house where the commons sit, to those who have excepted against such an Order, when presented, 'That they were only to vote, not to dispute;' and thereupon all argument and contradiction hath been taken away.—And to shew how impossible it is to contain themselves within any bounds of civility and humanity, when they have forfeited their allegiance, after the attempt, in a most barbarous manner, to murder the queen's majesty at her landing at Bridlington, (p. 89), by making many great shot at the house where she lodged for her repose after a long voyage by sea, (where, by God's blessing it was disappointed) they impeached her of high treason, for assisting the king her husband, and the kingdom in their greatest necessities.—All Petitions and Addresses for Peace have been, with great art and vehemence, discountenanced and suppressed; whilst others, for sedition and discord, have, with no less industry and passion, been promoted. And when the members of the house of commons, in August last, had agreed upon a long and solemn debate, to join with the lords in sending Propositions of Peace to his majesty, the next day printed papers were scattered in the streets, and fixed upon the public places, both in the city and suburbs, requiring 'all persons well-affected to rise as one man, and to come to the house of commons next morning, for that 20,000 Irish rebels were landed;' which direction and information was likewise, that day, given in pulpits by their seditious preachers; and in some of those papers was subscribed, 'That the Malignant Party had over-voted the Good, and if not prevented there would be peace;' the Propositions for Peace being, the day before, carried by 29 voices: a Common Council was called late at night, though Sunday, and a Petition there framed against Peace; which was, the next morning, brought to the house, countenanced by alderman Pennington, a known promoter and governor of those tumults, and attended with a great multitude of mean persons, who used threats, menaces, and reproaches to the members of both houses; their Petition took notice of 'Propositions passed by the Lords for Peace, which, if allowed, would be destructive to religion, laws, and liberties;' and therefore desired an Ordinance, according to the tenor of an act of their common council the night before: thanks was given them by the commons, whilst the lords complained of the tumults, and desired a concurrence to suppress them, and to prevent the like; many of the people telling the members of both houses, 'That if they had not a good answer, they would be there the next day with double the number.' (see p. 160). By these threats and violence, the Propositions formerly received were rejected, and all thoughts of Peace laid aside.*—Shortly after, great numbers of Women resort to the house where the commons sat, with a Petition for Peace, (see p. 160); troops of horse were hereupon sent for, who wound and kill several of the women, and disperse the rest; then special notice was taken of those members who seemed most importunate and desirous of Peace, and thereupon the late Covenant eagerly and severely pressed upon them: by reason whereof, and the other miscarriages whereby their freedom was absolutely taken from them, divers of both houses withdrew themselves. And we must now appeal to all our fellow-subjects of this kingdom, who have taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; who have any knowledge of the rights, customs, and privileges of parliament, or of the frame and constitution of this realm, whether we or they have failed in our duty to our king or country; and whether we have not, in discharge of a good conscience, undergone the evils we have borne: And then, we doubt not, we shall not be thought less members of parliament, though we are not at Westminster, than if that city were in the possession of a foreign enemy; yet we confess the place to be so material, that if there were that liberty and freedom which is due to the members, and indeed is the life of parliaments, the act of those in the house, being a lawful act, is the act of the house, though there were a greater number absent, who were all of another opinion: but in our case, when we are by force driven away, and by force kept away; and when nothing can be said to justify the actions which are done, but the reputation and number of the actors, we rely so much upon the understanding and honesty of our countrymen that they will believe, when they see our concurrence and unanimity in resolutions and counsels for their peace, welfare, and security, (as we are confident the number of those who concur in this Declaration is greater than hath concurred in most, if not in any, of those things of which we complain) that it will be better for them to be advised by us at Oxford, than by those at Westminster; from whence we are absent only by reason of those outrages and violences offered to our persons or our consciences, which take away all freedom, and consequently all authority, from those councils; and where indeed these men ought not to undertake to act any thing, till that freedom and liberty be restored to us;

* Mr. Denzil Hollis, who appears by the Journals to have been one of the tellers upon this occasion, gives us the following account of this last attempt for Peace: "The house of lords, in the summer after the beginning of our troubles in 1643, having resolved to deliver themselves and the kingdom from this Egyptian slavery, had prepared a message to the king, with overtures for an Accommodation; and sent it down to the commons on a Saturday, where the major part seemed to be of the same mind; and, after a long dispute and much opposition, prevailed to take it into consideration, made an entrance into it, agreed to some particulars, and, it growing late, adjourned the further debate till Monday morning; against which time these firebrands had set the city in a flame, as if there were a resolution to betray all to the king; and thereupon brought down a rabble of their party, some thousands, to the house of commons door, who gave out threatening speeches, and named among themselves (but so as they might be heard) some members of the house, whom they said they looked upon as enemies, and would pull out of the house; which did so terrify many honest timorous men, and gave that boldness to the others, as, contrary to all order, they resumed the question that was settled on Saturday for going on with the business; and at last carried it, by some voices, to have it laid aside; which was the highest strain of insolency, the greatest violation of the authority and freedom (the two essential ingredients) of a parliament that, before that time, was ever known." Memoirs, p. 9.

who, as long as this parliament shall continue, notwithstanding all the Votes of those who are guilty of treason and rebellion, must account ourselves, and shall be accounted by our country, the true and lawful members of parliament.—Having said thus much to undeceive our brethren, and that our fellow-subjects may be no longer seduced to unlawful actions, by colour and pretence of parliament, we shall briefly present to their view and consideration the Danger and Condition of his Majesty's Person, his Honour and Rights, with the Religion and Liberty of the kingdom; the defence and maintenance of which those persons, with whom we cannot agree, seem and pretend to undertake.—For their care of the Honour and Safety of his Majesty's Person, to the which we are so absolutely obliged, and so solemnly sworn, we shall need only to mention, which we mention with great sadness of heart and horror, the taking by force his majesty's forts, towns, and navy; the assuming a power over the Militia of the kingdom; the denying his majesty's negative voice; the uncomely, insolent, and disloyal mentioning of his majesty's person; the neglect, contempt, and violation of leagues made by his majesty with foreign princes, in the injuries and affronts done to their public ministers, and otherwise; the transcendent presumption of sending agents to foreign princes, and in the name of the states of England; the traiterous distinction between the Person of the king and his office, and declaring, That an attempt upon his life is not high treason; which doctrine is so much countenanced, that persons, who have threatened to kill the king, having been complained of, have been left unpunished, and the witnesses and prosecutors threatened or discountenanced; the raising an army against him, and therewith giving battle to his person; all which are known to be very unagreeable to the affection, duty, and loyalty of subjects and Englishmen.—Concerning Religion; we cannot but, with bleeding hearts, and trembling souls, consider the unheard-of impieties and profanations exercised in churches and consecrated places; the countenance and licence given to scandalous, debauched, ignorant lay-persons to preach and exercise the office of the ministry; the suppressing and cruel using and imprisoning, in goals, and on ship-board, godly, learned, orthodox divines, famous and exemplary in their lives and doctrine, the most eminent assertors of the Protestant religion against popery and innovations; the scurrilous and scandalous reviling, scoffing, and suppressing the Book of Common Prayer, compiled by glorious martyrs for the protestant religion, established by law and so long and so publicly used and acknowledged as an excellent and an unparalleled form of devotion and divine service; the suspending the execution of the act of parliament made in the first year of queen Elizabeth, of famous memory, for uniformity of Common-Prayer, by an Order under the hand of a private member (Mr. Pym) of the house of commons, and that during the recess of both houses; the stirring up and inciting the people to rebellion, in pulpits; and, which is the greatest scandal and reproach to the protestant religion that can be imagined, the making religion itself the ground and cause of rebellion: lastly, after having lived so many years in the most glorious and most unblemished church of Christendom, the total defacing and pulling down the whole fabrick of it; censuring and reproaching the doctrine, and destroying the discipline; and, as if we were cast a-shore in some uninhabited climate, where the elements of Christianity were not known, the calling, without the least shadow or colour of law, or lawful authority, against his majesty's express consent, manifestly against the statute 25th Hen. 8. an Assembly of Divines, composed of some noblemen, gentlemen, and ministers, (all under the stile of Godly and Learned Divines) most of which are not otherwise known than by their schism and separation from that church, in which they were born, and to which they have subscribed; and these men now must new-make and mould the religion, by which we must all be saved. God in his good time, we hope, will vindicate his own cause, and repair the breaches which have been lately made.—For the Laws of the Land and the Liberty of the Subject, so speciously urged and pretended to be the end of those who have disturbed our peace, we need say little; every place and every person is an ample evidence and testimony of the bold and avowed violation of either. The Charter of our Liberties, Magna Charta, so industriously and religiously preserved by our ancestors, and above 30 several times confirmed in parliament; that rampire and bulwark of all the precious privileges and immunities which the subjects of this kingdom could boast of, and which distinguishes them from all the subjects of Christendom, is levelled and trampled under foot, scorned, despised, and superseded by Votes and Orders: men of all sorts, clergy and laity, imprisoned without the least charge that, by the law, is called a crime; and their estates are sequestered by persons of whom the law can take no notice; committees, made by committees, rob, banish, and imprison the lords and commons of England; men committed, by persons of no authority, for no cause, to prison, have, by Habeas Corpus (the good old remedy and security for our liberty) been brought to the King's-Bench; and, by command of those who first committed them, remanded, and commands given to the judges that they should grant no Habeas Corpus (which they were sworn to grant) to any persons committed by them, or by those to whom they grant authority to commit, which themselves have not power to do.—Neither can we pass over the motion made by Mr. Rigby, a member of the house of commons, to transport those lords and gentlemen who were prisoners, and by them accounted Malignants, to be sold as Slaves to Algiers, or sent to the new plantation in the West-Indies; urged the second time with much earnestness, because the proposer had contracted with two merchants to that purpose; the which, though it took no effect at that time, may awaken those who have observed so many things to pass and be ordered, long after it had been once or twice denied and rejected: and who sees the new and inhuman way of imprisoning persons of quality under decks on ship-board, by which cruel usage many of our countrymen have been murdered, may have reason to fear they may be hereafter carried a longer voyage than is yet avowed.—The twentieth part of our Estates is at once taken; and, if we are not willing to obey that Order, the other 19 are taken from us as Malignants; a term unknown and undefined, and yet crime enough to forfeit our lives, and all that we have. Our fellow-subjects have been executed in cold blood, for doing that which, by the laws of God and man, they were bound to do;* and, after their murder, their estates seized, and their wives and children exposed to misery and famine. Laws made, and penalties imposed by laws, in this parliament, are suspended, dispensed withall; and those things done by Order, against which those laws were made. And, that there may be no face of justice over the land, the judges are prohibited to ride their circuits, for the administration of that justice which the king owes his people, and they are bound to execute.—And after all this, and after the merciless shedding so much English blood; after the expending so much money, much of which was given for relief of our poor Protestant brethren of Ireland, and diverted for the improving the distractions at home; after the transportation of such vast sums of money and great treasure into foreign parts, to the unspeakable impoverishing this poor kingdom; to make our misery lasting and our confusion compleat, a foreign enemy is invited and brought into the bowels of this kingdom, to drink our blood, to divide our possessions, to give us new laws, and to rule over us; and, the better to make way to those horrid impositions, by confounding and making void all civil rights and properties, and the better preparing the kingdom to be shared by strangers, a new Great Seal, the special ensign of Monarchy, and the only way by which justice is derived and distributed to the people, is counterfeited and used; albeit it be, by the express letter of the statute of the 25th Edw. 3, declared to be high treason.—Having now made this clear, plain Narration to the kingdom, the truth and particulars whereof are known to most men; that when posterity shall find our Names in the records of these times, (as members trusted by our country in that great council, by whose authority and power the present alteration and distraction seems to be wrought) it may likewise see how far we have been, and are, from consenting to these desperate and fatal innovations, we cannot rest satisfied without declaring and publishing to all our fellow-subjects, and to the whole world, That all our intentions and actions have been, are, and shall be, directed to the defence of his majesty's person and just rights, with the preservation of the true protestant religion and liberties of the kingdom established by law : That as we do, with all humility to God Almighty, and as a great blessing from him, acknowledge his majesty's happy and religious reign and government over this kingdom, and especially the excellent laws and statutes made in this time, and particularly those in this parliament ; so we do, with all duty and submission, declare, That his majesty is the only supreme governor of this realm in all causes ecclesiastical and temporal : that his natural person is not to be divided from his kingly office, but that our natural allegiance, and the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, do bind us and all his other subjects to loyalty and allegiance to his natural person : that his majesty's negative voice, without which monarchy is dissolved, is an inherent right of his crown ; and that no Orders of one or both houses of parliament, without his majesty's express consent, can make a law to bind the subjects, either in their property or liberty : that we do, from our souls, abhor the present rebellion raised in this kingdom against his majesty ; and that all his majesty's subjects are bound, by their natural allegiance, and the oaths lawfully taken by them, to the utmost of their power, to resist and repress the same ; and particularly the army now under the command of the earl of Essex, and all other armies raised, or to be raised, without his majesty's consent, under pretence of the authority of the two houses of parliament. And we do disclaim all Votes, Orders, and Declarations in countenance or maintenance of the said armies : and declare, That no Oath or Covenant, voluntarily taken or enforced, doth, or can, bind or dispense with the breach of those other Oaths formerly and lawfully taken to his majesty : and that all those who aid, assist, or abet this horrid and odious rebellion, are, and ought to be, accounted and pursued as traitors by the known laws of the land : that we utterly detest and disclaim the invitation which hath been made to his majesty's subjects of Scotland, to enter this kingdom with an army ; the same being as much against the desires, as against the duty of the lords and commons of England, and all true-hearted Englishmen : and as we do declare and publish to the world, That any such invasion, or hostile entry into the kingdom, by the rebellious subjects of Scotland, is a direct and peremptory breach of the late act of Pacification between the two kingdoms ; so we, and all the subjects of this kingdom, are bound, by our allegiance, and by that very act, to resist and repress such invasion ; and whosoever is or shall be abetting, aiding, or assisting to those of Scotland, in their hostile invasion of this kingdom, ought to be looked upon as betrayers of their country, and are guilty of high treason by the known laws of the kingdom.— And that our weak, misled and seduced countrymen may no longer pay an implicit regard and reverence to the abused name of Parliament, which these guilty persons usurp to themselves ; and so submit to those actions and commands, which two houses of parliament (never so legally and regularly constituted) have not authority to require or enjoin ; and since these men will not suffer their poor country to be restored, by a Treaty, to the benefit of a parliament, which would, with God's blessing, easily remove these miseries, and prevent the like for the time to come ; we must and do declare to the whole kingdom, That as at no time, either or both houses of parliament can, by any Order or Ordinance, impose upon the people without the king's consent : so, by reason of the want of freedom and security for all the members of parliament to meet at Westminster, and there to sit, speak, and vote with freedom and safety, all the Actions, Votes, Orders, Declarations, and pretended Ordinances, made by those members who remain still at Westminster, are void and of none effect : and as many of the lords and commons, assembled at Westminster, as have at any time consented to the raising of forces under the command of the earl of Essex, or to the making and using the new Great Seal, or to the present coming of the Scots into England, in a warlike manner, have therein broken the trust reposed in them by their country, and ought to be proceeded against as traitors. And yet we are far from dissolving, or attempting the dissolution of, this parliament, or the violation of any act made and confirmed by his majesty's royal assent this parliament, which we shall always maintain and defend. Acts of parliament are only in danger to be destroyed by those who undervalue and despise the authority and power of acts of parliament ; who therefore deny the king's negative voice, and neglect his concurrence, that their own resolutions may be reputed as acts of parliament, to the ruin and confusion of all laws and interests.—It is our grief, in the behalf of the whole kingdom, that since the parliament is not dissolved, the power thereof should, by the treason and violence of these men, be so far suspended, that the kingdom should be without the fruit and benefit of a parliament ; which cannot be reduced to any action or authority, till the freedom and liberty, due to the members, be restored and admitted ; and they only who oppose this must be looked upon as the enemies to parliament ; in the mean time we neither have or shall attempt any thing for the adjourning, dissolving, or proroguing thereof otherwise than as it may stand with the act in that case provided.— Lastly, we declare, That all our endeavours, actions, and resolutions tend, and are directed, and shall always be directed, to the maintenance of God's true Religion, established by law, within this kingdom ; to the Defence of his majesty's sacred Person, his honour, and just rights; to the preservation of the Liberty and Property of the Subject, settled, and evident, by the laws, statutes, and customs of the realm; and the just freedom, liberty, and privileges of parliament: and that what we shall do, for the defence and maintenance of all these, proceeds from the conscience of our duty to God, our king, and country, without any private and sinister ends of our own; and out of our sincere love to truth and peace, the which as we have, so we shall always labour to procure, as the only blessed end of all our labours.—And we do therefore conjure all our countrymen and fellow-subjects, by all those precious obligations of religion to God Almighty, of loyalty towards their sovereign, of affection towards one another, and of charity and compassion towards their bleeding country, to assist and join with us in suppressing those enemies to Peace, who are so much delighted with the ruin and confusion they have made, that they will not so much as vouchsafe to treat with us, that all specious pretences might be taken away, and the grounds of this bloody contention clearly stated to the world.—If these men, with a true sense and remorse of the ill they have done, shall yet return to their duty and loyalty, they shall, God willing, find us of another temper towards them, than they have been towards us; and if the conscience of their duty shall not draw all our fellow-subjects and countrymen to join with us in assisting his majesty, we hope that the prudent consideration, That it is impossible to reason for our miserable country ever to be restored to peace and happiness, but by restoring all just and legally due power and authority into his majesty's hands again, will direct them what is fit to be done by them.—And if any yet shall be so unskilful, and to say no worse, vulgar-spirited, to hope, by a neutrality and odious indifferency, to rest secure in this storm, though we shall not follow the examples of other men, in telling them, That their estates shall be forfeited and taken from them, as pernicious and public enemies; yet, God be thanked, the law is not so suppressed, but that it proceeds in attainders and forfeitures; and all men know an estate escheated to his majesty by high treason, is as much, and as legally his majesty's, or his to whom his majesty grants it, as ever it was the unhappy person's who hath so forfeited it; yet we must let them know, that their condition is like to be very dangerous; and that as they (for resistance of whom his majesty's armies are raised) have declared to them what they are to expect at their hands, that is, to be dealt with as pernicious and public enemies; so they have reason to believe, that his majesty cannot look upon them as persons who have performed that duty they are obliged to by their natural allegiance, and their oaths enjoined by law; which is, 'To defend the king to the utmost of their power, against all conspiracies and attempts whatsoever, which shall be made against his majesty's person,

'his crown and dignity; and to do their best endeavours to disclose and make known to him all treasons and conspiracies which shall be against him; to their power to assist all jurisdictions, privileges, pre-eminences, and authorities belonging to him, or united to the imperial crown of this realm.' The just and pious consideration and weighing of which oath and obligation must stir up all men of loyalty and conscience, to be industrious and active on his majesty's behalf against this horrid and odious rebellion, and against the authors and fomenters of the same.—And we are confident it will not a little increase the indignation of all good and true Englishmen to find these disturbers of their peace, who have so speciously pretended the defence of the rights and privileges of parliament, unite themselves with, and govern their actions by, the concurrent advice and consent of commissioners of another kingdom, whose business is to alter our laws, and confound our government. And if all the other particulars, so plainly set down in this Declaration, and so publicly known to most men, were wanting, there could not be a greater instance of deserting the dignity and right, and as much as in them lies, cancelling all the liberties and privileges of parliament, than for these men to break the trust reposed in them by their country; and to submit themselves to the advice, and oblige themselves to the consent, of agents of another kingdom, who have cast off their allegiance, and united themselves together against their natural and native king, and against the laws of both kingdoms; and have given an ample testimony to all those they have misled, how far they are from submitting or intending to be governed by parliament, or by those who would yet be thought the two houses of parliament, by joining 4 Scotsmen (agents for that rebellious army which hath invaded this kingdom) in equal power and authority with 7 lords and 14 commons; by whose sole and uncontrouled managery and consent, all business of Peace and War, which doth or may concern this languishing kingdom, must be governed: and yet these men take it very heinously, that his majesty should move them, in order to Peace, to agree that all the members of both houses may securely meet in a full and free Convention of Parliament; because, they say, 'From thence no other conclusion can be made, but that this present parliament is not a full nor free convention, and that to make it such the presence of us is necessary.'—We must appeal to all the world, whether, in truth, that conclusion be not very apparent from the truth of their proceedings, and even to the conscience of these men themselves; whether, whilst we were amongst them, we enjoyed the liberty and freedom which was due to us; and whether, if there were no danger or breach of duty in being willingly and constantly present where actions of treason are plotted and concluded, we could now be with them without engaging ourselves in that Covenant; which, as it takes away all freedom and liberty of council, so cannot be taken without the violation of our duty and allegiance.—For the deserting the great trust reposed in us, we cannot with the least colour be accused; we wish it had not been, or were not now broken on their parts; on ours we are sure it is not; except observation of our oaths, lawfully taken and enjoined, and submission to the known established laws of the land, the preservation of which is our greatest trust, be to desert the trust reposed in us: what they have done, who have broken through all these, and will not at last consent to the binding up the wounds they have made, we must leave to the world to judge.—In the mean time, since it is apparent they use their utmost endeavours to make Peace impossible, and (having enriched themselves by these public calamities, and impoverished their country by the transportation of the wealth thereof into foreign parts) have left themselves no other means to repay those vast sums they have extorted from the people upon that they call Public Faith, but out of the estates of those who have preserved their duty and loyalty entire; and, at the price of their religion and laws, intend to establish a government and empire to themselves; all good men who desire Peace will join with us in the suppressing these enemies of Peace, and, by a resolute and unanimous Declaration of themselves, rise as one man in the assistance of his majesty, with their persons and their fortunes, which is the only means, with God's blessing, to restore and preserve the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom, and the very being of parliaments; the which, if these men have any mind to do (it being not so easily to be done any other way) they will at last be willing that all the members of both houses may meet in a full and free Convention of Parliament, which we have always desired, and shall be always ready to do."

This Declaration of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled at Oxford, was ordered, by the King, to be read in every church and chapel throughout England and Wales.

The Petition of the Lords and Commons at Oxford to the King, the day before their Recess.] Next follows the Petition of the Lords and Commons at Oxford to the King, the day before their Recess:

To the King's most Excellent Majesty: The Humble PETITION of the Lords and Commons of Parliament, assembled at Oxford according to your Majesty's Proclamation.

"We most humbly acknowledge your princely goodness in calling us to receive our advice for preservation of the religion, laws, and safety of the kingdom, and to restore it to its former peace and security: how earnestly we have sought a Peace with your majesty's most gracious concurrence, doth appear by the printed Declaration of our proceedings touching a Treaty for Peace; wherein we aimed at a free and full Convention of Parliament, as the most hopeful way to unite these unhappy divisions; and since that hath been refused, we have applied our advice for supporting your armies, the visible means now left for maintaining our religion, restoring the laws, and procuring the safety of the kingdom; being assured from your majesty, you do and will employ your armies to no other end.—And although ourselves are most fully satisfied of your majesty's pious and just resolutions herein; yet, because Fears and Jealousies have been and are maliciously scattered amongst your subjects, to poison their affections and corrupt their loyalty to your majesty; therefore, to the end that we may be enabled by your gracious Answer to satisfy all the world, or to leave them inexcusable who will not be satisfied, we do, in all humility, present to your majesty these Petitions: That your majesty will give direction for the reprinting your Protestation, made in the head of your army,* and your other Declarations; wherein your constant resolution is declared to maintain and defend the true reformed protestant religion; and that the same may be with more diligence published amongst the people; that so your princely Christian zeal and affection to that religion, and to maintain the same against all popery, schism, and profaneness, may be manifested; and which we beseech your majesty, upon this our Petition, to declare again to all the world, to the discountenance and suppression of those scandals laid upon your majesty, by those who disturb our peace.—That when there may be a free and full Convention of Parliament, a national synod may be lawfully called to advise of some fit means for the establishing the government and peace of our church, to whom may be recommended a care for the ease of the tender consciences of your protestant subjects.—Touching our laws; we cannot ask more of your majesty, than to declare and continue your former resolutions, to hold and keep them inviolable and unalterable, but by act of parliament. And for avoiding the scandal maliciously infused into many of your subjects, 'That if your majesty prevail against this Rebellion, you intend not to use the frequent counsel of parliaments,' we humbly pray and advise your majesty to declare the sincerity of your royal heart therein, to satisfy your seduced subjects against such false and malicious aspersions.—And, in respect the present Contributions, Loans, Taxes, and other Impositions for maintenance of your armies, have been submitted unto as exigences of war and necessity, because of this unexampled rebellion and invasion; we humbly beseech your majesty to declare, That they shall not be drawn into example, nor continue longer than the present exigence and necessity, nor be at any time mentioned as precedents: and that, for the farther security of your people, your majesty will vouchsafe to promise your royal assent to a law, to be made and declared to that purpose, in a full and free Convention of parliament.—And that for the present ease and encouragement of those under contributions, by contract with your majesty, you will be pleased, that those contracts may be so observed, that your subjects may not have just cause of complaint against the commanders, governors, officers, or soldiers of your army; or of or in any your garrisons, castles, or forts; for taking any money, horses or other cattle, provisions or other goods, or any timber, or woods of any your subjects; or free-billet, or free-quarter in any place, where the contributions and taxes agreed on are paid; humbly beseeching your majesty's gracious care herein, and that the offenders may receive exemplary punishment. Lastly, That your majesty will retain your pious endeavours to procure the peace of this languishing kingdom, not to be removed or altered by any advantages or prosperous success."

HIS MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS ANSWER.

"As we shall always acknowledge the great comfort and assistance we have received by your counsels, since your meeting here according to our Proclamation; so we must give you very particular thanks for the expressions you have made, in this Petition, of your confidence in us, and for the care you have therein taken, that all our good subjects may receive ample satisfaction in those things upon which the good and welfare of their condition so much depends. We have long observed (though not without wonder) the sly, subtle, and groundless insinuation, infused and dispersed amongst our people by the disturbers of the public peace, of our favouring and countenancing of popery; and therefore, as in our constant visible practice we have, to the utmost of our power, and we hope sufficiently, manifested the gross falsehood of those imputations and scandals; so we have omitted no opportunity of publishing to all the world the clear intentions and resolutions of our soul in that point. We wish from our heart, that the true Reformed Protestant Religion may not receive greater blemish by the actions and practice of these men, than it doth, or shall, by any connivance of ours. We will take the best care we can, and we desire your assistance in it, to publish to all our good subjects that our Protestation and those Declarations you mention; and we do assure you, there is not an expression in either of them, for the maintenance and advancement of our religion, with which our heart doth not fully concur; and in which we shall be so constant, that, if it shall not please God to enable us by force to defend it, we shall shew our affection and love to it, by dying for it. We may, without vanity, say it hath pleased God to enlighten our understanding to discern the clear truth of the Protestant Religion, in which we have been born and bred, from the mists and clouds of Popery; the which (if it hath made any growth or progress of late within the kingdom, as we hope it hath not) is more beholders to the unchristian rage and fury of these men, than to any connivance or favour of ours.—For a National Synod; we have often promised it, and when God shall give so much peace and quiet to this kingdom, that regular and lawful conventions may be esteemed, shall gladly perform that promise, as the best means to re-establish our religion, and make up those breaches which are made; and we shall then willingly recommend unto them a special care of the ease of the tender consciences of our protestant subjects, as we have often expressed.—For the Laws of the Land; we can say no more than we have said in that Protestation you mention; and we thank you for being satisfied with it: in which God knows our resolution to be so firm and steadfast, that we will give any security under heaven for the observation of it. And as our greatest desire at this present is to meet in a full and free convention of parliament, which we are confident would quickly put an end to all these troubles; so when it shall please God to restore that blessing to us, we shall value and esteem that council, and frequently consult with it, and be advised by it, as the best means to make both king and people truly happy; and we shall then, by an act given, wipe out the footsteps of those extraordinary supplies, which nothing but this real visible necessity, which oppresses us all, could have compelled us to make use of; and which shall never be mentioned or remembered by us, to the least prejudice of your rights and liberties. And in the mean time we shall leave nothing undone, for the observation of particular contracts, and prevention of the disorder and licence of the soldiers, which is in our power to do; no particular person enduring half that sadness of heart for those breaches and pressures, which we ourself do; for the prevention and suppression whereof, we shall proceed with all rigour and severity.—Lastly, As the support and maintenance of the Religion, Laws, and Privileges of Parliament, is, as you well know, the only argument of our defensive arms; so, these being secured, we shall, with all imaginable joy lay down those arms; and as you have been our witnesses and our assistants in our earnest desires of Peace, so we promise you, we shall not only with the same earnestness always embrace it, if it shall be offered, but pursue and press it, upon the least likelihood of opportunity; and this our resolution, by God's blessing, shall never be altered by any advantages or prosperous success."

"My lords and gentlemen; I am now brought to you by yourselves; for I should not so soon have parted with you, if you had not desired it; and I believe that the same zeal and affection to me and your country, which hath brought and staid you here, hath caused you to seek this recess; that so, by distributing yourselves into your several countries, we may all the better reap the fruits of our consultations; wherefore, in God's name, dispose of yourselves as you think fit. I heartily thank you for what you have done, and fully approve of what you desire. I think most, if not all of you are engaged in my service, either in a civil or a martial way: To you that have charge in my armies I recommend the diligent attendance on your commands; that so, by your good example and discipline, you may suppress that licence and disorder which will discredit, and may destroy the best cause. And to you who are engaged in the civil affairs, I must recommend these few particulars; That you expedite those Supplies of Monies, which by your advice, I have sent for, whether by subscription or excise, remembering that monies are the nerves of war. Likewise that you use your best diligence for the impressing of men, and encouragement of volunteers; by shewing them, that now the only way to preserve themselves from slavery, and their country from ruin, is freely to engage their Persons.—But chiefly, and with all possible care, to inform all my subjects of the barbarity and odiousness of this Rebellion; how solicitous I have been for Peace, and how insolently and scornfully it has been rejected; assuring them, that my armies are raised and kept only for the defence of their Religion, Laws, and Liberties, which being once secured and vindicated, I shall most cheerfully lay them down; I having, God knows, with much unwillingness taken them up.—Lastly, assure them, That these extraordinary ways, which necessity hath produced, and most of them not without your consent or advice, for my Supply, shall not hereafter be brought in example to their prejudice; and I shall, in the mean time, do my best to prevent and punish all exorbitances and disorders.—To conclude: my lords and gentlemen, I do now again, yet never enough, thank you for your great and unanimous expressions of your affections to me, which hath laid an inexpressible obligation upon me: and be assured, that there is no profession, which I have made for the defence and maintenance of our religion, laws, and liberties, which I will not inviolably observe. Now God, who hath blessed this meeting with an unexpected unanimity, (which I esteem as one not of his least blessings) will, I hope, bring us all safe together again the 8th day of October next. In the mean time I shall be ready to receive any thing from your committees, that shall be desired."

Thus much for the proceedings of the Convention at Oxford. We shall now return to the Parliament at Westminster.

Ordinance for appointing a Committee of both Houses, to join with the Scots Commissioners, for better managing the Common Cause. We have already mentioned, that, in the beginning of February, both houses were busy in settling affairs between a Committee of theirs and the Scots Commissioners lately sent to them. It took up many days, to regulate this business: at last an Ordinance was finally agreed on, Feb. 16. which runs thus:

"Whereas by the Covenant and Treaty ratified and established between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, both nations are engaged in one Common Cause against the enemies of their religion and liberties; and by the late entrance of the Scots forces into this kingdom, in pursuance hereof, are firmly united in a joint posture of arms, for their own necessary defence, and for the attaining the ends expressed in the Covenant and Treaty:—And whereas both kingdoms have thought it necessary that they should be joined in their councils as well as in their forces, and in pursuance thereof the Convention of the Estates in Scotland have appointed Committees residing in Scotland and in the Scots army, and have sent some of the said committees as commissioners for the purposes aforesaid, to repair unto, and to reside near, the parliament; who, since their arrival, have presented their commission and powers, with their earnest desire that the parliament would lay down some speedy and constant way of communicating the desires, and joining the councils of both kingdoms in pursuance of the Covenant, Treaty, and common interests of his majesty's dominions:—In consideration hereof the lords and commons do nominate, ordain, and appoint Algernon earl of Northumberland, Robert e. of Essex lord-general, Robert e. of Warwick lord-admiral, Edward e. of Manchester, William viscount Say and Sele, Philip lord Wharton, John lord Roberts, hon. Wm. Pierpoint, sir H. Vane, sen. sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Waller, sir Gilbert Gerrard, sir Wm. Arnyn, sir A. Haslerig, sir H. Vane, jun. John Crew, Rob. Wallop, esqrs. Oliver St John, esq. solicitor-general, OLIVER CROMWELL, Samuel Brown, and John Glynn, esqrs. or any six of them, whereof one lord and two commoners, to treat with the committees and commissioners appointed by our brethren of Scotland, in such things as shall by them be propounded, from and in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, for the ends aforesaid; as likewise to propound to the committees and commissioners of Scotland, whatever they shall receive in charge from both houses; and from time to time to advise and consult concerning the same, and report the results to both houses.—And further power and authority is hereby given to them or any six of them, whereof one lord and two commoners, as a joint committee with the committees and commissioners of Scotland, to advise, consult, order, and direct, concerning the carrying on and managing of the war for the best advantage of the three kingdoms, and the keeping a good intelligence between the three kingdoms, their forces, committees, and councils; and likewise with power to hold good correspondency and intelligence with foreign states; and further to advise and consult of all things in pursuance of the ends expressed in the Covenant and Treaty. Provided always, That nothing in this Ordinance shall authorize the committee hereby appointed to advise, treat, or consult concerning any Cessation of Arms, or making Peace, without express directions from both houses of parliament. And, lastly, the said committee are to observe such orders and directions as they, from time to time, shall receive from both houses. Provided also, That this Ordinance shall continue for three months and no longer."

The Lords reject an Oath of Secrecy, proposed by the Commons to be taken by the Joint Commissioners.] Soon after this the commons sent up the form of an Oath for Secrecy, to be taken by these joint commissioners; which, upon consideration, was rejected by the lords, and that for these Reasons: 1. "The members of both houses, named for the committee, are of such unquestionable integrity, as there can be no doubt of their discharge of the duty intrusted to them by the Ordinance, without any Oath to bind them to secrecy therein. 2. That the members of both houses have an equal liberty to offer their reasons in all debates at their committees, though the vote be only theirs that are appointed thereto. 3. This Oath doth deprive the house of peers of a power to call for an account of their own members in the service intrusted with them by the Ordinance, without the consent of the house of commons. 4. That this Oath is inconsistent with the privilege of parliament, as debarring the members of both houses from coming to the knowledge of those things that concern the safety of the kingdom; and more especially to be insisted on in these times, when the counsel and advice of the parliament is so necessary upon all occurrences, to prevent the mischiefs that threaten us on all sides, every particular man's fortune being now all at stake; and therefore no reason the peers, who are in so high a manner engaged and concerned both for themselves and posterity, should preclude themselves from all knowledge of the condition of the affairs of the kingdom, but must be implicitly led by the conduct of a few chosen for this service. 5. That it is derogatory to the honour of parliament, being never used before, and of ill consequence to future times; when the parliament, the great council of the kingdom, chosen and intrusted to debate de arduis regni, carries with it the dignity of being composed of persons qualified for that purpose with secrecy and fidelity; that now, in distrust of that body, as unfit for the work to which it is called, some very few must be chosen to be engaged and bound up by an Oath of Secrecy thereunto."

March 5. The lord-general acquainted the lords, That a trumpeter brought him a Letter from the earl of Forth, in which was inclosed another signed Charles R. directed to the lords and commons of parliament assembled at Westminster: and because this was an unusual direction to the parliament, the house ordered to send to the commons to desire that the former committee appointed to open letters might meet presently, and consider what was to be done about it. The result of which was,

That the king's Letter was read the next day in the house of lords, with the opinion of the committees of both houses, and that of the Scots committee, concerning it; on the basis of all which was framed the Answer already given in the former proceedings of the Convention at Oxford, (p. 221). Great care was also taken, that no copies of this Answer should be given, nor any mention made of it without doors, until they were sure it was come to the king's hands.

Mr. Whitlocke's Speech in favour of Propositions for Peace.] March 15. A Treaty of Peace being spoke of in the house of commons, some of the members seemed averse to any Propositions at all; others differing from the manner proposed, at the same time, by the lords for that purpose:

Mr. Whitlocke tells us, that one, meaning himself, spoke to this effect: "Mr. Speaker; It would be no wonder to see an unanimous concurrence of the whole house in furthering Propositions for a good peace. The calamities of our distractions have brought us to it; and who is there amongst us that hath not, in some measure, felt the strokes of them; I am sure, sir, I have smarted by them. We may say here, but, I hope, never with the like application, what Tacitus said of the Romans, Omnia discordiis civilibus fessa. The land is weary of our discords, being thereby polluted with our blood. God hath given you great successes in many places against our enemies, and sometimes he is pleased to give our enemies successes against us; in all of them, whether of the one or the other party, the poor English are still sufferers. Whose goods, I pray, sir, are plundered? Whose houses are burnt? Whose limbs are cut off or shot off? Whose persons are thrown into loathsome dungeons? Whose blood stains the walls of our towns, and defiles our land? Is it not all English? And is it not then time for us who are all Englishmen, to be weary of these discords, and to use our utmost endeavours to put an end to them? I know, sir, you are all here of the same opinion with me in this point; and that it was an unhappy mistake of those who told us, in the beginning of our warfare, 'That it would be only to shew ourselves in the field with a few forces, and then all would be presently ended.' We have found it otherwise; let us now again seek to recover these blessings of Peace, whereof we are told, that 'nihil tam popolare quam Pax,' That nothing is than Peace more gracious to be heard of, more pleasing to be desired, and more profitable to be enjoyed. I am sorry we have so much and so sad experience, as well as other arguments, to convince us of this truth. You think it best to refer it to the committee of both kingdoms, and you cannot find more able and faithful men to trust in this business. The lords think fit that another committee be named, to whom this may be referred. Whilst we differ upon the committee, we lose the business, and do not pursue Peace. I am persuaded, sir, you can hardly name a committee, either within or without these walls, but would be ready to take pains to effect this good work. Unless it were those who have said, 'That if this war be well managed it may last 20 years:' but those were not Englishmen. And although we have Irish, French, Dutch, and Walloons, as well as other Papists, engaged for the settlement of the Protestant religion and laws of England, yet I am persuaded that his majesty and you mutually endeavouring, as it is both your interests, none can hinder it. It is true, That these foreigners help to open the veins wider, but a Peace will rid us of them, and stop the issue of blood; but if it bleed on still, we must faint, and perhaps become a prey to foreigners.—Sir, I humbly move that we may endeavour, without more loss of time, to satisfy the lords with reasons, that it is fittest to have this matter referred to the committee of both kingdoms. Yet, if their lordships shall not be satisfied herein, let us consent to name another committee, rather than to suffer so desirable a business to be protracted. Let us consent to any thing that is just, reasonable, and honourable, rather than in the least to neglect to seek Peace, and to ensue it."

The weight of these and similar arguments, turned the scale; for the peaceable side prevailed so much, that the house appointed a committee to draw up Propositions: and, at the same time, a Message was sent up, to desire a conference, touching the settling a just and safe Peace. The lords returned for Answer, That they would give a present conference in the Painted-Chamber. After which was ended, the Speaker of the house of lords reported the effect of it:—"That Mr. Tate, a member of the commons, delivered a Declaration and Vote, to which they desired the lords concurrence: 'That whereas there had been many endeavours from Oxford, by Declarations, Messages, and otherwise, to raise a belief in the people, and in foreign parts, that they were inclined to Peace, and the parliament averse to it: notwithstanding the several means and addresses to the parliament, for that purpose, had been such as in the end proved clearly to hinder and obstruct it: the house of commons taking this into consideration, and that the parliament had always endeavoured to gain a firm and just Peace; they do now think fit, of themselves, further to prosecute the same; finding the commissioners of Scotland have instructions to join with them, to consider and prepare such grounds, as, by mutual advice and consent of both kingdoms, may bring all his majesty's dominions to a happy and safe Peace: for which purpose they had passed this vote: That it be referred to the committee of both kingdoms, to consider of and prepare such grounds, for settling a just and safe Peace, as both kingdoms might consent unto and prosecute, and to present them to both houses. Likewise, That they had referred it to the committee of both kingdoms, that so the advice and counsel of the commissioners of Scotland might be had therein,"—After the reading of this Vote, the lords fell into a debate about it; and after some time, the Vote being again read, on the question, it passed in the negative; and the house appointed a committee of 9 lords to draw up Reasons why this house doth not agree with the commons in this Vote: as also to consider of and prepare some grounds for settling a just and safe Peace, and to advise with the commissioners of Scotland about the same.

The Dutch Ambassadors offer their Mediation.] March 20. Before these Reasons to satisfy the commons, about rejecting their last Vote, were delivered, the lords received a Paper which came from the States Ambassadors, which was read, in hæc verba:

To Monsieur the Baron GREY of Warke, Speaker, to be communicated to the Lords of the Parliament, this 14th of March, 1643.

"Sir, It is almost two years since our lords, the States General of the United Provinces of the Low Countries, having, with much displeasure, understood the distractions of these kingdoms, had ordained us, their Ambassadors, to go and present their interposition; thereby if it could be done, to mediate an accommodation betwixt the king and his parliament. The hopes that our lords conceived that these affairs might, of themselves, turn from ill to better, made them to delay our sending; but fearing the mischance should here come to a full measure and burst out into an open war, our said lords have been induced to return to their former care; and have sent us, presently, into this kingdom to propound an Accommodation, and to add to the same our interposition.—The king hath so much yielded to our offer, that his majesty hath declared he liked well of our interposition, and accepted the same and an overture of a Treaty; and we do not doubt (if the thrice honourable and noble lords of the parliament, for reasons that concern the conservation of the true religion, the good of the king and these kingdoms, and of so many millions of people, which, otherways, are or shall be exposed to all hazards of a certain ruin, do condescend to a conference and treaty of Peace, to which we will present our interposition and mediation, if it should be liked) but that the God of peace and concord will, within a little while, grant a good and happy issue to these bloody troubles and miseries. Which to attain we will not spare our sincere and most affectionate endeavours according to our Instructions, and such as may be expected from a state in friendship, and from those who, in the common profession of the true religion, and in interests being so nearly joined, will esteem both the good and evil of this state to be unto us the most sensible and inseparable."

This Paper being read, it was referred to the consideration of the committee of both kingdoms, it being a thing of great importance; as, also, to the committee of 9 lords lately appointed. The same day the aforesaid committee presented to the house the Reasons to, be offered to the commons, why they dissented from their last Vote about Peace; which were read and approved of.

The King brings over Troops from Ireland.]

The war had been carried on, all this last winter, with various success on both sides; towns, castles, garrisons, and fortified places, had been taken and retaken in all parts of the kingdom; and, as related by Whitlocke and other Annalists of these times, rather to the advantage of the parliament. The Scots army had advanced so far as to possess themselves of Durham and Sunderland, and to lay siege to Newcastle; against whom the marquis of Newcastle had marched, from York, with all the Northern forces in the king's service. His majesty, in order to stem this tide, and to make a diversion to the Scots, had called in an army of Irish soldiers, and ordered some of those forces to land in the West of Scotland. These the parliament soon branded with the names of Irish rebels, papists, and cut-throats; and indeed they were never of any great service to the king's cause, being, as Whitlocke writes, "all cut off, some in one place and some in another; and the bringing them over gave his enemies a stronger handle against him."

Ordinance for Fasting one Day a Week, towards supporting the Army.] March 26. In order to provide the better for the necessary armaments, a very uncommon tax was thought on; which was, the contribution of one Meal a Week, within the cities of London and Westminster, and the lines of communication. And a long Ordinance was passed, this day, for that purpose; whereby each housekeeper and his family were obliged to fast once a Week, and pay what he usually spent at such a meal, for the public service.

March 29. The dispute still continued between the two houses, concerning the last Votes about Peace. In one of these days debates, in the house of commons, concerning these Disputes, a short question was put, 'Whether this house should concur with the lords, in nominating a committee to join with one of Nine, by them named to consider of the Papers from the Dutch Ambassadors, &c.' The numbers, on a division, were equal, being 64 for, and 64 against it; but the Speaker, having the casting voice, gave it for the negative. This was the largest division we have observed for a long time.

A Victory gained by sir Wm. Waller near Winchester.] April 1, This day an account was received of a victory which sir Wm. Waller had obtained over the king's forces, near Winchester. On which the lords and commons immediately ordered a day of thanksgiving unto the Lord of Hosts that giveth all victory, for his seasonable and extraordinary blessing, whereby the army, under the command of sir Ralph Hopton, was totally routed, with the loss of very few of the parliament's forces.

The earl of Essex presented to the lords the following Remonstrance:

"My lords; Upon the victory God hath been pleased to give us against sir Ralph Hopton, and the sense I have of my condition, (being general by your favour) that I am not able to prosecute this victory; and that now the speech is general of his majesty's taking the field; and, by reason of the condition which the long delay of recruiting my army and ill payment have brought me to, I am grown the pity of my friends and contempt of my enemies, having as yet no forces to take the field with, I am enforced to make this following Declaration:—That it grieves me exceedingly to see so fair an opportunity lost of prosecuting the advantage which, by God's goodness, we have gotten upon the enemy at this time, because the army is not recruited; so as I am altogether disabled to move, but must sit still and see this opportunity pass from me, I verily believe, of ending the bleeding miseries of this destructive war; whereas now the enemy will have time to recover and repair themselves before I can get into a condition to advance towards them.—I am the more sensible of it, because some may perhaps hereafter be apt enough to lay a blame upon me, if I be not so soon ready to take the field, in regard that now the house of commons hath been pleased to refer unto me the perfecting of the list of the officers; so as it can stick no more any where else, but the recruiting may go on as I think good without any stop or delay.—My lords, my honour calls so fast upon me, that I will not lose a moment of time to expedite the service; but I must beseech you give me leave to take notice of the lateness of this liberty which is herein given me, both in point of time and occasion.—First, for the Time; it was 6 or 7 months after the Ordinance for the recruiting and reforming my Army had been in agitation; the Ordinances for the major-generals of the several associations being all past, which received their beginnings long after mine. And the Occasion is so far lost, that, whereas the army should have been long ago in action, the spring is even past, and no army yet in being; whereby many fair opportunities are slipt of doing service, or at least preventing mischiefs, and we have received that unhappy blow before Newark.—I will be bold to say, if I had an army the enemy durst not have emptied all their quarters here to have sent such forces thither; so as that mischief had been prevented, and Newark might now have been ours; which would have cut off all correspondency and intercourse between Oxford and my lord of Newcastle, and the Scots army would have found the fruits of it. Nor had we set all at stake, and played our rest so lately; for had sir Wm. Balfour and sir Wm. Waller been beaten, what reserve had we to oppose the fury of a conquering enemy? What interposition between the devouring sword and the parliament and city; nay, the being of religion and all the happiness both of present and future times? Truly I tremble to think how near we were to the very precipice of destruction; and you must pardon my expressions; I speak it not with the least reflection upon the proceedings of either house; I reverence them, I submit unto them but the duty of my place, and of that trust you have reposed in me, require it at my hands. You see what our weakness is, it hath given occasion to the enemy to enlarge his quarters, watch his advantages, scour from the West to North, cross all our enterprizes; Newark is taken, Lincolnshire is lost, Gloucester is unsupplied; and the last week there was but a step between us and death, or, what is worse, slavery?—And I observe the seas have been, and still are, open to them out of Ireland as they please; and I fear we shall have all the bloody rebels come to exercise their barbarous, and heretofore unheard-of, cruelties in this miserable kingdom. My lord admiral is best able to discover where the fault hath been; the houses are the only judges from whence come all these obstructions by sea and land.—For my part, I first engaged myself in this cause, and undertook this service, with an honest and single heart, without any particular end of my own, but merely to serve my country, and defend religion and liberty; in which cause both houses of parliament, and the good party of the whole kingdom, have solemnly protested to live and die with me, which have kept up my spirits all this while, and would not suffer me to lay down my commission, notwithstanding all my discouragements: as I am not conscious to myself of giving the least offence to any, unless it were for executing my place as general, in that which my conscience told me was my duty; so shall I be ready still to prosecute it with the utmost of my endeavours, and desire no longer to live than I shall be faithful in it. And though you have been pleased to reduce my army to 7500 foot and 3000 horse, when my lord of Manchester is allowed an army of 14,000, and receives 34,000*l.* a month for the pay of it; yet, since it is done by you, I submit; and with them, or a lesser number, if it be your pleasure, I will, as I have several times already, adventure my life for the service of this cause.—And, therefore, have I at present opened myself in this manner unto your lordships, desiring something may be done to make use of this prize which God hath put into our hands, that it be not altogether made fruitless unto us; and the best way, I think, will be to acquaint the city of London with it; (which, under God, hath had so great a share in the preservation of this parliament, hath so gallantly stood by us in all our difficulties, and so cordially and freely exposed itself for the advancement of all good and honourable designs in promoting of the public service) and desire them to be helpful unto me in the speedy recruiting of my army.—And, haply, if now they would be persuaded to send out a considerable force, to join with all such as we shall draw forth out of the South parts of the kingdom, before the enemy can rally, we might, through God's blessing, so well husband the present occasion, as might give us fair hopes to set an end to all our sufferings, and see our endeavours crowned with a happy and a glorious Peace. I confess I cannot tell how to desire this of them with such importunities as otherwise I would, because they have done so much already in this kind, and have so often testified their affections both to the cause and to myself in particular, with great expence both of their treasure and blood; but if they will do it, I shall most chearfully engage myself, my life and fortune with them; and to this end I desire a committee of this house, if your lordships please, which, with such as the house of commons shall think fit to join with them, may go into the city to move them to this purpose."

After the reading of this Remonstrance, the lords thought fit to name a committee of that house, to join with one from the commons, to go to the city, and desire their best assistance in recruiting the lord-general's Army speedily; and to send out some forces before the king's army grew stronger.

Answer to the Dutch Ambassadors Offer of Mediation.] This day also the lord-general informed the lords, That the States Ambassadors were yesterday with him, and expressed how long they had been here, and received no Answer yet to their Paper which they had delivered to parliament: That they further desired a pass from him to go to Oxford, to take their leave of the king, that so they might go into their own country; but that he had forbore giving them a pass until he had acquainted the house with it. Upon this, the lords sent immediately to desire a conference with the other house about it, the report of which was, "That the commons had considered of an Answer to them, and desired their lordships concurrence in it. This was read and agreed to in these words: "That the lords and commons will always, with due respect, acknowledge such good affections, as from the lords the States General of the United Provinces of the Low Countries, shall at any time be expressed to the king and this kingdom: professing they desire nothing more than such a Peace as may as well procure honour and happiness to the king, as the preservation of the true reformed religion, the privileges of parliament, and the liberties of his subjects in his majesty's three kingdom, according to their late Solemn League and Covenant: and when they shall, from and in the name of the said lords, the States General, propose any thing to the lords and commons in parliament, they will do thereupon what shall be fit."

The Scots Commissioners delivered in a Remonstrance, requiring a speedy supply of Money to support their Army in Ireland; with sad complaints of their miseries for want of it; and, in some measure, threatening worse consequences than advancing of monies, unless, as they said, timously prevented.

A Committee of both Houses go to the City, to solicit a Supply for the Army.] April 9. This being the day appointed for a general Thanksgiving for the late victory, the same was held with the usual solemnity of the times. Towards the evening a Common Hall was held in the city, to which repaired several lords and commoners. The earls of Warwick, Essex, and Pembroke, together with sir H. Vane, Mr. Denzil Hollis, and Mr. Glynne, in set speeches, related the circumstances of the above-mentioned victory to the citizens, in order to encourage them to do their utmost, at this critical conjuncture.

Resolutions for Supplies to be raised for the Scots Army in England and Ireland.] April 12. The Speaker of the house of lords reported the effect of a conference; which, with the subsequent Resolutions, we give from their Journals:—"That the house of commons having received intelligence of the great wants of the Scots Army in Ireland, whereby three regiments have been enforced to come away: Upon this the commons referred the consideration of the same to the committee of both kingdoms; who, having considered thereof, made the report of their opinion to that house, who do now communicate the same to their lordships, and desire their speedy concurrence therein. The Votes of the commons were read as follows: 1. Resolved, upon the question, "That effectual course be taken for the due and speedy collection of the sequestrations appointed by both houses for the payment of the 60,000*l.* to the Scots Army in Ireland; and that this be recommended, in an especial manner, to the committee for taking the Accounts of the kingdom. 2. That, to enable the speedy raising of a considerable sum of money for the supply of the Scots Army in England and Ireland, an Ordinance be passed by both houses to the same effect as formerly, to levy, by way of assessment, 66,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* being a third part of the 200,000*l.* appointed by both houses for the purposes aforesaid to our Brethren of Scotland, for which the public faith of both kingdoms is engaged. 3. That, as another means for the raising of monies for the affairs of Ireland, the bill presented by both houses to his majesty, for compelling the Adventurers to pay the monies due by their subscription upon the acts of parliament for that purpose, be turned into an Ordinance of parliament. 4. That, out of the Ways and Means above-mentioned, or otherwise, or by the credit thereof, the sum of 30,000*l.* by the 15th of May next coming, be shipped from hence for Carrickfergus, upon which the said Army may depend; and that the remainder of the said 60,000*l.* be shipped away by the last of June next: and it is referred to the committee at Goldsmiths-hall to consider of the means of raising these monies, and to offer to the house the probablest way of bringing them in; and to take care, with the treasurers of the sequestrations, that the Sequestration Monies may not be diverted to any other use, upon any other pretence whatsoever. 5. That for the future maintenance of the Scots and British forces in Ireland, a settled course be established by Ordinance of parliament, or otherwise, towards the monthly pay of the Scots forces the sum of 4000*l.* and also of 4000*l.* monthly to be paid to the British forces; which sums of money to be paid to the British and Scots forces, shall be paid to the hands of treasurers nominated for that purpose by the joint advice of both kingdoms, or their committees authorized in that behalf, and to be issued forth according to their advice; and that the surplusage due to the said Scots forces, according to the Treaty, over and above the said 4000*l.* monthly provided, shall be secured to them upon the public faith: that whatever provisions of victuals or monies shall be raised or collected within the States of the United Provinces, by way of Benevolence, or otherwise, for the relief or maintenance of the said British and Scots forces, may be consigned to persons nominated for that purpose by the joint advice of both kingdoms, or their committees authorized in that behalf, and to be issued forth according to the instructions that shall be given by their advice. 6. That the earl of Leven, lord-general of the Scots forces in Ireland (being now, by the Votes of both houses, agreed to be Commander in Chief over all the forces, as well British as Scots, according to the 4th article of the Result of the committees of both kingdoms, passed both houses) be desired, with all convenient speed, by advice of the said committees, to appoint and nominate a commander in chief under his excellency over the said forces, to reside with them upon the place. 7. That committees be nominated and appointed, by the joint advice of both kingdoms, of such numbers and quality as shall be by them agreed on, to be sent with all convenient speed to reside with the said forces, and enabled with full and ample instructions, by the joint advice of both kingdoms, for the regulation of the said forces, and the better carrying on of that war. 8. That when the houses shall understand, from the committees that shall be sent into Ireland by advice of both kingdoms, the state of the forces there, they will then take into consideration the augmentation of the sums for the monthly pay, as occasion shall be, and as the necessities of this kingdom will permit." These Resolutions were agreed to by the lords.

The Ordinance for Peace, at last, agreed to.] April 16. The commons at a conference proposed to the lords some Alterations they had made in the Ordinance for Peace; which, being read, were agreed to by them, and then the Ordinance was to this effect:

"Be it ordained by the lords and commons, assembled in parliament, That the committee of both houses, as a joint committee with the commissioners and committee of Scotland, be hereby enabled to prepare Propositions for a safe and well-grounded Peace: the same to be presented to both houses of parliament, and to the Convention of the States of Scotland, or their committee: and are to be brought into one or both houses on Friday come sevensnight, the 26th of April, 1644, or sooner if it may be, sitting the houses; to be there reviewed and considered of; and then, by the mutual advice and consent of both kingdoms, to be perfected. Provided always, That the power given unto the said committee by this Ordinance, shall continue no longer than during the time herein limited for bringing in the said Propositions." To this the lords added, "That the said committee should sit but 3 days in the week, for their better attendance on other public business."

April 17. A Letter from sir Thomas Fairfax, in the North, was read in the house of lords, concerning a great Victory he had gained over the king's forces at Selby. Amongst the prisoners taken at this battle, were colonel John Bellasis, governor of York, and sir John Ramsden. These two gentlemen, being members of the house of commons, were sent up prisoners to London, and were afterwards ordered to be brought to the bar of that house. On their appearance the Speaker harangued them on the horror and grievousness of their offence; which, he said, "was no less than, at one blow, to endeavour the ruin of religion, the liberty, privileges, and the very being of parliaments, and to introduce popery and slavery; the consideration whereof should strike terror and amazement into them." He added, "That, for these grievous crimes of high treason, they were, by the judgment of that house, committed, as traitors, to the Tower, there to remain during pleasure." This stood as a precedent for every member taken prisoner afterwards.

The King's Proclamation for bringing in Provisions for his Garrison at Oxford.] April 22. About this time the king published a Proclamation, for the better Maintenance of his Garrison at Oxford; which being read this day, in the house of lords, the parliament passed the following censure upon it: they were as follows; but first the Proclamation.

"Whereas, by our Proclamation of the 29th of March now last past, we invited our loving subjects of Oxford and Berks, and other counties adjacent, who are owners of corn and grain and other victuals, in a greater proportion than is necessary for their own private families, that, for their own benefit, to secure the same against the sudden incursion and violence of the rebels, and for the better furnishing our Garrison at Oxford against a time of need, they should speedily bring the same into this city, and there store it up in such places as themselves should provide; or as we, in our care, by our commissioners, to whom they are to resort, have there provided for them; where the owners thereof, by themselves, or such as they shall nominate and trust, should keep the same; and from thence, as the true owners thereof, should issue the same, to furnish the markets from time to time for their best advantage.—Since which time we find that the inhabitants of these places, not being so sensible of their own good as we expected they would have been, have been very negligent in applying themselves to our desires; but do expose themselves, and that part of their estates, to that danger which may fall upon them we know not how soon: we therefore, by the advice of the lords and gentlemen, members of the two houses of parliament, now assembled at Oxford, do admonish all our loving subjects whom it may concern, that within 5 days now next ensuing, at the furthest, for such as live within 7 miles of this city; and, for such as dwell farther off, within 8 days after the date hereof; they bring, or cause to be brought, into this city of Oxford, all such corn of all sorts, ready thrashed or in the straw, and all such other victuals serving for the food of men or horse, which they can spare, here to be stored up by themselves, or sold at and for reasonable prices for ready money: and also that they bring in hither all such hay and straw as they have, and may spare, here to be sold to us and the nobility and gentry here residing, for ready money, at reasonable prices.—And we, by the advice aforesaid, do further let them know, and do hereby declare, That if they fail herein, upon what pretence soever, we shall esteem them as persons disaffected to us and to our service; and as the course of war and the necessity thereof requireth, upon the approach of the rebels, who are enemies to us and them, we must and will, by our own soldiers fetch so much thereof away as we can for the provision of our own army; and the rest consume and destroy by fire, rather than suffer the same to fall as a prey into their hands, who will thereby be the more enabled to annoy us, and our good subjects: of all which we expect a strict performance, and will require a severe account. And all horses, carts and carriages which are employed for this service, shall have free passage in their going and coming, and not be taken for any other service. Given at our Court at Oxford, April 15, 1644."

A Declaration of both Houses thereupon.] The Declaration of Censure passed by both Houses upon the above, was as follows:

A DECLARATION of the LORDS and COMMONS in Parliament, concerning his Majesty's late PROCLAMATION, and the Resolution of both Houses thereupon.

"The lords and commons, assembled in the parliament of England, do observe that the same counsels now predominate at Oxford, which have contrived and effected the destruction of Ireland by fire and sword, do farther labour to bring the like desolation upon this kingdom; and, in pursuance thereof, have dared to publish this unparalleled Paper, in the form of a Proclamation, threatening destruction by fire and sword, under the title of preserving the country: the lords and commons do thereupon declare, That they will use their hearty endeavours, with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, to prevent these miseries, whereof they are most sensible; and have taken order that considerable forces shall speedily advance for the defence and protection of the people, wherein they desire the assistance of their countrymen, and humbly pray to God for his blessing."

Propositions for Peace, as drawn up by the Committees of both Kingdoms.] Towards the latter end of this month the Commissioners of both kingdoms brought in a draught of their Propositions for Peace, which were read, and ordered to be debated by the lords at another time; viz.

PROPOSITIONS prepared by the Committees of both Kingdoms for a safe and well-grounded PEACE, to be presented to both Houses of the Parliament of England and the Convention of the Estates of Scotland, or their Committees, to be by them reviewed and considered, and then, by the mutual Advice and Consent of both Kingdoms, to be perfected.

"I. That, by an act of parliament in each kingdom respectively, all Oaths, Declarations, and Proclamations against both houses of the parliament of England, the late Convention of the Estates of Scotland, or their Ordinances and proceedings, or against any for adhering to them, be annulled, suppressed, and forbidden in all his majesty's dominions. II. That an act of parliament be passed in both kingdoms respectively, for enjoining the taking the Solemn League and Covenant by all the subjects of the three kingdoms; and the Ordinances concerning the manner of taking the same in both kingdoms be confirmed by acts of parliament respectively, with such penalties as, by the mutual advice of both kingdoms, shall be agreed upon. III. That a bill be passed for the utter Abolition of Episcopacy with such alterations concerning the estates of prelates, as, upon consideration of the Treaty and joint Declaration of both kingdoms, shall be found necessary. IV. That the Ordinance concerning the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines be confirmed by act of parliament. V. That Reformation of Religion, according to the Covenant, be settled by act of parliament, in such manner as both houses shall agree upon, after advice had from the Assembly of Divines: and forasmuch as both kingdoms are mutually obliged, by the same Covenant, to endeavour the nearest conjunction and uniformity in matters of Religion; that such unity and uniformity in religion, according to the Covenant, as, after consultation and advice had from the Divines of both kingdoms, now assembled, shall be jointly agreed upon by both houses of the parliament of England, and by the church and kingdom of Scotland, be confirmed by acts of parliament of both kingdoms. VI. That, for the more effectually disabling Jesuits, Priests, Papists, and Popish Recusants from disturbing the state and eluding the laws; and for the better discovering and speedy conviction of Recusants, an Oath be established by act of parliament, to be administered to them; wherein they shall abjure and renounce the Pope's supremacy, the doctrine of Transubstantiation, Purgatory, worshipping of the consecrated Host, Crucifixes, and Images; and their refusal of the said Oath, being tendered in such manner as shall be appointed by the said act, to be a sufficient conviction, in law, of recusancy. VII. That an act of parliament be passed, for the Education of the children of Papists, by Protestants, in the Protestant Religion. VIII. Another act, for the true levy of the penalties against them; which penalties to be levied and disposed in such manner as both houses shall agree on; wherein to be provided, that his majesty shall have no loss. IX. That an act be prepared, whereby the practices of Papists against the state may be prevented, and the laws against them duly executed; and a stricter course taken to prevent the saying or hearing of mass in the court, or any other part of this kingdom. X. The like for the kingdom of Scotland concerning the four last Propositions, in such manner as the estates of parliament there shall think fit. XI. That the king do give his assent to * Bills and Ordinances, and give assurance of his consenting, in the next parliament of Scotland, to an act ratifying the acts of the Convention of the States of Scotland, called by the Council and Conservators of Peace and assembled in June, 1643, and several times continued since, in such manner, and with such additions and alterations, as the estates convened in parliament shall think convenient. XII. That an act be passed in the parliament of both kingdoms respectively, for confirmation of the Treaties passed betwixt the two kingdoms, viz. the Large Treaty, the late Treaty for the coming of the Scots army into England and for settling the garrison of Berwick, and the Treaty concerning Ireland, with all other Ordinances and proceedings passed betwixt the two kingdoms, in pursuance of the said Treaty. XIII. That an act of parliament be passed, to make void the Cessation of Ireland, and all Treaties with the Rebels, without consent of both houses; and to settle the prosecution of the war of Ireland in both houses of parliament, to be managed by the joint advice of both kingdoms, according to the Ordinance of the 12th of April last; and the king to assist, and do no act to discountenance or molest them therein. XIV. That an act be passed in the parliaments of both kingdoms respectively, for establishing the joint Declaration of both kingdoms with the qualifications ensuing: 1. That the persons who shall expect no pardon be only these following † 2. All papists and popish recusants who have been, now are, or shall be, actually in arms against the parliament, or voluntarily assisting thereunto. 3. All persons who have had any hand in the plotting and designing the rebellion in Ireland. 4. All Irish rebels, whether papists or others, who have or shall come over from Ireland, and have assisted, or shall assist, in this war against both houses of parliament. 5. That † may be removed from his majesty's councils, and may be restrained from coming within the verge of the court; and that they may not bear any office, or have any employment, concerning the state or common-wealth; and in case any of them shall offend herein, to be guilty of high treason, and incapable of any pardon by his majesty; and their estates to be disposed of as both houses of parliament in England, or the Estates of Parliament in Scotland, respectively, shall think fit. 6. What course shall be taken with such as not only have deserted the parliament, but have voted both kingdoms traitors. 7. The persons of all others to be free, notwithstanding any act or thing done in or concerning this war, they taking the Covenant. 8. The estates of the persons excepted, to pay the public debts and damages. 9. The estates of prelates to be disposed according to the fifth article of the late Treaty of both kingdoms. 10. A third part, upon full value, of the estates of the persons made incapable as aforesaid, to be employed for the payment of the public debts and damages, according to the Declaration. 11. A tenth part of the estates of all other delinquents within the Declaration: and in case the estates and proportions aforesaid shall not suffice for the payment of the public engagements, whereunto they are only to be employed, that then a new proportion may be appointed by the joint advice of both kingdoms; provided it exceed not one moiety of the estates of the persons made incapable as aforesaid; and that it exceed not the sixth part of the estates of other delinquents. 12. That the persons and estates of all common soldiers and others, who, in lands and goods, be not worth 200*l.* be at liberty, and be discharged. 13. That an act be prepared, whereby the debts of the kingdom, the persons of delinquents, and the value of their estates may be known; which act shall appoint in what manner the confiscations and proportions before-mentioned may be levied, and applied to the discharge of the said engagements. XV. That a bill be prepared, whereby the subjects of the kingdom of England may be appointed to be armed, trained and disciplined. The like for Scotland, in such manner as the estates of parliament there shall think fit. XVI. That a bill may be prepared for the settling the admiralty and forces at sea, and of the sea duties, and of the impositions of Tonnage and Poundage for the maintaining the said sea forces; the residue to be settled in the crown. The like for Scotland in such manner as the estates of parliament there shall think fit. XVII. An act for the settling of all Forces, by sea and land, in commissioners, to be nominated by both

* who shall be removed or altered, from time to time, as both houses shall think fit; and when any shall die, others shall be nominated in their places by the said houses; which commissioners shall have power, 1. To suppress any Forces raised without authority of both houses of parliament, or, in the intervals of parliament, without consent of the said commissioners, and to suppress any foreign forces that shall invade this kingdom; and that it shall be high treason in any who shall levy any force, without such authority and consent, any commission under the Great Seal, or any warrant to the contrary notwithstanding; and they to be incapable of any pardon from his majesty, and their estates to be disposed of as both houses shall think fit. 2. To preserve the Peace now to be settled, and to prevent all disturbances that may arise by occasion of the late troubles, and to inquire by jury, and to hear and determine all violation of the articles among the subjects of the kingdom of England. So for the kingdom of Scotland. 3. To have power to send part of themselves, so as they exceed not a third part, or be not under the number of, to reside in Scotland; to assist and vote as single persons with the commissioners of Scotland, in those matters wherein the kingdom of Scotland is only concerned. So for Scotland. 4. That the commissioners of both kingdoms may meet, as a joint committee, as they shall see cause, or send part of themselves as aforesaid to do as follows: 1. To preserve the peace betwixt the king and kingdom. 2. To prevent the violation of the Articles of Peace as aforesaid, or any troubles arising in the kingdoms; to hear and determine all differences that may occasion the same, according to the Treaty; and to do farther according as they shall respectively receive instructions from both houses of parliament in England, or the estates of parliament in Scotland; and, in the intervals of parliament, from the commissioners. 3. To raise and join the forces of both kingdoms to resist all foreign invasion, and to suppress any forces raised within any of the kingdoms by any authority under the Great Seal or other warrant whatsoever, without consent of both houses of parliament in England, and the estates of the parliament in Scotland, or the said commissioners of that kingdom, whereof they are subjects; and that in those cases of joint concernment to both kingdoms, the commissioners to be directed to be all there, or such part as aforesaid, to act and direct as joint commissioners of both kingdoms. 4. To order the war of Ireland according to the Ordinance of the 12th of April, and to order the Militia, and to conserve the peace of the kingdom of Ireland. XVIII. That his majesty give his consent to what the two kingdoms shall agree upon, in prosecution of the Articles of the Large Treaty, which are not yet finished. XIX. That an act be passed, that all peers made since the day of , and who shall be hereafter made, shall not sit or vote in the parliament of England, without consent of both houses of parliament. So for Scotland. XX. That an act be passed that the lord-keeper, lord-treasurer, lord-deputy of Ireland, judges of both benches, of the Exchequer, and Wales, be nominated by both houses, to continue quamdiu se bene gesserint; and, in intervals of parliament, by the afore-mentioned commissioners, to be approved or disallowed by both houses at their next sitting. The like for Scotland, in such manner as the estates of Parliament there shall think fit. XXI. A proposition for the Education and marriage of the king's children. XXII. A proposition for uniting the protestant princes against the papists, and concerning the restitution of the Prince Elector. XXIII. A proposition concerning foreign negotiations, and concluding peace and war with foreign princes and states. XXIV. To report the desire of this committee, that some members of both houses may be sent unto the lord mayor, court of aldermen, and common-council, to acquaint them that the houses are preparing Propositions for a safe and well-grounded Peace; and that both houses will be ready to take into consideration such Propositions, as they shall present, in behalf of the city of London. The like for the city of Edinburgh, to be sent to the Convention of Estates of Scotland or their commissioners. XXV. An act of Oblivion, with exceptions relative to the qualifications in the Proposition as aforesaid, for the joint Declaration, and what exceptions the king shall think fit. The like for Scotland. XXVI. A proposition for disbanding the armies. That consideration be had of the preamble and conclusion, and what shall be promissory, in them, to the king from both kingdoms. Signed in the name, and by the warrant, of the Committee of both kingdoms, P. WHARTON. Jo. MAITLAND."

The parliament were now busily employed in settling the different commands of their two generals, Essex and Manchester; and, indeed, the whole transactions, in the Journals of the house of commons at this time, seem more properly to bespeak a council of war than an English parliament.

An Ordinance, for further continuing the Joint Committee, passed by the Lords; but rejected by the Commons.] May 6. The limited time of three months, appointed by the Ordinance of Feb. 16, for the continuance of the Joint Committee of both kingdoms, being now near expiring. Another Ordinance, for their further continuance, was read in the house of lords, of their own framing, because the last, concerning Propositions for Peace, had occasioned such disputes between the two houses; which, being read, passed that house, and was ordered to be sent down to the commons: and because divers named in the former were absent, and likely to be so, about the great and necessary employments of the commonwealth, therefore this Ordinance appointed a new committee, of English lords and gentlemen, to join with the Scots, for the better managing of the affairs of both nations; to continue 3 months, from the expiration of the last commission, and no longer.—But we find that this Ordinance was likely to create as much dispute as the other; for, on the same day that the lords read and passed it, the commons rejected it, on a division, 82 against 69; and sent up another Ordinance of their own framing, for enlarging the time of the commission; which being read thrice in the lords, and put to the vote, was carried in the negative; notwithstanding the commons sent up a message with their Ordinance, "That it was a thing of such consequence for carrying on the great affairs of the kingdom with prudence and secrecy, that religion and all was at stake without it."—The Reasons, pro and con, between the two houses, relative to this and other disputes, are left on record in their Journals, but are too long and tedious for our purpose.

The Parliament's Letter to the Lord-General Essex, on a Report of the King's coming to London.] May 15. The commons sent up to the lords for their concurrence to the following form of a Letter to the lord-general:

"My lord; There being here a general report of his majesty's coming to London, we, by command of the houses, desire your lordship to use your best endeavours to find the grounds of it. And if, at any time, you shall understand that his majesty intends to repair hither, or to your army, that you presently acquaint the houses, and do nothing therein without their advice."—The lords agreed to the Letter, and ordered it to be sent to the lord-general.

This day the lords ordered the lieutenant of the Tower to deliver to the officers of the king's standing wardrobe, the Suit of Tapestry Hangings, with the Story of the Spanish Invasion in 1538, to be hung up in the lords house of parliament, where they have ever since continued a great ornament.

The Lord General's Answer.] May 17. The Speaker of the house of lords acquainted that house with a Letter from the lord-general, directed to him:

"My lord; How the general report is come of his majesty's coming to London, is utterly unknown to me. I shall not fail, with my best endeavours, to find the grounds of it; but London is the likeliest place to know it, here being no speech of it in this army. As soon as I shall have any notice of his intention of repairing to the parliament or the army, I shall not fail to give notice of it. And, as I am their servant, shall be ready, at all times, to obey their directions. For the business itself, of the king's coming to the parliament or to the army, I cannot conceive there is any ground for it; but however, I believe I shall be the last that shall hear of it. Your humble Servant, ESSEX. May 16, 1644. Upon the March."

The Ordinance for continuing the Joint Committee passed at length, by both Houses.] May 23. The lords sent a Message to the commons, informing them, That they did concur with them in the Ordinance, for continuing the Joint Committee, which they had carried in their house, on a division of 95 against 53. Upon which all differences about this affair were seemingly dropped; and the following is entered in both Journals, as a compromise of the whole dispute:

"Whereas by the Covenant and Treaty, ratified and established between the two kingdoms, both nations are engaged in one common cause against the enemies of their religion and liberties; and by the late entrance of the Scots forces into this kingdom, in pursuance hereof, are firmly united in a joint posture of arms, for their own necessary defence, and for maintaining of the ends expressed in the Covenant: and forasmuch as nothing can be more advantageous nor conducive to the purpose aforesaid, than that the conduct of the affairs of both kingdoms, in prosecution of the ends before-mentioned, be managed by the joint advice and direction of both nations, or their committees, authorized in that behalf; that so not only the counsels, resolutions, and forces of both kingdoms, may be, to the utmost improved to the common good, and a right intelligence, and firmer unity, held and preserved between and within themselves; but also that a good correspondency may be set on foot and maintained abroad, with other states in a joint way, to countermine the wicked confederacies and designs of the Popish and Antichristian faction, in all parts, against the true Protestant Reformed Religion, and the welfare of his majesty's three kingdoms: and whereas the Convention of the Estates of Scotland have appointed committees residing in Scotland, and in the Scots army; and have sent some of the said committees as commissioners for the purposes aforesaid, to repair unto, and reside near, the two houses; whereof some are already in this city. In consideration hereof the lords and commons, assembled in parliament, do nominate, ordain and appoint, Algernon e. of Northumberland, Robert e. of Essex lord-general, Robert e. of Warwick lord-admiral, Edward e. of Manchester, Wm. viscount Say and Sele, Philip lord Wharton, John lord Roberts, hon. Wm. Pierpoint, Sir Henry Vane, sen. sir Philip Stapylton, sir Wm. Waller, sir Gilbert Gerard, sir Wm. Armin, sir Arthur Haslerig, sir H. Vane, jun. John Crew, Robert Wallop, Oliver St. John Solicitor-general, Oliver Cromwell, Samuel Browne, John Glynne, recorder, or any 3 of them, (whereof a member of each house to be present) to treat with the committees and commissioners appointed by our Brethren of Scotland, in such things as shall by them be propounded from, and in the name of, the kingdom of Scotland, for the ends aforesaid; and, from time to time, to advise and consult with them concerning the same. And do further give full power unto the members of both houses above-named, and unto John earl of Loudon lord high chancellor of Scotland, John lord Maitland, sir Archibald Johnston of Warriston, and Mr. Robert Barclay, or any 7 of them, (whereof a member of each house to be present) as a committee, to order and direct whatsoever doth or may concern the managing of the war, keeping good intelligence between the forces of the 3 kingdoms, and whatsoever may concern the peace of his majesty's dominions, and all other things, in pursuance of the ends expressed in the said Covenant and Treaty: and the committees of both houses are to observe such orders as they shall, from time to time, receive from both houses."

A Committee of Ways and Means, for maintaining the Parliament's Armies.] May 27. To support the vast expence that must naturally accrue from keeping four Armies on foot, the commons this day, appointed a committee to consider of all Ways and Means for raising of Monies; either by securities of companies, or other particular persons beyond seas; or by mortgaging of any lands, or by putting to sale sequestered estates; or any other way they could think of, and report the same to the house.

Vote of both Houses for the March of 10,000 Scots to reduce Newcastle.] June 22. A Message was brought from the commons, to let the lords know, That they were informed of the great pressures, which the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, suffered under the enemy. And that, considering the Scots Army was then engaged before York, and the great inconvenience which would come to the city of London, and the Southern parts, for want of fuel, if some speedy course was not taken to reduce the town of Newcastle to the obedience of the parliament: for preventing these things, he said, The commons had passed a Vote, wherein they desired their lordships concurrence, viz. "That the Forces already raised, and now raising, in Scotland, being as is reported, about 10,000, be invited forthwith to come in for our assistance." To which Vote the lords agreed.

Letter from the E. of Essex setting forth the State of Affairs in the West.] Things beginning now to grow critical in the West of England, as well as the North, the parliament had their eyes also upon those parts. Sir Wm. Waller and his army had been ordered from thence, to serve elsewhere; and the earl of Essex, with his forces, were commanded to march there, for reducing those counties to the obedience of parliament. This day, the following Letter from their general, directed to the Speakers of both houses, was read to the lords, as follows:

“Right Honourable; I have received a Letter, dated the 10th of June, signed by the lord Grey of Warke and by the Speaker of the house of commons, in which the houses of parliament do direct that such a considerable party of horse should be sent to Lyme, as might raise the siege; and, that siege being raised, to join with those of Lyme, in pursuit of the enemy: and it appears by the same Letter, that both houses expect that the pursuit shall be effectually continued, for the frustrating of the enemy's settling of an Excise, and raising of men and monies in those Western parts. I desire to satisfy the expectation and fulfil the desires of both houses of parliament, and therefore to pursue prince Maurice and Hopton with my whole army; for it is impossible that the settling of an Excise, &c. should be wholly frustrated in those Western parts with a less strength than the whole body of my horse and foot, as will appear by the ensuing Reasons: 1. The enemy is gathered together again, stands in a body within 3 miles of Lyme; and no doubt but they have certain intelligence that 4 or 500 men have been drawn off from Lyme since we raised the siege. I hope they do not hear we are designed to make a stand by directions of the Grand Committee, yet have reason to suspect it: because they are so bold as to face the town again, as is signified to me by the governor's Letter. 2. I have sundry troops of horse engaged already for the preservation of that distressed, but deserving town of Lyme; and now there are so many hundred men drawn off from thence, it is impossible the town should be defended, or my engaged troops come off with honour, unless I advance with my whole army. 3. Weymouth, Melcombe Regis, and Sarfoot Castle, being now surrendered into my hands, I must leave some considerable strength behind me to preserve them, and block up the Portland men, or else I may lose Weymouth while I go to relieve Lyme. You see there is work enough for a greater army. 4. I am assured by the lord-admiral, that the Western counties will flock in from all parts to our body, in case I march with my army further West. The Plymouth men will take the field with 2500 foot and horse, and fall upon the rear of the enemy while we charge them in the front. Lastly, It is the unanimous judgment of the Joint Council of War, both by sea and land (called upon this occasion by the lord high admiral and myself) that it will be exceeding prejudicial for me to retreat, or once to make a stand; and that my advance will, in all human reason, by the blessing of Heaven, be effectual for the preserving of Lyme, breaking the enemy's association, and reducing the West.—If, after all my sad consultations, faithful endeavours, and, by God's blessing, happy success, you shall call me back as one that is not fit to be trusted any further in a business of such high concernment, I will come and sit in parliament, as not knowing any military employment worthy of my presence in any associated county which is wholly committed to the care and trust of some inferior commander. I have no more to add, but that though your former directions could not be observed, yet your desires have been fulfilled by your lordships humble servant, Essex.” P. S. My lords, I do forbear to give you an account of the Ordinance, Arms and Ammunition in the towns, because there are discoveries made every hour of more and more; but what is already is very considerable, and I shall shortly give you a particular account.”

This Letter was ordered to be communicated to the commons at a conference; at which it was agreed, by both houses, That, in regard to the Reasons alledged by the lord-general in this Letter, and that he is now so far advanced in the West, as also that the commons had made suitable provision for the pay of his army there; that he should still proceed and follow those advantages he had gained, in order to prevent the associating of those Western counties, the raising of forces, and the levying of money in those parts, for the king's service.

Mr. Whitlocke remarks, “That it was thought strange, at that time, that the committee of both kingdoms should, at that distance, take upon them to give particular orders for the services and march of their armies, and not rather leave it to the chief commanders that were upon the place; who, upon every motion of the enemy, might see cause to alter their counsels. This, he adds, increased the jealousies and peaks between the lord-general and Waller, both gallant men; but the general thought himself undervalued and Waller too much exalted. Nor did there want pick-thanks to blow up those coals of jealousy, and this proved unhappy to the parliament's affairs afterwards.”

Another Letter from the E. of Essex, for a Supply of Money, Ammunition, &c.] June 27. Another Letter from the lord-general, directed as before, and sent up by the commons, was read:

“Right Honourable; Since my last I am advanced with my army to Bridport, and intend, God willing, to march forward to-day. I desire the month's pay which we have so long expected, and that the ammunition and the shoes, which were heretofore promised to the soldiers, may be speedily sent, otherwise the service which I am desirous to do for the kingdom and parliament will suffer in a great measure. I desire the rather to press for this month's pay, and likewise a constant Supply for the army hereafter, according to the Ordinance, because I am in hopes that, if the money which can be raised in these parts may be employed for the pay of these men, which will come in unto us in these counties, it will be such an encouragement to them, that it may take very good effect: but if I be forced to pay my army with their monies, I fear they will unwillingly be at a double charge, and hazard their persons too. I likewise intreat you that some gentlemen of these Western counties may be speedily sent down, for most of us are strangers here; and I am confident their presence would much advantage the service. I doubt not but, by God's assistance, I shall be able to break the enemy's association, though the forces now with prince Maurice be much more considerable than was believed when I came hither; he having now with him 2500 horse, and about that number of foot, besides their garrisons. As soon as I understand the money is either at Southampton or Portsmouth, I will desire my lord-admiral to cause it to be conveyed by sea. I humbly desire the houses will be pleased to let me have their commands in these particulars, and I shall, with all cheerfulness, shew my readiness to obey as becometh. Your &c. ESSEX. Bridport, July 4, 1644."

Ordinance for excluding all such Members as have deserted the Parliament.] June 29. The houses had for some time, been at variance respecting an Ordinance for excluding the Members of both Houses that had deserted the parliament; and the lords had given some Reasons to the commons why they could not agree to it. These not being satisfactory, they acquainted the lords that they still adhered to their former Resolution; on which that house took the business into debate this day; and the question being put, it was resolved to agree with the commons in this Ordinance, the earl of Lincoln only dissenting, who begged leave to enter his name against it. This Ordinance, or bill of exclusion, was in these words:

"The lords and commons now assembled in parliament, taking into consideration, that divers members of both their houses, have, since the beginning of the unhappy distractions depending, in breach of their duties, withdrawn themselves from that attendance upon the public affairs of the kingdom in parliament, to which the necessities of the kingdom, and the trust in them reposed, have obliged them; and have also joined with, and repaired unto that party, that is now in arms against the parliament; and seriously weighing the great inconvenience and prejudice, which hath arisen, and may farther arise, in respect thereof, the same tending to the scandal and dishonour of the parliament, the discouragement of such as are well-affected, and the subversion of religion, laws and liberty, by means whereof the whole kingdom is nearly interested and concerned in their said departure and offence. And whereas divers members of the house of commons who have deserted the parliament, and adhered unto those that levy war against the parliament, have, by judgment of the house of commons, been justly disabled from sitting, or continuing any longer members of the said house, during this present parliament; by which judgment, the several and respective counties, cities, boroughs and places, for which they served, have right to elect new members for the parliament, upon a warrant under the hand of the Speaker of the house of commons, directing a writ to issue under the Broad Seal to that purpose: and whereas divers members of the house of peers have also deserted the said house of peers, and adhered to those that levy war against the parliament. The lords and commons assembled in parliament do ordain and declare, That whatsoever member of the said house of peers hath so offended, or hereafter shall so offend, as aforesaid, shall be disabled from having any voice, or sitting in the said house of peers, during this present parliament, until his readmittance shall be approved of, and consented unto, by both houses of parliament. Provided always, and it is hereby ordained and declared, That whatsoever member of the house of commons, that heretofore hath deserted, or hereafter shall desert, the parliament, and adhere to those that levy war against the parliament, is, and shall be absolutely disabled from sitting in the said house of commons, during this present parliament."

Oswestry taken by the Parliament's Forces.] A Letter from the earl of Denbigh was this day read, giving an account of his taking the town and castle of Oswestry, in Shropshire, with 400 prisoners and 300 arms; on which the parliament ordered a Letter of Thanks to be sent him, for this his good service and former testimonies of affection to them, &c.

Letter from the Lord Admiral concerning the State of the Navy.] July 5. A Letter from the lord-admiral was read in the house of lords directed thus:

To the Right Hon. my very good lord, the Speaker of the House of Peers,

"My lord; I crave leave to trouble your lordship with a brief narration of the State of the Navy; which, when I look upon, as respecting the future, I find extremely defective; the stores being exhausted, and the magazines of hemp, rosin and tar, masts, canvas, and other materials near totally empty. It is true the house of commons hath had an honourable care to set apart timber for the several yards; but if it remain unwrought, through the officers not being able to fit it to use, the condition of the navy will not be bettered as to actual service. I find that the credit of the commissioners of the navy, which was heretofore very serviceable upon an exigent, is much spent; for the tradesmen will deliver nothing without ready money, having not received their first payment for their provisions abroad, though the second payments are become due; that the victuallers at Chatham, Portsmouth, &c. will deliver no more victuals to the ordinary, in regard of the great debts owing them; whereby, and by want of wages, the sailors are ready to mutiny, and the attendance of the ships to be neglected.—When I consider the Fleet now abroad, I find the Irish Guard in danger to be deserted by his majesty's ships employed there, before the summer ends, for want of means to compleat 8 months victuals; they receiving aboard but six months at their going out, and divers of the ships with me will be forced shortly to come in without reparation: I must therefore intreat your lordship to hasten what can be spared for the service, and a speedy furnishing of those remainders that were received short of the summer's portion, for neither of which, as I am informed, is any money ready.—I shall not urge for setting forth of more ships to increase the summer's fleet, knowing the great expences that lie upon the state; but if some ships designed to be part thereof, and now detained in the river, for ought I can hear to the contrary, for want of money, were abroad, the prejudice that befalls the North Sea fishermen, and the trade of the kingdom in general, for want of convoys, might happily be in some better measure prevented; to which I am able to contribute very little assistance, more than the present disposition of the Fleet affords; the ships being wholly taken up for securing the Western parts, which cannot be neglected.—A Winter Guard is necessary to be thought on, and the preparations will not admit of delay: the wages and freight of ships now in service will amount to a great sum, and if the provision of money precedes not their coming in, the state will contract a greater surplusage of charge, besides the discouragement of the mariners. It is too apparent that the Customs and Excise, set apart to the Navy, do not near reach the expence, though the benefit of reprizals be cast in; and I hear not of any other resolutions or means to make it up. It will be easily determined, that supplies of this nature and variety cannot be made on a sudden, especially in masts, whereof as I take it there are few in England; and that the opportunity of time cannot be let slip without a very great prejudice by addition in matter of price.—I cannot, with too much sense and sadness of thought, apprehend the danger that inevitably threatens the safety of his majesty's dominions, if timely care be not had in the premises; which, in testimony of my duty and performance of my trust, I cannot do less than represent to your lordship. I have this evening received a Letter and other papers from Milford-Haven, setting forth the distracted condition of those parts, which I have sent up to the committee of both kingdoms. They came accompanied with capt. Wm. Rigby prisoner, whom I have directed to be kept in safe custody at Portsmouth, till the parliament or the committee shall please to command him to London, he being suspected to be the unhappy instrument of the late calamities of Lancashire, by his treacherous compliance with the enemy. And so, desiring your lordship to impart this Letter to my noble lords of the house of peers, having myself communicated the same in substance to the house of commons, together with the tender of my humble service, I take leave, and rest, Your &c. WARWICK. Aboard the James in Portland-Road, July 1, 1644."

Letter of Admonition from both Houses to the E. of Essex.] July 6. Both houses agreed, at last, on a Letter of Admonition to be sent to their Lord-General. The Letter was this:
VOL. III,

"My lord; We are commanded by both houses of parl. to acquaint your lordship, that the committee of both kingdoms have reported to them the designs of carrying on the war, with the Letter sent to your lordship in prosecution of those designs, with your several Answers. And they are of opinion, if the Resolutions of the houses, and the Directions of that Committee, had been followed, the public affairs had been in a better condition. We are also to let your lordship know, that, in some of your Letters to that committee, there are some expressions which might well have been forbore; but to make the best use of their affairs, as they now stand, they find themselves necessitated to new councils, and would have your lordship take all advantages on the enemy, and use all your best endeavours for the reducing of the West. And although they find themselves discomposed by your lordship's going into the West, in respect of the pay of the armies, yet the houses are in present consideration thereof, and will endeavour to settle it to the satisfaction of both armies: and do expect that such directions as your lordship shall, from time to time, receive from them or the committee, be observed. This being all we are commanded to signify to your lordship, we remain, Your lordships faithful servants." Signed by the Speakers of both Houses.

The King's Message to the Parliament, from Evesham, for Peace.] Mr. Rushworth informs us, That the king, a few days after the blow he had given to sir Wm. Waller at Cropredy Bridge, advanced to the borders of Worcestershire: and, being arrived at Evesham, his majesty sent, from thence, a Message to the earl of Essex to be communicated by him to the parliament, containing some Propositions for Peace. This Message, he adds, was sent accordingly; but the houses not conceiving themselves to be owned by the direction of it, and because it was but a copy, though the original, as was intimated to them, was in the hands of the French agent, returned no Answer to it. This may be the reason that this Message is not taken notice of nor entered in either of the Journals: but since this proceeding is somewhat singular, we shall give it from the King's Works:

"C. R. We being deeply sensible of the miseries and calamities of this our kingdom, and of the grievous sufferings of our poor subjects, do most earnestly desire that some expedient may be found out, which, by the blessing of God, may prevent the further effusion of blood, and restore the nation to Peace; from the earnest and constant endeavouring of which, as no discouragement given us on the contrary part shall make us cease, so no success on ours shall ever divert us; for the effecting whereof, we are most ready and willing to condescend to all that shall be for the good of us and our people, whether by way of confirmation of what we have already granted, or of such further concession as shall be requisite to the giving a full assurance of the performance of all our most real professions concerning the maintenance of the true Reformed Religion, established in this kingdom, with due regard to the ease of tender consciences, the just privileges of parliament, and the liberty and property of the subject, according to the laws of the land; as also the granting of a general Pardon, with or without exceptions, as shall be thought fit. In order to which blessed Peace, we do desire and propound to the lords and commons of parliament assembled at Westminster, that they appoint such and so many persons as they shall think fit, sufficiently authorized by them, to attend us at our army, upon Safe-Conduct to come and return, (which we do hereby grant) and conclude with us how the premises, and all other things in question betwixt us and them, may be fully settled; whereby all unhappy mistakings betwixt us and our people being removed, there may be a present Cessation of Arms; and, as soon as may be, a total disbanding of all our armies, the subject have his due, and we be restored to all our rights. Wherein, if this our offer shall be accepted, there shall be nothing wanting on our part which may make our people secure and happy. Given at our Court at Evesham, the 4th day of July, 1644."

Ceremonial of admitting the Dutch Ambassadors to an Audience of both Houses.] July 8. The lords took into consideration in what manner to give audience to the States Ambassadors; and it was ordered, That all the lords should have notice to be present on the day; the peers to be in their usual habits without their robes; all the judges and assistants being present. The little lobby was to be prepared for the receiving them, before their Address to the house; whither none were to come but themselves, and the Painted-Chamber to be kept clear to entertain their company. The master of the ceremonies was to conduct them there from their own houses; then the usher of the black rod was to bring them in from the lobby, and three chairs to be set in the house for them. That, when they were come in, every lord, sitting in his place, was to stand up and salute the ambassadors; then to sit down and not to stir out of their places to speak with them so long as they were in the house. If the Ambassadors spoke any thing, their interpreters were to report it to the Speaker in English, and they to withdraw before the Speaker reported the same to the house. The Ambassadors to sit covered; and that coaches be sent to bring them and their followers to the house, such lords as had coaches being desired to send them.

The Orders which the Commons made for the Introduction of these Ambassadors to that house, are also entered in their Journals, as follows: 1. The master of the ceremonies, to be commanded by the house, to acquaint the States Ambassadors, in the name of the house, That they have appointed Friday, at 9 of the clock in the morning, to give the said Ambassadors Audience, according to their desire expressed in a paper, dated the 5th of July instant; and to return their Answer unto the Speaker of the house. 2. That the said master of the ceremonies, on the day of Audience, take with him ten coaches, with a convenient number of gentlemen of quality, which shall be appointed by the house, to go along with him to accompany the Ambassadors to the council-chamber of the court of wards, at the hour appointed, and to give notice of their being there. 3. That the guard place themselves from the outward door of the lobby of the house of commons, to the outward door entering into the court of wards; and to keep the rooms and way clear between the court of wards and house, suffering none to come in but the members of the house, and those that are appointed to accompany the Ambassadors and their train. 4. That three chairs, with arms, be placed somewhat above the middle of the house, for the Ambassadors. 5. That the serjeant, by command of the house, go with his mace to give them notice that the house is ready to receive them; and that he conduct them, in his usual manner, to the house. 6. That the master of the ceremonies, and the gentlemen appointed to accompany the Ambassadors, and the ambassadors train, do stay and make a lane in the lobby; and none of them to follow the ambassadors into the house beyond the bar; and, upon the Ambassadors going to their chairs, all the gentlemen to withdraw, and the doors to be shut, and the serjeant to lay down his mace on the table. 7. That, upon the Ambassadors coming within the bar of the house, the Speaker to rise up in his chair and salute them; and all the members of the house to put off their hats, sitting in their places; and then the ambassadors to be heard what they have to impart. 8. Upon their retiring to the place of their repose, the same passages and ceremonies to be observed, as in their first coming up."—These directions were ordered to be delivered to the master of the ceremonies, who was to take proper care in every particular.

Ordinance for an additional Excise.] This day an Ordinance was read for laying an additional Excise upon some commodities not yet thought of; the preamble of which, expressing the necessities of the parliament at that time, deserves our notice:

"The lords and commons in parliament being desirous, by all good means, to provide for the payment of the public debts of the kingdom, which they hope, by God's blessing, in convenient time to bring to pass; and earnestly labouring for the present satisfaction and payment of such pressing debts, as are due unto several handicraftsmen, strangers, and other persons, for arms and ammunition, bought and taken up of them for the service of the state;

likewise to several poor persons, for carts, carriages, and waggons, for the same use; and for the relief of wounded and maimed soldiers, that have received their wounds in the service of the common-wealth; and for the widows and children of such as have lost their lives in the said service; and for other necessary occasions for the defence of the king, parliament, and kingdom; do hereby order and ordain, &c." The commodities now to be excised, by this Ordinance, were things of English growth and manufactory, the foreign being already subjected to that kind of tax; as allum, copperas, Monmouth caps, hats, starch, hops, saffron; all manner of silks and stuffs, upholstery ware, tin, wood, iron, and tobacco pipes.

July 10. The earl of Northumberland reported to the house a Letter the committee of the two kingdoms had received from the generals of the armies in the North, giving an account of the great victory obtained over the king's forces at Marston Moor near York; which was read in these words:

"Right honourable; Since our last to your lordships, the condition of our affairs is not a little changed; for upon Monday last, upon notice of prince Rupert's marching from Knaresborough towards us, we resolved and accordingly drew out the armies to have met him; and for that end did march the same night to Long-Marston Moor, about 4 miles off the west-side of York; but he, having notice thereof, did pass with his army at Burroughbridge, and so put the River Ouse between him and us; whereby we were disenabled to oppose his passage into York, the bridge we built on the West side of the town being so weak, that we durst not venture to transport our armies upon it. This made us resolve, the next morning, to march to Tadcaster, for stopping of his passage southward: and the armies being so far on their way, as the van was within a mile of it, notice was sent to us by our horsemen, who were upon our rear, that the Princes army, horse and foot, were advanced the length of Long-Marston Moor, and was ready to fall upon them: whereupon we recalled the army, and drew them up on a corn hill, upon the south side of the Moor, in the best way we could, so far as the straitness of the fields, and other disadvantages of the place, would permit. Before both armies were in readiness, it was 7 o'clock at night, about which time they advanced the one to the other; whereupon followed a very hot encounter for the space of 3 hours, whereof, by the great blessing and good providence of God, the issue was the total routing of the enemy's army, the loss of all their ordinance to the number of 20, their ammunition and baggage, about 100 colours, and 10,000 arms. There were killed upon the place about 3000 of them, whereof many are chief officers, and 1500 prisoners taken, amongst whom there were above 100 officers, in which number is sir Charles Lucas, lieut. general to the marquis of Newcastle's horse, major-general Porter, and major-general Tillier, besides divers colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors. Our loss, God be praised, is not very great, being only one lieut. colonel, some few captains, and about 2 or 300 common soldiers. The prince, in a great distraction, with a few horsemen and almost no foot, marched the next morning from York northwards. We are now lying down in our old Leaguer before York, which we are in hopes, in a few days, to gain, and are resolved to send a great part of our cavalry after prince Rupert. We having nothing to add, but, as the glory of all the success belongeth unto God, and the benefit, we hope, shall redound to the whole kingdom, we have appointed this next Sabbath for a day of public thanksgiving throughout the armies; and beg your lordships would appoint a day for the same purpose, to be kept throughout the kingdom, and notice sent to us thereof, that we may join all together in it, and we shall continue, Your &c. LEVEN, FAIRFAX, MANCHESTER, LYNDSEY, THO. HATCHER, From the Leaguer before York, July, 5, 1644."

A Thanksgiving thereupon.] After the reading of this Letter, a day of Thanksgiving was appointed, the preachers at it named, to be on the 18th of this month, in all churches and chapels, in the cities of London and Westminster, unto the Lord of Hosts, that giveth all Victory, for those seasonable and extraordinary blessings, whereby the armies, under the command of prince Rupert and the earl of Newcastle, were totally routed and overthrown, &c. And a Letter of Thanks was ordered to be prepared to be sent to the generals, for their great care in that business.

Upon the defeat at Marston, divers persons of quality, in discontent at that action, and at passages of prince Rupert distasteful to them, quitted their charges under the king, and went beyond sea. There landed of them at Ham-burgh, the marquis of Newcastle and his two sons, (Charles viscount Mansfield, and lord Henry Cavendish) his brother sir Ch. Cavendish, general King, the lord Falconberg, the lord Widdrington, the earl of Carnwath, the bishop of Londonderry, (dr. Bramhall) sir Edw. Widdrington, sir Wm. Carnaby, col. Basset, sir Wm. Vavasour, sir Francis Mackworth, and about 80 others. The marquis came no more into England till after the Restoration. Mr. Whitlocke writes, "That colonel CROMWELL was much cried up for his service in this Battle, and received a slight hurt with a pistol shot in the neck." Lord Clarendon and Mr. Rushworth both agree in giving him a great share of the honour of this victory; but Mr. Hollis† insists upon it very positively, "That his friend Cromwell," as he calls him, "had neither part nor lot in the business;" and charges him with being an errand coward.

The Dutch Ambassadors admitted to an Audience of Parliament.] July 12. This being the day appointed by the lords to give Audience to the Ambassadors of the States General, the lords, according to the foregoing Order, being all in their places, the gentleman-usher of the black rod and the master of the ceremonies introduced the Ambassadors. After due respects made, they produced their Letters of credence, which they delivered to the Speaker, who gave the same to the master of the ceremonies, who read them at the clerk's table; which being done, one of the Ambassadors delivered their embassy in French, which was afterwards read in English by their secretary. The Ambassadors being departed, the lords commanded the Credential Letters to be read again; and it was ordered to take this business into consideration the next morning.—It is observable, That when the Ambassadors were introduced into the house of commons, 49 colours taken from the king's forces at the Battle of Marston-Moor, lay upon the table. They were brought by captain Stuart, who was sent by the generals out of the North, with several commissions of the e. of Newcastle's, and a Letter, with colours, ensigns, &c. The sum of 100*l.* was ordered the bearer as a reward.

The lord Hunsdon impeached of High Treason.] July 13. Mr. Jephson, and others of the commons, were sent up to the lords, and, in the name of that house, and of all the commons of England, did accuse John Cary lord Hunsdon, (viscount Rochford, eldest son to the earl of Dover) of high treason, for adhering to the enemies of king and parliament. They also desired the lords to sequester him from parliament, and to secure his person in safe custody. The lord Hunsdon, being then in the house, desired leave to speak a few words; which being granted, he only said, That he humbly requested there might be a speedy proceeding in this business, that so his innocency might the sooner appear. After which he withdrew; and the house taking this into consideration, ordered, That the lord Hunsdon should be sequestered from parliament, and committed to the black rod, until the pleasure of the house be further known; but not so but that he might take the air for his health, in company of the gentleman usher, or any he shall appoint; and that any friend might have liberty to visit him. His lordship's houses, lands, and goods were also inhibited from being sequestered, till he was convicted of his accusation by the house of commons.

The Propositions of the Dutch Ambassadors.] Next were read the Propositions delivered to the lords by the Dutch Ambassadors; as also a Memorandum of divers Ships of theirs which had been taken, for which they required reparation:

The PROPOSITIONS of the Ambassadors of the High and Mighty STATES GENERAL of the United Provinces delivered by them, by word of mouth, in both houses of the parliament of England, the 12—22 of July, 1644.

“ Right Hon. lords and commons; From the very beginning of the restoration of the liberty of the republick of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, the high and mighty lords, our lords the States General, their chiefest wishes and desires have ever been to see that the kings of Great Britain and these kingdoms might be perpetually maintained and preserved in a good concord, peace, and union, by which nothing could befall them, but all safety and advantage, and that for three principal reasons: 1. That these kingdoms, being the greatest and strongest body, which having received and maintained the profession of the true Christian protestant religion, and conserving it so well, it might also contribute much, yea by fame and reputation itself, to the conservation of states, confederates and friends, and of all the other protestant churches, established and spread throughout all Europe. 2. That these kingdoms by their situation, commodities, traffic, and navigation, and their republic, being so nearly combined by their common interest of state and religion, our lords might rest assured that the interest of the king and these kingdoms, being so mightily advanced and conserved, by the same means those of the Netherlands could not but be well conserved. And, 3. That this intestine peace, union, and concord (which prosperity and weal ordinarily accompanieth) continuing here, that not only the kings and kingdoms should be able to maintain and preserve themselves; but that the states, confederates and friends, or the good cause of the Protestant Religion, in other parts unjustly suffering, as formerly it hath been, and yet this day is too much perceived, they might ever find their refuge and asyle, their succours and their aid against all those, who, on the contrary part, of other states and churches, should undertake to undermine the true foundation of the happiness of these flourishing kingdoms.—For, your situation being well considered, you are in yourselves as a world apart separated from many inconveniences of the other. You have your commodities at home, not only which are necessary, and for your pleasure and delight; but also in such plenty, that you are able to communicate them to other nations, your neighbours. The sea doth serve you for a ditch and bulwark, and your power by sea is able to maintain you in your felicity, and exempt and free you from all foreign injuries; so that the good of your own conservation, and the cause of your evil and ruin, could not be suscitated, nor found elsewhere, but at home, and within yourselves. And certainly the kings and queens formerly have done notable assistances for the maintenance and conservation of the true religion, and of many states which had need thereof; among which our lords do profess themselves as much obliged and bound as any other. And the king and these kingdoms shall yet, in time, be able to do the like assistance, as well for the present, now there is so great a necessity, as for the future; provided you conserve yourselves in that concord and union, which heretofore hath made, and shall ever make, you mighty and redoubted. From hence it is, that the enemies of the peace of Christendom, and their agents, (who long since have framed and forged the design of an universal monarchy of Europe, yea of all the worlds, seeing and perceiving, with an envious and malicious eye, your former happiness, your flourishing state, and your power, and that there was nothing so contrary and dreadful to their vast conceptions, as your oppositions) to hurt and weaken, yea to ruin you, if they had been able, they have heretofore used all violence, and the strength of great fleets and armies; but in vain, and without success. They have at last not been able to act a better play, than that which is most familiar to them, and which hath helped them to the ruin of many great states which have not been so circumspect and prudent as you are.—Right Honourable; It is thus that, quitting open violence, they have, in a profound peace with you, and during the time of the same, sown among you the seeds and weeds of discord and dissention, as well in politics as church business, and will ever foment them; whence they assure themselves of a certain profit, whatever end the said dissentions might take. And by these means, and their accustomed craft, they have proposed to obtain that, by intestine troubles, you should weaken yourselves; and making you less mighty and less dreadful, and no ways considerable, you might serve at last, which God avert, to the inglutting of their insatiable ambition, to the destruction of the true religion, and of all that which may be dear and recommendable unto you, as we see already brought to pass in Ireland; where cruelties, murders, horrible and unheard-of slaughters have been perpetrated with effusion of so much innocent blood, to the total destruction of the true protestant religion there, and to the great danger of the state itself. Our lords seeing these misunderstandings, troubles, and miseries here already grown to so great an extremity; and being so highly interested in your well-being, have esteemed it fit and timely to send us, their Ambassadors, to this kingdom, to offer to the king and to his parliament our service and mediation; to help, if acceptable, to remove and take away the jealousies, which are and might be; and to compose the dissentions by the mild ways of an amicable conference. And our said lords declare, That they have not been moved hereunto by any presumption, or to intrude themselves in the business of a great king, and of these mighty kingdoms; but only to acquit themselves of the office and duty of good friends; and also to acknowledge, on this occasion, the great obligation which the king and these kingdoms have upon our republic. Our lords do further persuade themselves, that no other state in the world, but theirs, shall be found more fit and acceptable, in their opinion, to interpose itself in the mediation of an accommodation and re-union between his majesty and his parliament, and to whose interposition more credit might be given, without all suspicion; for the honour, greatness, and prosperity of the king and these kingdoms is, by reflection, the same for our republic; and, on the contrary, your evil is to us a very great affliction, and a most sensible evil. From thence may be taken this firm assurance, That the aim of our mediation shall not be to recommend an accommodation and reconciliation, feigned and painted without, or prejudicial and not assured within; but to procure a true re-union, sincere and perfect, founded upon the basis of the true religion and justice, which shall re-establish respectively the good correspondence, confidence, love, and the respects between the king and his parliament, and between all the good subjects of these great kingdoms. The king hath so much approved of the reasons and proffers of our said lords, that his majesty hath accepted, on his part, our interposition; and hath consented to a conference between commissioners to be sent from both parties, if you find it good; and that you shall chuse the place, the time, and the number of persons who shall be employed in this action.—Right Honourable; Now we come unto you, by command of our superiors, to make the same proffer of mediation, and to understand whether also it may be agreeable unto you. We have always observed, that your good inclinations have been carried to Peace, if you receive satisfaction to your just and reasonable demands. Your wisdoms also may well judge, that the ways of arms are not always the surest, their successes being very uncertain, and which change face in a moment. The good cause which is proposed, doth not always promise an assured and certain success; for we are all men, and God sometimes permits the good cause to suffer for our sins. All war is an affliction and punishment of God, in which we are not to take delight, when we can be freed of it upon honest and sure terms and conditions, that the wrath of God be no longer provoked against us. It is to be considered also, if no reasonable accommodation be found, that the decision of your differences by arms is not to be expected so soon; but rather, on the contrary, that it shall be the cause of perpetuating the wars in these kingdoms; because the king shall ever live in his royal posterity, and the parliament never dies, to suscite always the former evil successes by new wars; which at length shall cause the total ruin and destruction of state and religion, only to the great advantage of the common enemy of our faith.—Right Honourable; If it please you to make use of our intercession, unto which the king consented at our first proposition and offer, we promise you to proceed and labour in it with all sincerity and fidelity, as ambassadors, sent by your best friends and allies, making profession of one and the same religion: and we shall spare no endeavour, travel, nor pain (by the good will which his majesty hath declared to us, and by your good intention) to make the affections of our lords succeed to such perfection, that the king and his parliament, and all good and loyal subjects of the king, and lovers of their country, shall find their desired contentment and tranquillity with all assurance.—Right Honourable; We must yet add, That your troubles and wars, trouble and endanger us also; for many merchants and masters of ships daily present themselves to our lords, the States General, and to us here, with their complaints, that your men and ships of war trouble their course of trading and traffic, and take their ships and goods without any just cause, and without reason and any right at all; as may be seen by a Memorandum hereunto annexed, which you are desired to take notice of, and to give order for restitution and reparation of the damages sustained for the present, and to take such course, that, for the future, the like excesses may be prevented. And if any doubts be found in the said Memorandum, that it may please you to appoint us some commissioners to settle the points of which we are complaining, as shall be found to appear with reason.”

The Queen leaves the Kingdom.] On the 14th of this month the Queen, who, on the 16th of June, had been delivered of a daughter, at Exeter, (the princess Henrietta) took shipping at Falmouth. Mr. Rushworth informs us, “That the earl of Warwick had ordered several ships to attend at Torbay, to intercept and hinder her passage; yet her majesty, with a Flemish man of war and ten other ships, adventured out; and, by the advantage of the wind, avoided any annoyance from the parliament’s fleet, who yet pursued with all the sail they could make, and one frigate came up and discharged several shots at them; but her majesty’s ships coming out fresh tallowed and trained for so important a service, had the advantage of them in sailing: and, to prevent the worst, there was a galley provided with 16 oars, which might have carried off her majesty if they could have come up; but, without needing to make use thereof, her majesty landed safely at Brest, in France; and resided in that her native kingdom till after the Restoration of the royal family.”

Ordinance for directing the Proceedings of the Joint Committee of both Kingdoms.] July 19. The following Ordinance for directing the Proceedings of the committee of both houses appointed to join with the committees and commissioners of Scotland, as sent up by the commons, was agreed to in the Lords:

“Whereas by an Ordinance, intituled, ‘An Ordinance for appointing a Committee of both houses to join with the Committees and Commissioners of Scotland, for the better managing the affairs of both nations in the common cause, according to the ends expressed in the last Covenant and Treaty between the two nations of England and Scotland,’ it is, amongst other things, ordained, That the committee of both houses, mentioned in that Ordinance, are to observe such orders as they, from time to time, shall receive from both houses of parliament: The lords and commons in parliament assembled, do, for the better directions of the said committee in their proceedings, declare and ordain, That the said committee, or any six of them, whereof one lord and two commons, shall treat with the committees and commissioners appointed by our brethren of Scotland, in such things as shall, by them, be propounded from and in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, for the ends in the said Ordinance expressed; as likewise propound to the committees and commissioners of Scotland, whatsoever they shall receive in charge from both houses, and, from time to time, advise and consult concerning the same, and report the results to both houses; and, further, the said committee, or any six of them, whereof one lord and two commons, shall, as a joint committee with the committee and commissioners of Scotland, advise, consult, order, and direct concerning the carrying on and managing of the war for the best advantage of the three kingdoms, and the keeping of good intelligence between the three kingdoms, their forces, committees, and councils; and likewise hold good correspondency and intelligence with foreign states: and, further, advise and consult of all things, in pursuance of the ends expressed in the late Covenant and Treaty. And it is further declared and ordained, That nothing in the Ordinance before-mentioned, doth or shall authorize the committee of both houses, thereby appointed, to advise, treat, or consult concerning any Cessation of Arms, or making of Peace, without express directions from both houses; and that the said committee have, and shall have, only such power and authority as is herein expressed, limited, and appointed, and none other. And for the better carrying on of this great work, and to the intent the debates and resolutions of that committee may be proceeded in with secrecy and expedition, for the best advantage of the public, it is further ordained, That all and every the members of both houses of that committee shall, before one lord and two commissioners of that committee, or such as shall, by the major part of the members of both houses present, being of that committee, be appointed, take this Oath ensuing, and shall swear as followeth: ‘I, A. B. do, in the presence, and in the name of God Almighty, promise and swear to be faithful in this trust committed unto me; and that I will not reveal or disclose any thing, in the whole or in part, directly or indirectly, that shall be debated or resolved upon by this committee, without the command and direction of those by whom I am intrusted, or without the order of the major part of this committee, or of the major part of them which shall be present at such debates or resolutions.’ And the said lord and two commons are hereby authorized to administer the same to any of the said committee. And, lastly, it is ordained, That the said committee are to observe such further orders and directions as they, from time to time, shall receive from both houses of parliament. Provided also, that this Ordinance shall continue for 4 months, and until both houses shall take other order to the contrary, and no longer."

Several Judges impeached of High Treason, for adhering to the King.] July 22. The commons sent a message up to the lords, in their names and in the name of all the people of England, to accuse of High Treason sir Robert Heath, knt. lord chief justice of the King's-Bench, sir John Bankes, knt. lord chief justice of the Common-Pleas, sir Robert Foster, knt. one of the justices of the same, and sir John Glanville, knt. serjeant at law, for adhering to the king, now in arms against the parliament and kingdom. The commons also desired that such witnesses, as they should produce upon that Impeachment, might be examined upon oath, in presence of a committee of both houses. Serjeant Glanville, being come to town to make his Peace with the parliament, was taken up and committed, by the lords, prisoner to the Tower. These Judges and the serjeant had been concerned in trying and condemning captain Turpin, a sea-officer, for high treason at Exeter, who was afterwards executed, by order of sir John Berkley, governor of that city.

York surrendered to the Parliament's Forces.] July 24. The lord Wharton, from the committee of both kingdoms, reported some Letters from the Northern Generals, in which was a narrative of the surrender of the city of York to them, for the use of the king and parliament, together with the Articles for the same; but these Letters are not entered in the Journals.

Aug. 14. Several Letters are entered in the Lords Journals; wherein the lord-general describes his own situation at that time, and gives the parliament most convincing proofs of his inviolable fidelity to them. These Letters being read, the lords thought it proper that they should be, forthwith, communicated to the commons at a conference, with this sense, That a Letter should be sent from both houses to the lord-general, taking notice of his great faithfulness to the parliament, and to give him thanks and encouragement for the same; to desire the commons to appoint a committee to join with one of theirs, to draw up a Letter for that purpose.

The French Ambassador demands an Audience of the Lords.] The French Ambassador had left the kingdom some time, but a resident was appointed by that court to remain here; who, about this time, had sent to let the parliament know that he had Letters of Credence to deliver to both houses, as a recognition of their power, and demanded an audience. On this the lords ordered the manner of his reception in their house in this form: first, that he come to his audience in his own coaches, accompanied with the master of the ceremonies: that a chair without arms be set for him, in some convenient place in the houses, as they shall, respectively think fit: that he sit covered; and, at the time of his speaking, he stand up uncovered. This being agreed to, a day was appointed for this ceremony; but, on the 15th, the resident, being made acquainted with the intended manner of his reception, refused to come at all; probably, because it differed so much from the manner and form in which the parliament had received the Dutch Ambassadors at their audience, (see p. 275).

It has been mentioned that the marquis of Newcastle's Papers, &c. were taken at the Battle of Marston-Moor; and amongst them, it seems, there were some original Letters from sir John Hotham and his son, which proved plainly that they kept a secret correspondence with the enemy. This stirred up the commons to bring them both to trial; and, in order to it, they set about getting an Ordinance passed for the executing of Martial Law; a thing which had been some time canvassed between the two houses.

Ordinance appointing Commissioners for executing Martial Law.] Aug. 16. Several Messages had been sent up, from the commons to the lords, to hasten the passing of this Ordinance. Some disputes had arisen between them about the form of it; which being settled this day at a conference, report of it was made to the lords, That the commons agreed to limit the time to 4 months, as their lordships had directed; but as to their proviso, for acquainting the houses before execution, the commons did not agree, but desired it might be left out. On this the question was put, Whether to agree with the commons, as it was then reported? which passed in the affirmative; the earl of Lincoln again dissenting. The Ordinance was as follows:

"Be it ordained by the lords and commons assembled in parliament, and by the authority of the same, That Robert earl of Essex, captain-general of the forces raised by the authority of parliament, Algernon e. of Northumberland, Henry e. of Kent, Philip e. of Pembroke, Wm. e. of Salisbury, Oliver e. of Bolingbroke, Edward e. of Manchester, Basil e. of Denbigh, Wm. lord viscount Say and Sele, Philip lord Wharton, Dudley lord North, Wm. lord Grey of Werk, John lord Roberts, Philip lord Lisle; sir Wm. Waller, sir Arthur Haslerig, sir John Corbet, sir John Bamfield, sir Henry Heyman, col. Alex. Popham, col. Stapcley, col. Whitbread, col. Morley, col. Purefoy, col. Ven, Edw. Bainton, esq. col. Wm. Jephson, col. Alex. Rigby, Tho. Arundel, esq. serjeant-major-general Skippon, sir Nath. Brent, doctor Tho. Eden, John Bradshaw, esq. Wm. Steel, esq. sir James Harrington, col. Browne, col. West, col. Ch. Fleetwood, col. Williams, col. Turner, col. Manwaring, col. Whichcote col. Pindar, lieut. col. Welden, lieut. col. Underwood, lieut. col. Wilson, major Salloway, major Tichborn, col. Humphrey, col. Player, col. Prince, col. Harsnet, major Camfield, col. Wm. Molins, col. Owen, col. Web, lieut. col. Bradley, or any 12 or more of them, whereof such of the members of either house of parliament, as have commissions and commands in any of the armies or garrisons, and sir Nath. Brent always to be three, shall be commissioners, and shall have full power and authority to hear and determine all such causes as belong to military cognizance, according to the Articles in this present Ordinance mentioned; and to proceed to the trial, condemnation, and execution of all offenders against the said Articles; and to inflict upon the offenders such punishment, either by death, or otherwise corporally, as the said commissioners, or the major part of them then present, shall judge to appertain to justice, according to the nature of the offence, and Articles here ensuing. I. No person or persons whatsoever shall, from henceforth, voluntarily repair to, or go from, the cities of London and Westminster, or from any part of the kingdom under the power of the parliament, unto the person of the king or queen, or lords of the council abiding with him or her, or to any commander or officer of the king's army; or shall give or hold any intelligence by letters, messages, or otherwise, with any in arms against the parliament, without consent of both houses of parliament, or the committee appointed by Ordinance of parliament, for managing the war, the lord-general of the forces raised by the two houses, or from the respective officers that shall command, in chief, any of the said forces; upon pain of death, or other corporal punishment at discretion. II. Whosoever hath or shall plot, contrive, or endeavour the betraying, surrendering, or yielding up to the enemy, or hath or shall, contrary to the rules of war, surrender, yield up, or betray any cities, towns, forts, magazines, or forces, which now are, or hereafter shall be under the power of the parliament, shall be punished with death. III. No person or person whatsoever, not under the power of the enemy, shall voluntarily relieve any person, being in arms against the parliament, knowing him to have been so in arms, with any money, victuals, or ammunition, upon pain of death, or other corporal punishment at discretion; nor shall voluntarily and knowingly harbour or receive any, being in arms as aforesaid, upon pain of punishment at discretion. IV. No Officer or soldier shall make any mutinous assemblies, or be assisting thereunto upon pain of death. V. No guardian or officer of any prison shall wilfully suffer any prisoner of war to escape, under pain of death; or negligently, under pain of imprisonment, and farther punishment at discretion. VI. Whosoever shall voluntarily take up arms against the parliament, having taken the National Covenant, shall die without mercy.—VII. Whatsoever officer or commander hath or shall desert their trust, and adhere to the enemy, shall die without mercy.—And it is hereby further ordained, by the authority aforesaid, That the said commissioners, or any 12 or more of them, whereof such of the members of either house of parliament as have commissions and commands in any of the armies or garrisons, and sir Nath. Brent, always to be 3, shall be authorized, from time to time, so often as they shall think fit, or shall be ordered thereunto by both or either house of parliament, to sit in some convenient place within the cities of London, Westminster, or lines of communication, and to appoint a judge-advocate, a provost-martial, and all other officers needful. And it is hereby farther ordained, That all mayors, sheriffs, justices of peace, constables, bailiffs, and other officers, shall be aiding and assisting to the said commissioners in the execution of the premises; and that the said commissioners, and every of them, and all and every other person and persons, that shall be aiding and assisting to them in the execution of the premises, shall be saved harmless and indemnified for what they shall do therein, by authority of parliament. Provided, nevertheless, That no member of either house of parliament, or assistants of the house of peers, shall be questioned or tried before the commissioners appointed by virtue of this present Ordinance, without assent and leave first had and obtained of both houses. And be it also provided, That this present Ordinance, and the authority hereby given and appointed to the persons hereby nominated, shall endure and have continuance for 4 months from the making hereof. Provided, That this Ordinance, for any offence hereafter to be committed, shall not take place or be of force, until 8 days after the publication hereof, any thing herein to the contrary notwithstanding."

Aug. 20. The commons had sent their late Propositions for Peace (intended to be presented to the king) to the parliament of Scotland, for their approbation, who returned them with only some few verbal alterations; and they were this day presented to the lords at a conference, who appointed a day to take the same into consideration.—Nothing more occurs to the end of this month, of any great moment, except that the lords agreed to the Propositions for Peace, sent up by the commons.

The Elector Palatine comes into England. Sept. 1. The Prince Elector about this time came into England, and landed at Greenwich before the parliament had any notice of his intention. Both houses were greatly alarmed at this news; but presently ordered a joint committee to wait upon his highness, with this message: "That the parliament did not know of his highness's arrival, nor of any intention of his coming into this kingdom, till two days since: that considering the conjuncture of affairs, both at home and abroad, the parliament is much surprized at not being informed and consulted with before his coming over; and doth conceive that the residence of his electoral highness, at this time, in foreign parts, would be of more advantage to his own and the public interest. The parliament have always been most tender of his highness's affairs, are, and will yet be so; and had then sent a committee of their own to visit him, and give him assurance thereof; which they would ever express in their actions and faithful advice." They also ordered the commissioners of the revenue to discharge the expence of the Prince's table and retinue for ten days.

Sept. 2. The aforesaid committee reported to the lords, That they had waited on the Prince Elector, and acquainted him with what they were commanded, and to which he had returned this Answer: "That his highness did think himself much obliged to the lords and commons for this and for their former favours: that he undertook this journey to testify unto them, by such an action, his constant and sincere affection, formerly expressed in Letters, to the good cause they maintain: conceiving, withal, that his being with them in person, for a time, might hinder such jealousies, as either the actions of some of his near friends, or the ill offices of his enemies, might, by his long absence, cast upon him: that his highness wisheth them a constant good success in the great work they had undertaken for the good of the Protestant cause; and that, for his part, he would always continue the same he had formerly professed." Thus much, the commissioners said, his highness expressed by word of mouth, and did intend to satisfy both houses more at large, with the motives and reasons of his coming; and, after, will cheerfully embrace the advice that the wisdom of both the honourable houses shall be pleased to give him.—The lords, on hearing this submissive message from the Prince, thought fit to enlarge their former orders; and appointed an officer of the wardrobe to fit up apartments for him in Whitehall, and particularly the crimson velvet bed belonging to the prince of Wales, with all other things necessary for his better reception.

The Parliament's Letter to the E. of Essex, upon his Defeat in Cornwall.] Sept. 7. The houses had now been a long time in preparing an Answer to their general's last Letter from the West. They had indeed received intelligence from him, that he had himself escaped from Cornwall, by sea, and landed at Plymouth, being forced to leave his army to shift for themselves. This account at large, is omitted in the Journals; however, the following Letter is to be found there, which was sent to console him under this misfortune:

"My lord; The committee of both kingdoms have acquainted the parliament with your lordship's Letters from Plymouth. They have commanded us to let you know, that as they apprehend the misfortune of that accident, and submit to God's pleasure therein; so their good affection to your lordship, and their opinion of your fidelity and merit, in the public service, is not at all lessened; and they are resolved not to be wanting, in their best endeavours, for the repairing of this loss; and drawing together such a strength, under your command, as may, by the blessing of God, restore our affairs to a better condition than they are now in; for which purpose they have written to the earl of Manchester to march with all possible speed to Dorchester, with all the horse and foot he can. The houses have appointed 6000 arms for foot, 500 pair of pistols, 6000 suits of cloaths, &c. to meet your lordship at Portsmouth, for the arming and encouragement of your forces. They are confident your lordship's presence in these parts, for bringing the force into a body together, and disposing of them, will very much conduce to the public advantage."

The Elector Palatine lays before the Parliament the Motives of his Journey.] Sept. 14. The speaker of the lords acquainted that house, that the Prince Elector had sent him a Paper to be presented to them, which was read as follows:

MOTIVES and REASONS concerning his Highness the PRINCE PALATINE's coming into England, presented to both the Honourable Houses of Parliament by his said Highness.

"All actions whatsoever being obnoxious to divers censures, his Electoral highness thought it necessary, openly, in this kind, to declare himself, and the integrity of his intentions in his present coming into this kingdom; that, if it be possible, malignancy may be silenced, candour and charity moved to speak for the truth, he having made the God of Truth his refuge and confidence; and knowing that the children of truth and innocency, who are neither changed with the frowns nor smiles of this inconstant world, must be his best friends, and, under God, his greatest confidence.—The present troubles of this kingdom, and his highness's present condition, proceeding, both of them, from the same supreme Providence; the great affairs of the honourable houses of parliament, and his own near relation, which will not suffer him to account himself a stranger, will, as he conceives, sufficiently satisfy for the manner of his coming; since, by a solemn and public warning, he might have seem'd to expect some ceremonies in these conjunctures very unseasonable.—But as his highness's resolution to come, at this time, may, he now finds, be subject to such exceptions, as his sincerity would not permit him to foresee or apprehend, he thinks it necessary to declare, that his last departure out of this kingdom did not proceed from any sinister intention. His behaviour whilst he was abroad, his approving of the cause jointly prosecuted by both these kingdoms, (since which time he hath had no reason to change, many reasons to confirm, his mind,) are all evidences, that it hath not a rise from unjust ambition, or a desire to intrude himself into the public affairs of these kingdoms: he chuseth rather to make the reality of this appear against all calumnies and jealousies, of what nature soever, by his comportment and actions during his abode in this place, than by word or writing: misconstructions are not the least part of the many sufferings which not only the innocent, but the most deserving, must resolve to bear, 'till truth, which is the daughter of time, makes them to vanish.—Neither can his highness forbear, with unspeakable grief, to observe, that the public actions of some of the nearest of his blood have been such, as have administered so much cause of sorrow and jealousy; even from such persons, upon whose affections, in respect of their love and zeal to the reform'd religion, his highness doth set the greatest price.—But as his highness is not able to regulate what is out of his power, so he is confident that the justice of the parliament, and of all honest men, will not impute such actions to him as are his afflictions, and not his faults. It must needs be known to the Christian world, and to no man should it be better known than to his highness, that the commotions, which exercise and distract these kingdoms, are, originally, derived from the same Popish principles hammer'd upon the same Jesuitical anvil, and driven to those Antichristian ends, which have brought such deplorable and lasting calamities upon Germany; And his highness is confident that the parliament and people of God in these kingdoms, through the justice of the cause which they maintain, and their piety and wisdom in the managing thereof, will, in the end, by the blessing of God, prevail against whatsoever Spain, Rome, or the Gates of Hell could do or devise to the contrary; and that when truth and peace shall be settled in these kingdoms, they, out of their zeal to the glory of God, and the true reformed Protestant Religion and in pursuance of their former Christian and favourable declarations, will direct their councils, and bend their power, for the relief, deliverance, and restitution, of the oppressed; amongst which the Electoral Family, by God's permission, whose judgments are unsearchable, hath had the deepest and most durable sufferings. These, and the like considerations, were the motives of his highness's departure out of England, in the beginning of these unhappy troubles; to which he must also add this important reason, that by this absence, he might be free of all councils and actions tending to the prejudice of that cause, which he ought zealously to affect; for though he hath his hope in Heaven, yet all his expectations on earth are included in these kingdoms.—The same sense of Religion and public interest hath now drawn him, again, into this kingdom; that he may, in person, profess himself to be what he is, against all jealousies and insinuations; and what malice, in his absence, might have suggested against him.—It needs not to be remembered here what his highness's princely predecessors have done for that religion, ever since the blessed Reformation, for which he now suffers; nor how willingly his enemies would make him restitution of his dominions, rights, and dignities, could they persuade him to become an enemy to the truth; but God hath taught him rather to chuse afflictions than iniquity; persecution than impiety: and, in this affliction, and persecution by many open and secret enemies, whither should he address himself but to these kingdoms, which profess and defend the same religion, and are in affliction for the same cause; and from which the strong bonds of nature and Christian compassion make him expect such comfort, assistance, and protection, in this time of his exile and distress, that his cold friends may be heated thereby into more affection, and his enemies cooled of their rage and violence; 'till God be pleased to grant, first unto these kingdoms, and, afterwards, by their means, to himself and his subjects, full deliverance, establishment, and peace? His Electoral highness, having thus presented the Reasons of his Coming, and conditions of his affairs, in the next place returns his thanks unto the honourable houses of parliament, for their free declarations and promise of taking his affairs and interests into their care and consideration: and as he shall ever hold in high esteem and value the advice they shall give him; so, in the particular of his residence, at this time, in foreign parts, his highness is necessitated to offer this to their consideration, that he hath many enemies abroad, and that they are not a little increased since the late troubles in these kingdoms, and for his profession to this cause; which will render his abode displeasing, and it may be, for many reasons, unhappy to him in those parts, where his and their enemies have so great an influence."

No further notice was taken of the foregoing Paper, in the house of lords, at this time. Mr. Whitlocke acknowledges, 'That, notwithstanding the Prince Elector's professions to the parliament, they were jealous of him, considering his near relation to the king, and the engagements of his brothers in that service, that he would do no good offices amongst them:'

The King's Message to the Parliament for Peace, upon his Success in the West. Sept. 16. The Speaker presented a Letter to the house of lords, sealed with the king's own seal, which was inclosed in one to sir William Waller, thus directed, 'To the Lords and Commons of parliament assembled at Westminster;' which being opened, two Papers were inclosed, and they were read in these words:

"C. R. It having pleased God, in so eminent a manner, lately to bless our armies in these parts with success, we do not so much joy in that blessing for any consideration, as for the hopes we have that it may be a means to make others lay to heart, as we do, the miseries brought and continued upon our kingdom by this unnatural war; and that it may open your ears, and dispose your minds, to embrace those offers of Peace and Reconciliation, which have been so often and so earnestly made unto you by us; and from the constant and fervent endeavours of which we are resolved never to depart. In pursuance whereof we do, upon this occasion, conjure you to take into your consideration our too long neglected Message of the 4th of July, from Evesham, which we again renew unto you; and that you would speedily send us such an Answer thereunto, as may shew unto our poor subjects some light of a deliverance from their present calamities by a happy Accommodation: toward which we do here engage, on the word of a king, to make good all those things which we have herein promised, and really to endeavour a happy conclusion of this Treaty. And so God direct you in the ways of Peace. Given at our Court at Tavestock, the 8th day of Sept. 1644. By his Majesty's Command, GEO. DIGBY."

The Resolutions of both Houses thereupon.] After the reading of these the lords agreed to nominate a committee of 13 to join with a proper number of the commons, to consider what was fit to be done in this affair, and report the same to their house; and a message was sent down accordingly. Two days after, a Report was made, from the aforesaid committee, to the lords, That the commons had passed two Votes, which they offered to their lordships consideration; 1. That the direction of the King's Letter, 'To the lords and commons of parliament assembled at Westminster,' is not a direction which doth acknowledge the parliament of England. 2. It is the opinion of this committee, That both houses should be moved to send away, with all expedition, unto his majesty, the Propositions for a safe and well-grounded Peace, which are preparing by the parliaments of these kingdoms." These Resolutions were agreed to and confirmed by the lords.

Another Memorial from the Dutch Ambassadors, relating to their Offer of Mediation.] Sept. 20. The Dutch Ambassadors presented another Memorial to the lords; which being read, was only ordered to be communicated to the commons. This Paper was as follows:

"Right Honourable; We have divers times desired your lordships by word of mouth, as we do now by these few lines, that the honourable parliament might be induced to give us some Answer unto our interposition presented unto them. Your lordships know that this interposition could not be intrusted in better and safer hands than those of our States and their ministers; and we, for acquitting our charge for the interest of that state that hath sent us, and for the satisfaction of our own consciences, cannot, neither will we, have any other aim but that unto which our Instructions tend, which is your just contentment: for our lords and superiors have expressly sent us hither, and, above all, recommended to our care the conservation and maintenance of the true Christian Protestant Religion, which you have and do profess jointly with us. They have also charged us to advance the protection of the laws of this kingdom, without patronizing any act which might tend to the enfeebling or destruction of the same; but to accommodate a good, firm, and secure Peace and Union between his majesty, the parliament, and his people; a Peace and Union in sincere truth; and to see you settled in such a state, that his majesty, the parliament, and the subjects, may enjoy all that which is due respectively unto them, according to the said laws of this kingdom; and that the accord following thereupon might have all necessary security of a good and sincere observance. Your lordships may be assured we have no other intention than the advancement of your honour and reputation; which cannot be more advanced than by a good re-union amongst you; to effect which we do offer to travel with all our hearts and docility, if the honourable parliament will be pleased to declare that our intercession is acceptable to them. We do then desire that this may be communicated to the honourable parliament, and that we may have our Answer; but, if it will please them, a speedy and good one."

Sept. 23. Several Letters were read in the house of lords, containing an Account from sir John Meldrum, sir Wm. Brereton, and sir Tho. Middleton, of the raising the siege before Montgomery Castle in Wales.

Oct. 4. A Message was sent up from the commons to inform the lords, That they had received intelligence the king's forces were marching Eastward, and were come to this side Dorchester: they therefore desired their lordships concurrence in an Ordinance for sending 5 regiments of foot out of the city of London, to join with the earl of Manchester's forces. This Ordinance was read thrice in one day and agreed to.

Both houses continuing still deeply engaged in military affairs, and a decisive Battle daily expected, orders were given for all soldiers and officers of the city's marching regiments to repair to their posts; under pain of immediate death to the common men, if they were seen in the city, and a trial by martial law to the officers.

The Commons propose the coining of the King's Plate in the Tower, for supporting the War.] The parliament seem at this time to have been in very great want of money, by their making free with the king's magazine of Plate in the Tower of London. The commons proposed to the lords to have it all melted and coined for the present service. The lords disliked this proceeding, and first desired it might be pawned rather than be melted down; and afterwards proposed a conference with the other house, to give them Reasons why it should neither be melted nor pawned; but some other course found out to supply the occasions for which this money was intended. They alledged, that the Plate was antient; the fashion of it, and badges upon it, more worth than the plate itself; that the particular esteem set upon that plate would make it of ill consequence to sell it, though necessity be the motive: besides, it would look like the queen's selling or pawning the jewels of the crown. It was added, That the parliament had expressed their affection to the king, in that they would take care of his children; and it would now be very incongruous to sell his Plate. Notwithstanding these Reasons, the commons resolved to adhere to their former vote concerning the selling of the king's Plate, and ordered their committee to prepare Reasons to be offered at another conference about it.

Oct. 18. An Ordinance of parliament was this day read, and passed both houses, for laying a weekly assessment through the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, for the present relief of the British army in Ireland.

Ordinance against giving any Quarter to Irishmen taken in Arms.] This day the lords passed an Ordinance, which had been sent up to them by the commons, enacting,—“1. That no Quarter shall hereafter be given to any Irishman, nor to any Papist whatsoever born in Ireland, which shall be taken in hostility against the parliament, either upon the sea, or within this kingdom, or dominion of Wales. 2. That the lord-general, lord-admiral, and all other officers and commanders, both by sea and land, shall except all Irishmen, and all Papists born in Ireland, out of all capitulations, agreements, or compositions hereafter to be made with the enemy; and shall upon the taking of every such Irishman, or Papist born in Ireland, as aforesaid, forthwith put every such person to death. 3. That the lord-general, lord-admiral, and the committees of the several counties, do give speedy notice hereof to all subordinate officers and commanders by sea and land respectively; who are hereby required to use their utmost care and circumspection that this Ordinance be duly executed. And, 4. That every officer and commander, by sea or land, that shall be remiss or negligent in observing the tenor of this Ordinance, shall be reputed a favourer of that bloody Rebellion in Ireland; and shall be liable to such condign punishment, as the justice of both houses of parliament shall inflict upon him.”

A Fast appointed for the Success of the Parliament's Army in the West.] A general battle being daily expected, the parliament appointed the 22nd of this month, for a day of humiliation, to beg God's blessing on their armies now near the enemy, to be strictly observed within the lines of communication; and that no person presume to do any labour or open shop on that day. The ministers were ordered to give notice of it, in their churches, the next Lord's day; and the peers and their assistants to meet in their own house at nine, and to go in procession to the abbey for this purpose.

A Thanksgiving for the taking of Newcastle.] Oct. 25. A Thanksgiving was appointed by both houses, to be held the ensuing Lord's day, on the intelligence they had just then received from the Scots army in the North, of the taking of the town of Newcastle.

Oct. 26. An account came to the parliament, that their lord-general was taken ill; on which, because he was a person of so great worth,

Relation of the second Battle at Newbury.] Oct. 29. A Letter was read in the house of lords, giving an account of the Fight at Newbury; viz.

“My lords and gentlemen; As we wrote in our last Letter, and as we repeat lest that should miscarry, yesterday about 4 o'clock, the forces which went from Thatcham towards Newbury, by way of Wickham-Heath, made a very brisk attack upon a work and breast-work, well guarded with ordinance, horse and foot, which commanded all the ways which led to that side of the field betwixt Newbury and Donnington Castle, where the king's army was drawn up. The works were made very strong, although they had but little time; and the gaining of them would have lost much time, and been doubtful, if the foot, amongst whom my lord-general's particular force deserved very well, had not, with extraordinary resolution, stormed them: which they did within an hour after the first charge. Upon our unexpected entrance into their works, the foot, which secured them, all run and left the ordinance that were placed in and about the works. Major-General Skippon hazarded himself too much: sir Wm. Balfour used a great deal of diligence, there being but few field officers of horse. Sir Wm. Waller, sir A. Haslerig, sir James Allington, lieut. gen. Middleton, lieut. gen. Cromwell, major-general Crawford, major-general Holbourne, col. Greeves, and divers others, did very great service. The earl of Manchester, about 4 o'clock, endeavoured to force a passage through Shaw, a village on the other side of the field where the king's forces lay. Prince Maurice was on that side, and many of the king's best foot, who maintained these passes, although they were bravely assaulted. The earl of Manchester, for want of day light, and by reason of the great guards, did not take the passages; but his employing so many of the king's forces on that side was of great advantage to our other forces. The Battle lasted about 3 hours. They fought at least an hour by moon-shine. The earl of Manchester, and those on the other side, were ignorant of each other's success until the next morning. The earl of Cleveland was taken prisoner, and is sent up to London; and as we are told, colonel Goring's youngest brother was slain. Our side took 9 pieces of ordnance. Capt. Buller, one of my lord-general's captains, was slain: and major-general Skippon guesseseth that the number slain on both sides were between 2 and 300. The king's forces were all gone before this morning; but some few carts were left in the field, being so near us that they could not be taken off. All our horse and dragoons, except 1000 which stay with the earl of Manchester, are gone after the king's forces, which, we hear, are retreated towards Wellingford. We desire you to take into consideration how the foot army shall be disposed, and how they may be provided for. None of your provisions are as yet come, but we hope will be shortly. We desire to give God the glory of this victory, it being his work, and upon his day. The earl of Manchester marcheth to-morrow to Blewbury. We rest, my lords &c. A. Jonnston, Jo. Crew. Newbury, Oct. 28, 1644."

The Earl of Manchester and General Cromwell charge each other with Misconduct at it.] Though this Letter mentions a great victory, yet it seems the parliament did not believe it so; for the next day they kept their monthly Fast with great strictness, and no Thanksgiving was ever ordered upon it: and though some Letters of thanks, for the bravery of particular officers and soldiers at this Battle, follow in the sequel, yet others in high rank were questioned in parliament for misconduct at it; particularly the earl of Manchester, who was charged by lieutenant-general Cromwell "with having betrayed the parliament out of cowardice; for that he might, at the king's last being at Newbury, when he drew off his canon, very easily have defeated his whole army, if he would have permitted it to have been engaged: that he went to the earl, and shewed him evidently how it might be done; and desired him, that he would give him leave, with his own brigade of horse, to charge the king's army in their retreat; and the earl, with the rest of his army might look on, and do as he should think fit; but his lordship had, notwithstanding all importunity used by him and other officers, positively and obstinately refused to permit him."* On the other side, the earl charged Cromwell "with disobedience to his orders; who being commanded, as lieutenant-general of the horse, to be ready at such a place, by such an hour early in the morning, came not till the afternoon; and, by many particulars, made it clear to have been only his fault."† These disputes between the commanding officers gave occasion to the new-modelling of the parliament's forces soon after; whereby the earls of Essex and Manchester, sir Wm. Waller, and many other principal officers were laid aside; and was the foundation of lieutenant-general Cromwell's future great fortune.‡

The lord Paget leaves the King, and petitions the Parliament for Pardon.] We have already taken notice that the lord Paget,|| who had concurred with the parliament, in all their measures till the breaking out of the war, then left them, joined the king at York, and wrote a letter to the house of lords, setting forth his reasons for doing so: but his lordship, afterwards repenting him of his repentance, surrendered himself to the lord-general Essex at Plymouth: and now, being come to town, ad-

ressed the house of lords in the following Petition:

To the Rt. Hon. the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, The Humble PETITION of WILLIAM Lord PAGET,

"Sheweth; That the petitioner, being so unhappy as to be misled, hath contracted to himself a great measure of guilt, and justly merited your highest displeasure; yet he rather chose to render himself to your mercy, with the loss of the main part of his fortune, which is since destroyed by the power of the enemy, than to enjoy it out of your protection; or longer to continue where designs are carried on so violently against our religion and laws, and the security of both the power and privilege of parliament, by a factious and ill-affected party, that would build up their own ends and fortunes by the ruin and destruction of the public. Upon these considerations your petitioner resolved to renounce their society, and to return and prostrate his life and fortune at your feet, humbly desiring your honourable pardon, and to be received into your favour; and you may be fully assured that it is his only ambition, with all zeal and constancy, faithfully to serve you, and to obey all your commands, and pray for the happy success of all your great councils and armies at home and abroad. WM. PAGET."

Ordered, That this Petition be sent to the commons, with the lord-general's Letter to this house, concerning the lord Paget.—He was afterwards admitted to compound for his estate.

Nov. 4. A Thanksgiving was appointed, on the intelligence sent of the taking of Liverpool, with other good success in Lancashire, as the taking of 600 horse by colonel Rossiter, &c.

The Dutch Ambassadors repeat their Offer of Mediation to the Parliament.] Nov. 7. The Dutch Ambassadors renewed their application to both houses to accept of their Mediation, and pressed it again warmly, in the following Memorial addressed to the Speaker of the house of lords:

"My lord; We renew again, by these our instances unto the honourable the houses of parliament, begging to have an Answer to our Public Propositions of the 12th of July last; and to understand if the interposition, presented by our lords and superiors, might be acceptable. You may believe, that, being admitted, we shall proceed in it with all fidelity and sincerity; for we suffer in your evils, and prosper in your welfare, being so narrowly joined with you by union of consciences and all other prosperities; which admit of no doubt at all that we should not contribute all that lieth in our power to the strengthening of the true Christian religion, and re-establishing of just and true maxims for the welfare of these kingdoms. The proofs of this you shall have in our good endeavours, when acceptable: and the common interests of religion and state will sufficiently assure your honours, that never a greater and better unity and amity may be expected from any other state, than that which our lords and superiors will strive always to continue between these kingdoms and their republic of the United Provinces."

There is no further notice taken of this Memorial in the Journals; and it is probable, that the parliament chose rather to have the Propositions for Peace come from themselves, than accept of any mediation by others.

The Propositions of Peace, as finally agreed on by both Houses.] Nov. 8. The Propositions for Peace had been the subject of many days debate in the house of commons, and were voted, article by article, and even word by word, before they were wholly concluded on. This day the lords read and passed the said Propositions. We have already given the rough draught of them, as sent up by the committees of both kingdoms in April last: but the alterations, made therein, are so various that it will be necessary to exhibit them in the order they stand, as now perfected, in the Lords Journals.

"We your majesty's loyal subjects, assembled in the parliaments of both your kingdoms, from the sense of that duty we owe unto your majesty, and of the deep sufferings and many miseries under which your people of all your kingdoms lie bleeding in this unnatural war, after long and serious consultation about the best ways and means for their preservation, and for settling your majesty's throne and your subjects in peace and security, have, with common consent, resolved upon these Propositions, which we do humbly tender unto your majesty:

"The Humble DESIRES and PROPOSITIONS for a safe and well-grounded PEACE, agreed upon by the mutual Advice and Consent of the Parliaments of both Kingdoms, united by Solemn League and Covenant, to be presented to his majesty,

"I. That, by act of parliament in each kingdom respectively, all Oaths, Declarations, and Proclamations, against both or either of the houses of the parliament of England, and the late convention of the estates of Scotland, or committees flowing from the parliament or convention of estates in Scotland, or their ordinances and proceedings, or against any for adhering unto them; and all indictments, outlawries, and attainders against any for the said causes, be declared null, suppressed, and forbidden; and that this be publickly intimated in all parish churches within his majesty's dominions, and all other places needful.—II. That his majesty, according to the laudable example of his royal father of happy memory, may be pleased to swear to and sign the late Solemn League and Covenant; and that an act of parliament be passed in both kingdoms respectively, for enjoining the taking thereof by all the subjects of the three kingdoms; and the Ordinances concerning the manner of taking the same in both kingdoms, be confirmed by acts of parliament respectively, with such penalties as, by mutual advice of both kingdoms, shall be agreed upon.—III. That the bill be passed for the utter abolishing and taking away of all archbishops, bishops, their chancellors and commissaries, deans and sub-deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, canons, and prebendaries; and all chanters, chancellors, treasurers, sub-treasurers, succentors, and sacrists; and all vicars choral and choristers; old vicars and new vicars of any cathedral or collegiate church; and all other their under-officers, out of the church of England and dominion of Wales, and out of the church of Ireland, with such alterations concerning the estates of prelates, as shall agree with the Articles of the late Treaty, of the date at Edinburgh, 29th Nov. 1643, and joint Declarations of both kingdoms.—IV. That the Ordinance concerning the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines, be confirmed by act of parliament.—V. That the Reformation of Religion, according to the Covenant, be settled by act of parliament, in such manner as both houses shall agree upon after consultation had with the Assembly of Divines: and forasmuch as both kingdoms are mutually obliged by the same Covenant, to endeavour the nearest conjunction and uniformity in matters of religion, that such unity and uniformity in religion, according to the Covenant, as after consultation had with the divines of both kingdoms, now assembled, shall be jointly agreed upon by both houses of the parliament of England, and by the church and kingdom of Scotland, be confirmed by acts of parliament of both kingdoms respectively.—VI. That for the more effectual disabling Jesuits, Priests, Papists, and Popish Recusants from disturbing the state and eluding the laws, and for the better discovering and speedy conviction of recusants, an Oath be established by act of parliament, to be administred to them, wherein they shall abjure and renounce the Pope's supremacy, the doctrine of transubstantiation, purgatory, worshipping of the consecrated host, crucifixes, and images, and all other popish superstitions, and errors; and refusing the said Oath, being tendered in such manner as shall be appointed by the said act, to be sufficient conviction, in law, of recusancy.—VII. An act of parliament for Education of the children of Papists by Protestants, in the Protestant Religion.—VIII. An act for the true levying of the Penalties against them; which penalties to be levied and disposed in such manner as both houses shall agree on; wherein to be provided that his majesty shall have no loss.—IX. That an act be passed in parliament, whereby the practices of Papists against the state may be prevented, and the laws against them duly executed, and a stricter course taken to prevent the saying or hearing of mass in the court, or any other part of this kingdom.—X. The like for the kingdom of Scotland, concerning the four last preceding Propositions, in such manner as the estates of parliament there shall think fit.—XI. That the king do give his royal assent to an act for the due Observation of the Lord's Day; And to the bill for the Suppression of Innovations in churches and chapels, in and about the worship of God, and for the better advancement of the preaching of God's holy word in all parts of this kingdom; And to the bill against the enjoying of Pluralities of Benefices by spiritual persons, and, Non-residency; And to an act to be framed and agreed upon by both houses, for the reforming and regulating of both Universities of the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eaton; And to an act in like manner to be agreed upon for the suppressing of Interludes and Stage Plays. This act to be perpetual; And to an act for the taking the Accompts of the kingdom; And to an act to be made for relief of sick and maimed Soldiers, and of poor widows and children of Soldiers; And to such act or acts for raising of Monies, for the payment and satisfying of the Public debts and damages of the kingdom, and other public uses as shall hereafter be agreed on by both houses; And to an act or acts of parliament, for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries; and all wardships, liveries, primer seisin, and ouster les maines; and all other charges incident or arising for, or by reason of wardship, livery, primer seisin, or ouster les maines; And for the taking away of all Tenures by Homage, and all fines, licenses, seizures, and pardons for alienation, and all other charges incident thereunto; and for turning of all tenures by knight service, either of his majesty or others, or by knight service, or soccage in capite, of his majesty, into free and common soccage: and that his majesty will please to accept, in recompence hereof, 100,000*l.* per Annu. And give assurance of his consenting in the parliament of Scotland, to an act ratifying the acts of Convention of the Estates of Scotland called by the council and conservatory of peace and the commissioners for the common burdens, and assembled the 22nd of June, 1643, and several times continued since, in such manner, and with such additions, and other acts, as the estates convened in this present parliament shall think convenient.—XII. That an act be passed in the parliaments of both kingdoms respectively, for confirmation of the Treaties passed betwixt the two kingdoms, viz. the large Treaty, the late Treaty for the coming of the Scots army into England, and settling the garrison of Berwick, of the 29th of Nov. 1643, and the Treaty concerning Ireland, of the 6th of August, 1642, with all other Ordinances and Proceedings passed betwixt the two kingdoms, in pursuance of the said Treaties.—XIII. That an act be passed to make void the Cessation of Ireland, and all Treaties with the rebels, without consent of both houses, and to settle the prosecution of the war of Ireland in both houses, to be managed by the joint advice of both kingdoms; and the king to assist, and to do no act to discountenance or molest them therein.—XIV. That an act be passed in the parliament of both kingdoms respectively, for establishing the joint Declaration of both kingdoms, bearing date the 30th of Jan. 1643, in England, and 1644, in Scotland, with the qualifications following; 1. That the persons who shall expect no Pardon be only these following, Rupert and Maurice, count palatines of the Rhine, James Earl of Derby, John E. of Bristol, Wm. E. of Newcastle, Francis lord Cottington, John lord Pawlet, George lord Digby, Edw. lord Littleton, Wm. Laud abp. of Canterbury, Matthew Wren bp. of Ely, sir Rob. Heath, Dr. Brainhall, bishop of Derry, sir John Byron, sir Wm. Wildrington, col. George Goring, Henry Jermyn, esq. sir Ralph Hopton, sir F. Doddington, Mr. Eodymion Porter, sir G. Ratchiffe, sir M. Langdale, sir John Hotham, capt. John Hotham his son, sir H. Vaughan, sir F. Windebank, sir Rd. Greenville, Mr. Edw. Hyde, sir John Marley, sir Nich. Cole, sir Tho. Riddel jun. col. Ware, sir John Strangeways, sir John Colepeper, sir Rd. Floyd, John Bodvile, esq. Mr. David Jenkins, sir George Strode, sir Alex. Carew, Marquis of Huntley, earl of Montrose, earl of Niddesdale, earl of Traquaire, earl of Carnwath, viscount of Auboyne, lord Ogleby, lord Rae, lord Harris, Lodovick Lindsay sometime earl of Crawford, Patrick Ruthen sometime earl of Forth, James King sometime lord Ethyn, Irving younger of Drum, Gordon younger of Gight, Lesley of Auchintoul, sir Robert Spotiswood of Dunnipace, col. John Coehran, Mr. John Maxwell, sometime pretended bishop of Ross, Mr. Walter Balconquhal, and all such others, as being processed by the estates for treason, shall be condemned before the act of oblivion be pass'd. 2. All Papists and Popish Recusants, who have been, now are, or shall be, actually in arms or voluntarily assisting against the parliaments or estates of either kingdom. 3. All persons who have had any hand in the plotting, designing, or assisting the Rebellion in Ireland. 4. That Humphrey Bennet, esq. sir Edw. Ford, sir John Penruddock, sir George Vaughan, sir John Weld, sir Robert Lee, sir John Pate, John Ackland and Edmund Windham, esquires, sir John Fitz-Herbert, sir Edw. Laurence, sir Ralph Dutton, Henry Lingen, esq. sir Wm. Russell of Worcestershire, Tho. Lee of Adlington, esq. sir John Girlington, sir Paul Neal, sir Wm. Thorald, sir Edw. Hussey, sir Tho. Lyddel senior, sir Philip Musgrave, sir John Digby of Nottinghamshire, sir Henry Fletcher, sir Rd. Minshall, Laurence Halsteed and John Denham, esquires, sir Edm. Fortescue, Peter St. Hill, esq. sir Tho. Tildesley, sir H. Griffith, Michael Wharton, esq. sir H. Spiller, sir George Benion, sir Edw. Nicholas, sir Edw. Walgrave, sir Edw. Bishop, sir Robert Owsley, sir John Maney, lord Cholmondely, sir Tho. Aston, sir Lewis Dives, sir Peter Osborne, Samuel Thornton, esq. sir John Lucas, John Blomey, esq. sir Tho. Chedle, sir Nich. Kemish, and Hugh Lloyd, esq. and all such of the Scots nation as have concurred in the Votes at Oxford, against the kingdom of Scotland and their proceedings, or have sworn or subscribed the Declaration against the Convention and Covenant; and all such as have assisted the Rebellion in the North, or the invasion in the South of the said kingdom of Scotland, or the late invasion made there by the Irish and their adherents; and that the members of either house of parliament, who have not only deserted the parliament, but have also voted both kingdoms traitors, may be removed from his majesty's councils, and be restrained from coming within the verge of the court, and that they may not, without the advice and consent of both kingdoms, bear any office, or have employment concerning the state or common-wealth. And also, that the members of either house of parliament, who have deserted the parliament, and adhered to the enemies thereof, and not rendered themselves before the last of October, 1644, may be removed from his majesty's councils, and be restrained from coming within the verge of the court; and that they may not, without the advice and consent of both houses of parliament, bear any office, or have any employment concerning the state or common-wealth: and in case any of them shall offend therein, to be guilty of high treason, and incapable of any pardon by his majesty, and their estates to be disposed as both houses of parliament in England, or the estates of the parliament of Scotland, respectively, shall think fit. 5. That, by act of parliament, all Judges and Officers towards the law, common or civil, who have deserted the parliament and adhered to the enemies thereof, be made incapable of any place of judicature or office towards the law, common or civil: and that all serjeants, counsellors and attornies, doctors, advocates, and proctors of the law, common or civil, who have deserted the parliament, and adhered to the enemies thereof, be made incapable of any practice in the law, common or civil, either in public or in private: and that they, and likewise all bishops, clergymen, and other ecclesiastical persons, who have deserted the parliament, and adhered to the enemies thereof, shall not be capable of any preferment or employment, either in church or common-wealth, without the advice and consent of both houses of parliament. 6. The persons of all others to be free of all personal censure notwithstanding any act or thing done in or concerning this war, they taking the Covenant. 7. The estates of those persons, excepted in the first three preceding qualifications, to pay public debts and damages. 8. A third part in full value of the estates of the persons made incapable of any employment, as aforesaid, to be employed for the payment of the public debts and damages, according to the Declaration. 9. And likewise a tenth part of the estates of all other delinquents within the Joint Declarations; and in case the estates and proportions aforementioned, shall not suffice for the payment of the public engagements, whereunto they are only to be employed, that then a new proportion may be appointed by the joint advice of both kingdoms, providing it exceed not the one moiety of the estates of the persons made incapable as aforesaid; and that it exceed not a sixth part of the estate of the other delinquents. 10. That the persons and estates of all common soldiers and others of the kingdom of England, who, in lands or goods, be not worth 200*l.* sterling; and the person and estates of all common soldiers, and others of the kingdom of Scotland, who, in lands or goods be not worth 100*l.* sterling, be at liberty and discharged. 11. That an act be passed, whereby the Debts of the kingdom, and the persons of delinquents and the value of their estates, may be known; and which act shall appoint in what manner the confiscations and proportions before mentioned, may be levied and applied to the discharge of the said engagements.—XV. That, by act of parliament the subjects of the kingdom of England may be appointed to be armed, trained, and disciplined in such manner as both houses shall think fit. The like for the kingdom of Scotland, in such manner as the estates of parliament there shall think fit.—XVI. That an act be passed for the settling of the Admiralty and Forces at sea, and for raising such monies for maintenance of the said forces and of the navy, as both houses shall think fit; the like for the kingdom of Scotland, in such manner as the estates of parliament there shall think fit. XVII.—An act for the settling of all Forces both by sea and land, in commissioners to be nominated by both houses of parliament, of persons of known integrity, and such as both kingdoms may confide in, for their faithfulness to religion, and the peace of the kingdoms of the house of peers, and of the house of commons, who shall be removed or altered, from time to time, as both houses shall think fit; and when any shall die, others to be nominated in their places by the said houses: which commissioners shall have power, 1. To suppress any forces raised without authority of both houses, or in the intervals of parliaments, without consent of the said commissioners, to the disturbance of the public peace of the kingdoms, and to suppress any foreign forces that shall invade this kingdom; and that it shall be high treason in any who shall levy any force without such authority or consent, to the disturbance of the public peace of the kingdoms, any commission under the great seal, or warrant to the contrary notwithstanding; and they to be incapable of any pardon from his majesty, and their estates to be disposed of as both houses shall think fit. 2. To preserve the peace now to be settled, and to prevent all disturbance of the public peace that may arise by occasion of the late troubles. So for the kingdom of Scotland. 3. To have power to send part of themselves, so as they exceed not a third part, or be not under the number of , to reside in the kingdom of Scotland, to assist and vote as single persons with the commissioners of Scotland, in those matters wherein the kingdom of Scotland is only concerned. So for the kingdom of Scotland. 4. That the commissioners of both kingdoms may meet as a Joint Committee, as they shall see cause, or send part of themselves as aforesaid, to do as followeth: 1. To preserve the peace betwixt the kingdoms and the king, and every one of them. 2. To prevent the violation of the Articles of Peace as aforesaid, or any troubles arising in the kingdoms by breach of the said Articles, and to hear and determine all differences that may occasion the same according to the Treaty; and to do further according as they shall respectively receive instructions from both houses of parliament in England, or the estates of the parliament of Scotland; and, in the intervals of parliaments, from the commissioners for the preservation of the public peace. 3. To raise and join the forces of both kingdoms to resist all foreign invasions, and to suppress any forces raised within any of the kingdoms, to the disturbance of the public peace of the kingdoms, by any authority under the great seal, or other warrant whatsoever, without consent of both houses of parliament in England, and the estates of the parliament of Scotland, or the said commissioners of that kingdom whereof they are subjects; and that in those cases of joint concernment to both kingdoms, the commissioners to be directed to be there, all or such part as aforesaid, to act and direct as joint commissioners of both kingdoms. 4. To order the war of Ireland, according to the Ordinance of the 12th of April, and to order the Militia, and conserve the peace of the kingdom of Ireland.—XVIII. That his majesty give his assent to what the two kingdoms shall agree upon, in prosecution of the Articles of the Large Treaty, which are not yet finished.—XIX. That, by act of parliament, all peers, made since the day that Edward lord Littleton, then lord-keeper of the great seal, deserted the parliament, and that the said great seal was surreptitiously conveyed away from the parliament, being the 21st day of May 1642, and who shall be hereafter made, shall not sit or vote in the parliament of England, without consent of both houses of parliament; and that all honours and titles conferred on any, without consent of both houses since the 20th of May, 1642, being the day that both houses declared That the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to raise war against the parliament, be declared null and void. The like for the kingdom of Scotland, those being excepted whose patents were passed the great seal before the 4th of June, 1644.—XX. That, by act of parliament, the deputy or chief governor, or other governors of Ireland, be nominated by both houses of parliament; or, in the intervals of parliament, by the commissioners to continue during the pleasure of the said houses; or, in the intervals of parliament, during the pleasure of the aforementioned commissioners, to be approved or disallowed by both houses at the next sitting. And that the chancellor or lord-keeper, lord-treasurer, commissioners of the great seal or treasury, lord-warden of the cinque ports, chancellors of the exchequer and duchy, secretaries of state, judges of both benches, and of the exchequer, of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, be nominated by both houses of parliament, to continue quamdiu se bene gesserint; and, in the intervals of parliament, by the afore-mentioned commissioners, to be approved or disallowed by both houses at their next sitting. The like for the kingdom of Scotland, adding the justice-general, and in such manner as the estates in parliament there shall think fit.—XXI. That by act of parliament, the Education of your majesty's Children, and the children of your heirs and successors, be in the true protestant religion; and that their tutors and governors be of known integrity, and be chosen by the parliaments of both kingdoms, or, in the intervals of parliaments, by the afore-named commissioners, to be approved or disallowed by both parliaments at their next setting. And that, if they be males, they be married to such only as are of the true Protestant religion; if they be females, they may not be married but with the advice and consent of both parliaments; or, in the intervals of parliaments, by their commissioners.—XXII. That your majesty will give your royal assent to such ways and means as the parliaments of both kingdoms shall think fitting for the uniting of the Protestant princes; and for the entire restitution and re-establishment of Charles Lodovick, prince elector palatinate, his heirs and successors, to his electoral dignity, rights and dominions; provided that this extend not to prince Rupert or prince Maurice, or the children of either of them, who have been the instruments of so much bloodshed and mischief against both kingdoms. XXIII.—That by act of parliament, the concluding of peace and war with foreign princes and states, be with advice and consent of both parliaments; or, in the intervals of parliaments by their commissioners.—XXIV. That an Act of Oblivion be passed in the parliaments of both kingdoms respectively, relative to the qualifications in the Propositions aforesaid, concerning the Joint Declaration of both kingdoms, with the exception of all murderers, thieves and other offenders, not having relation to the war.—XXV. That the members of both houses of parliament, or others, who have, during this parliament, been put out of any place or office, pension or benefit, for adhering to the parliament, may either be restored thereunto, or otherwise have recompence for the same, upon the humble desire of both houses of parliament. The like for the kingdom of Scotland.—XXVI. That the Armies may be disbanded, at such time and in such manner as shall be agreed upon by the parliaments of both kingdoms, or such as shall be authorized by them to that effect.—XXVII. That an act be passed for the granting and confirming of the charters, customs, liberties and franchises of the city of London notwithstanding any nonuser, misuser or abuser. That the Militia of the city of London may be in the ordering and government of the lord mayor, aldermen and commons, in common-council assembled, or such as they shall, from time to time, appoint, whereof the lord mayor and sheriffs for the time being to be three. And that the militia of the parishes without London, and the liberties within the weekly bills of mortality, may be under command of the lord mayor, aldermen and commons, in common-council of the said city, to be ordered in such manner as shall be agreed on and appointed by both houses of parliament. That the Tower of London may be in the government of the city of London, and the chief officer and governor thereof, from time to time, be nominated and removeable by the common council. That the citizens or forces of London shall not be drawn out of the city into any other parts of the kingdom, without their own consent; and that the drawing of their forces into other parts of the kingdom in these distracted times, may not be drawn into example for the future. And for prevention of inconveniences, which may happen by the long intermission of common-councils, it is desired that there be an act, that all bye-laws and ordinances already made, or hereafter to be made, by the lord mayor, aldermen and commons, in common-council assembled, touching the calling, continuing, directing, and regulating of the same, shall be as effectual in law, to all intents and purposes, as if the same were particularly enacted by the authority of parliament: and that the lord mayor, aldermen and commons, in common-council, may add to, or repeal the said Ordinances from time to time as they shall see cause. That such other Propositions as shall be made for the city, for their farther safety, welfare, and government, and shall be approved of by both houses, may be granted and confirmed by act of parliament. Now, therefore we humbly beseech your majesty to grant these Propositions, which are presented for the peace and public good of your kingdoms; and as we therein, according to our trust and duty, have regard to the glory of God, and the quiet and welfare of your people; so shall we really endeavour that your majesty may live in the splendour and glory of your royal ancestors, and which becometh your royal place and dignity."

Commissioners appointed to carry the Propositions for Peace to the King.] Nov. 9. This day a report was made, by the earl of Northumberland, of what the committee of both kingdoms had considered as to the manner of sending the Propositions for Peace to the king; That as both the secretaries of state* were persons excepted by the parliament, in the Propositions, they thought it fit that a Letter should be written from the lord-general to the general of the king's army; and a copy of the Letter intended to be sent was read. This was no more than to desire a Safe-Conduct for the members of both houses, appointed to carry these Propositions to the king, and receive his Answer to them, which they were to bring back with all convenient speed. The commissioners named for this purpose were, Basil earl of Denbigh, Wm. lord Maynard, members of the house of peers; Thomas lord viscount Wenman, hon. Denzil Hollis, hon. Wm. Pierpoint and Bulstrode Whitlocke, esqrs. members of the commons; John lord Maitland, sir Ch. Erskin, knt. and Mr. Robert Barclay, from the Estates of the Parliament of Scotland.—The earl of Denbigh, the first of these commissioners, had been questioned by the parliament, on some complaints made against him for his misconduct as an officer in their army; and before the commons would allow him to be a commissioner, they debated all the Articles against him in their house; these Articles were chiefly jealousies against him for favouring delinquents, &c. but which occasioned no less than four divisions of that house in one day; in one of which the question being put, Whether the earl of Denbigh stood clear of any disaffection to the public service, or breach of trust reposed in him by parliament? the numbers were 48 against 33; so that this question passing in the negative, it was first resolved, That the earl of Denbigh should not be sent down to his command in the associated army; but, next, that he was deservedly employed upon the service of going with the Propositions for Peace to his majesty.

Nov. 17. The king having been applied to for a Safe-Conduct to the parliament's commissioners for Peace, this day their lord-general returned it, along with the following Letter from prince Rupert to the lord-general, which was read in the house of lords:

"My lord; I herewithal send your lordship two Safe-Conducts from his majesty, according as is desired by you. His majesty's affections for Peace being such as, although he could never receive any Answer to those gracious invitations to a Treaty, which have been made by him of late, yet he would not lose the least time in retarding his to you, upon so welcome a subject as Propositions for Peace. I shall only add, that his majesty would have been very glad that this overture had been made in such a manner, as that it might, forthwith, have been accompanied with a Cessation of Arms; but, since you have not thought fit to do it in such a way, I shall declare to your lordship, that this message does not set any stop to the proceedings of his majesty's army; and so I rest Your, &c. RUPERT. Marlborough, Nov. 15. 1644."

The Commons resolve to lay a Tax upon Places of Profit.] Nov. 18. At this time it was, that the commons seemed to be so straitened for money, that they came to a Resolution to tax all Places of Profit, especially those that were enjoyed by the members of either house. A large committee was appointed for this purpose; who were to enquire into the value and nature of all the offices and places, and other advantages, bestowed by parliament; who were the persons that enjoyed them; and to consider what allowance was to be made out of them to the persons that execute them, and what to the public.

The King's first Answer to the Commissioners, after their presenting the Propositions for Peace.] Nov. 30. The earl of Denbigh, one of the commissioners for Peace, reported to the lords, "That, according to their commands, he, with the rest, delivered the Propositions to his majesty, for a safe and well-grounded Peace: that, on the 27th instant, they received from the king the following Paper, with these words, 'This is my Answer, and you must take it and carry it to those that sent you;' which Paper was read in these words:

"C. R. The Propositions, newly presented to his majesty, being very long; and containing matters in them of very great moment and importance, as being, in great part, an alteration of the frame of government, both in church and state; and the messengers, who presented them, declaring that they had no power to treat or to consent to any alteration, it cannot be expected that his majesty should return a present, particular, and positive Answer: but as he hath, from his soul, always desired the settling a happy Peace in this distracted kingdom; and to that purpose hath, from time to time, made all possible overtures; so he hopes that God will so work upon the hearts of all persons concerned, that even this application, such as it is, upon further thought and consideration, may produce some good effects towards it; to the which his majesty calls God to witness, there shall be nothing wanting on his part, which is agreeable to honour, justice, and conscience. There shall all possible expedition be used in preparing his majesty's Answer, which he intends speedily to send by messengers of his own; and, to that purpose, that there may be no loss of time, he desires a Safe-Conduct may be presently sent for the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton, with their attendants, to bring up his majesty's said Answer. And his majesty doth heartily wish that God may so deal with him, and his, as he endeavours all just and lawful ways to restore this poor kingdom to a lasting, happy, and blessed Peace. Given at our Court at Oxford, Nov. 24, 1644."

The Report of what passed upon that Occasion, at Oxford.] Dec. 3. The earl of Denbigh further reported, "That he having advised with the rest of the commissioners about the several particulars concerning their delivery of the Propositions to the king, they had drawn up a Narrative thereof, which he presented to the house as follows:

"Upon Saturday the 23rd of Nov. being at Reading, and having notice from the governor of Wallingford, that the king would be that night at Oxford, we sent thence a trumpeter, and some servants with him, to provide our lodgings at Oxford, and a Letter to the governor there to that purpose. Ourselves followed some two hours after; and, when we came near the town, we sent another trumpeter, who sounding near the guards, a file of musketeers came to us, desiring us to tarry there till our lodgings were ready. We staid there some two hours; and then Mr. Killigrew came riding to us, and said, 'His majesty knew not that we were there until he came into the garden, and saw us where we stood upon the hill, and was very angry we staid so long; but that he had taken order we should be admitted and provided for immediately; and that he was come to tell us so.' Just at that time came likewise the lieutenant-governor of Oxford, who brought us into the town, carried us to an Inn, at the sign of the Catherine-Wheel, and told us he had provided some chambers at another Inn, the Star, for the Scots commissioners.—That night we sent to the duke of Richmond, desiring him to acquaint his majesty, that we were a committee sent from the parliament of both kingdoms, with Propositions of Peace; and to know when his majesty would be pleased we should attend him with them: he sent us word, The king had appointed the next day, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, for us to attend him at Christ-Church, which we did, in the garden there. And, after we had kissed his hand, we presented the Propositions to him, which were read by the earl of Denbigh, and were heard by his majesty with a great deal of patience; so as there being some noise and disorder among the standers-by, upon mentioning the names of the two princes, Rupert and Maurice, amongst the persons excepted out of the general Pardon, his majesty was angry at it; reproved them for it, and commanded them to be silent. The Propositions being read, he asked us, 'If we had power to treat?' We answered, 'We had not: that our commission was to present the Propositions, and to desire his Answer in writing.' His majesty replied, 'We should have it as soon he could.'—On Wednesday in the evening the earl of Dorset sent a gentleman to us to let us know, 'That his majesty had resolved on his Answer, which we might receive that night, or in the morning, as we would.' Unto which we answered, 'That we were ready to attend his majesty at what time he pleased to command us.' The messenger speedily returned, and brought us word, 'His majesty was ready to give us his Answer speedily.' We forthwith attended him at Christ-Church; where his majesty delivered a Paper to one that stood by, and commanded him to read it to us: after the reading whereof, his majesty used these words, as near as we can recollect, 'That he had ever expressed his desire of Peace, which did never more appear than by giving this Answer; and if he had not a great desire to Peace he would not have given it.'—Upon hearing the Paper read, the earl of Denbigh, at our desire, did move his majesty that we might withdraw and attend him again presently; upon which his majesty demanded, if we had power to treat, and said, 'He knew we had none; for we had told him so; that we had received no power from London since; and he bid us answer, as persons of honour, if we had received any: I know,' says he, 'you have had no post since.' The earl of Denbigh moved again, that we might withdraw for a little time, or have the liberty to attend his majesty again before our return, as conceiving our Instructions would engage us to some reply to the Paper delivered to us. Then his majesty said, 'I will hear any thing you have to deliver from London, but none of the fancies and chimeras taken up at Oxford, by your favour;' and added, 'You shall put no tricks upon me.' The earl of Denbigh answered, 'We were not persons to put tricks upon any, much less upon his majesty.' The king replied, 'I mean it not to you.' Then, by our advice, the earl of Denbigh desired of his majesty to know, to whom that Paper was directed. The king said, 'It is my Answer; I give it to you; it is your duty to take it; you may deliver it to them that sent you.' The earl of Denbigh pressing it a second time, the king replied, 'You must take it, if it were a Ballad, or a Song of Robin Hood:' and said further, 'You told me twice you had no power to treat, my memory is as good as yours, you were only to deliver the Propositions; a position might have done as much as you.' The earl of Denbigh replied, 'That was not our condition, though we would be glad, in these distracted times, to do his majesty and the kingdom service in any condition.' His majesty replied, 'I mean it not to your persons.' Then Mr. Hollis said to the king, 'Sir, we had in charge to bring the Propositions to you, and to desire your Answer in writing, which we have, with all humility, done: the reason why the earl of Denbigh desired we might withdraw, was, that we might consult with our Instructions; because the Paper delivered unto us hath no direction, and therefore we beseech your majesty, to let us know to whom it must be delivered;' to which the king said, 'I am not bound to answer that question.' Mr. Hollis replied, 'If we can have no other Answer, we must carry this.' Then Mr. Pierpoint said, 'Our Instructions are only to deliver the Propositions unto your majesty, to desire your Answer in writing, and to return with it; but in this Paper, delivered by your majesty there is a Message.' His majesty to this said, 'That is all one, this is my Answer; if it were a Song of Robin Hood you must carry it:' and, after a pause he added, 'I desire you to further the procuring of the Safe-Conduct, than which you cannot do better service to the kingdom. I, and these honest men about me, are most desirous of Peace: there are three things I will not part with, the church, my crown, and my friends, and you will have much ado to get any of these from me. I will not press you to go presently, you may, if you will, stay some time; but the sooner you send me a Safe-Conduct

'the better.' So we kissed his majesty's hand, and came away to our lodgings. The next morning, Mr. Ashburnham came to the members of both houses, and said, he was sent from the king to every one of them severally, to deliver a Message, which was to this effect, 'That his majesty was sensible some words might have fallen from him in his passion, that might give discontent; that it was not so intended by him: and he desired that the best construction might be made of it.' To this they answered, severally, and, afterwards, all together, 'That they took this Message for a very great honour, and desired him to express their humble thanks to his majesty in the best language he could.' Afterwards, being ready to take coach, another Message was brought us from his majesty, 'That we would tarry a little till a trumpeter might be ready to go along with us, who was sent by him to bring the Safe-Conduct;' which we did, and accordingly he is come with us for that purpose."

After reading this Narrative, the lords appointed the lord-general Essex, the lord admiral Warwick, the earls of Northumberland, Denbigh, Manchester, and Sarum, the viscount Say and Sele, and the lord North, as a committee to withdraw presently, and consider what was fit to be done upon it, and report their opinion to the house. The result of which was, That after a conference had with the other house about this matter, it was resolved to grant a Safe-conduct to the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton and their attendants, to bring from his majesty, to the two houses of parliament, his further Answer to their Propositions; and the rest was referred to the consideration of the committee for the safety of the two kingdoms, who were to deliver their advice about it to the house.—The same day that the earl of Denbigh made the foregoing report to the lords, Mr. Hollis presented a Narrative thereof to the commons, which is entered in their Journals: but all the particulars therein being much more amply related above, we pass this over with observing, That though that house resolved, That they did approve of the proceedings and carriage of their committee, acknowledged the good service performed by them, and returned them all thanks for their faithful management of this business: yet Mr. Hollis* and Mr. Whitlocke† were both questioned afterwards for some private conversation which passed, at this time, between the king and them at Oxford.

Proceedings on Matters of Religion—Complaint against a Preacher for uttering Blasphemy.] The Assembly of Divines had sat all this while, in die ad diem, in Westminster Abby, about a thorough Reformation in Religious Matters; amongst which they had been busy, for some time, in compiling a Directory for the Service of God; and so much of it as was done, they presented to the lords. The commons also discussed all these points in their house, in such a manner as they must then have appeared more like a Synod of the Clergy, than the lay representatives of the people: for not a single article, either for ordination of priests, administration of the sacraments, &c. but what was first debated, and then received the sanction of that house. This had continued, by intervals, for several months together. But we shall not meddle with these religious disputes any further than as the parliament was concerned in them, and we find them in their Journals. Those authorities inform us, That the Directory being at last settled by both the Assembly of Divines and the house of commons, it was presented to the lords by the first of these only, for their approbation. On the presentment thereof, Nov. 30, Dr. Burgess, one of the Assembly, delivered in another Paper; which, he said, they all trembled to think on; but, to discharge their duty to God, they could not but reveal it to their lordships. The Paper was read as follows:

Certain BLASPHEMIES delivered in a private House in a Sermon by Thomas Webb, in Queen-street, in Covent-Garden, about Sept. 27, 1644.

"1. That place in Genesis, vi. 6. where it is said, 'God repented that he made man,' was untrue; and so other places of Scripture. 2. That a man is to believe according to his reason; for he that believeth contrary to his reason, it is a lye to himself. 3. That the Prince of the Air, that rules in the children of disobedience, is God; and that there was no other spirit but one, which spirit is God. 4. That we did look for great matters from one crucified at Jerusalem 1600 years ago; but that would do us no good; it must be a Christ formed in us, in the deity united to our humanity. 5. One of his company, before the exercise, endeavoured to prove that Christ doubted when he cried, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' One asked him, What he believed Christ came into the world for? He answered, To live 32 years, and to die; and nothing else that he knew of. And Mr. Webb, when he spake of Christ, seemed to speak with derision. 6. He thought once a righteousness without him should have saved him; but his exhortation was, Let your rejoicings be in yourselves and not in another. 7. That we should think of ourselves no better than was meet, for God loved the creature that crept upon the ground as well as the best saint; and he knew no difference between his flesh and the flesh of a toad. 8. He said that a drunkard did the will of God. 9. That the soul died with the body; and that all things should have an end, but that God should remain for ever."

Dr. Burgess further declared, "That Mr. Grange, a man of credit, can prove these particulars, and produce others to make them good." Hereupon the lords ordered, That the gentleman usher attending that house, or his deputy, shall attach Thomas Webb, and bring him forthwith before the lords in parliament, to answer this charge; and then they will proceed against him.

The Parliament's Answer to the Dutch Ambassadors Offer of Mediation.] Dec. 5. The Ambassadors from the States General having now waited, a long time, for an Answer to their Paper formerly delivered to parliament, applied to the lord general for a pass to go to the king at Oxford; with a purpose, as they intimated, not to return again. The lords being told of this, sent a message to the commons to expedite the Answer, which had laid all this time before them; and accordingly it was sent up the next day, read and agreed to as follows:

"The parliament of England do, with all respectful gratitude, acknowledge the great and good affection of the high and mighty lords the States General of the United Provinces, expressed by their Ambassadors, towards the good, peace, and happiness, of these his majesty's dominions and the parliament; as also their friendly offer to interpose, and use their best endeavours for the effecting thereof, in case it be so desired: nor had there been so much time intermitted therein, the maintaining and seeking of Peace having ever been our chief aim, had we not, before this offer of my lords ambassadors, put ourselves in a way of humbly seeking to his majesty to re-obtain a well-grounded Peace, by preparing certain Propositions tending thereunto; which, upon the common interest of both kingdoms, have, until of late, remained in the hands of the States of Scotland; and being returned from thence, are lately sent and presented, by a committee of both kingdoms, to his majesty, from whom we hope to receive a gracious Answer; they tending both to his own, as also his people's good: however, we cannot but express our due sense of the good respect from the high and mighty lords the States General of the United Provinces to this kingdom, in their desires to advance this happy Peace; which will have so great an influence upon the future good or evil of all professing the Protestant religion, and in particular the high and mighty states of the United Provinces; whose prosperity, as our own, we shall, with all true affection, promote."

This Answer was delivered to the Ambassadors, by the house of lords, under the same ceremonies with which their Propositions were received.

The Dutch Ambassadors Remonstrance against the Parliament's last Answer.] Dec. 13. When the States Ambassadors were introduced the last time, they were not suffered to speak, but were told, If they had any thing to say in Answer, the lords would receive it in writing. Accordingly, the following Paper was delivered this day to the house and read; but no further notice was then taken of it:

"The Ambassadors of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, having audience from both the honourable houses of parliament of England, to receive an Answer to their Propositions of the 12th of July last, have received a certain writing from their honours, to which they remonstrate, as follows: 1. That they have sent the said writing to their lords and superiors the States General, &c. who may consider if they find there any Answer to their so amiable and cordial Presentation; but, in the opinion of the said Ambassadors, (for they presented the interposition of the States in order to help forward a good accommodation of the differences between the king and his parliament) it was not expressed clearly and categorically in the said writing, whether the said interposition presented to their honours be convenient and acceptable to them or not. 2. That the Proposition of the said Ambassadors (besides the interposition presented) contained also a demand of restitution and payment of damages of the goods and ships belonging to the subjects of the United Provinces, and taken by the ships and people of the parliament, for which they could not hitherto obtain justice nor a perfect restitution. 3. And lastly, The said Ambassadors, by their said Propositions, have demanded a regulation for the future; which is, That the liberty of navigation and of commerce, be permitted in all the havens, ports, and places of England, Scotland, and Ireland, indifferently and without exception of places: and there being exhibited to the said Ambassadors a certain draught of an Ordinance, they were promised the same should be taken into more mature consideration; and they expected an Answer from the parliament thereupon, before the said Ordinance be put in execution; which the said Ambassadors, yet to this day, expect from the equity of both the honourable houses of parliament. Dec. 12, 1644."

Sir J. Hotham petitions for a Respite of his Execution.] Dec. 14. About this time it was that sir John Hotham and his son, so often mentioned for their fidelity and services to the parliament's cause, were tried by their newly made martial law, for betraying it, and sentenced to death. And this day we find a Petition from the former was presented to the Lords, signifying, 'That he being condemned to die by a court martial,* and Monday the 16th ordered for his execution, he was much straitened in time for the settlement of those things which concern both himself and his estate; and therefore prayed to have more time allowed him.' This Petition was referred to the other house for their concurrence in allowing sir John time for ten days longer; but the messengers finding the commons busy about private affairs, were not admitted; the lords therefore recommend it to the court martial to reprieve him for that time, if they saw no cause to the contrary.

ampton bring the King's Answer to the Parliament's Propositions for Peace.] Dec. 16. It was notified to the lords that the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton were come to town, with an Answer from the king to the Propositions of both houses; and they desired to know in what manner they should address themselves. On which a committee of 6 lords was appointed to meet with a proportionable number of the commons, to consider of the manner of their reception. This affair being pressing, it was agreed to hear the report in the afternoon. Accordingly, the earl of Northumberland, from the committee, acquainted the lords, That it was their opinion a select committee of both houses should be appointed to receive the two lords in the Painted Chamber, the Scots commissioners to be there also present at 4 o'clock in the afternoon the next day; sir Peter Killigrew to be sent to wait upon them to the place where they were to repose themselves. The manner of sitting in the Painted Chamber, to be thus; the lords commissioners to sit on one side of the table, and the Scots commissioners on the other side; the two lords who came from the king to sit on a short form at the upper end of the table, the committee of the house of commons upon a form behind the lords.

Dec. 17. The report of this reception was made in the house of lords by the lord-general, who said, That the two lords from the king had delivered to the committee two Papers, after an introduction from the duke of Richmond to this effect:

"My lord and gentlemen; We are commanded by his majesty, together with his Answer which we bring, to present to you the assurance of his real and earnest desires of Peace; which, he conceives, cannot so well appear by any expressions in words, as by those proofs his actions shall make, whensoever it shall be put into a way of trial; which he very much desires may be with all speed."

Then the King's Answer was read in hæc verba:

"C. R. His majesty has seriously considered your Propositions; and finds it very difficult, in respect they import so great an alteration in government, both in the church and state, to return a particular and positive Answer before a full debate, wherein those Propositions, and all the necessary explanations and reasons for assenting, dissenting, or qualifying, and all inconveniences and mischiefs which may ensue, and cannot otherwise be so well foreseen, may be discussed and weighed. His majesty therefore proposeth and desireth, as the best expedient for Peace, That you will appoint such a number of persons as you shall think fit, to treat with the like number of persons to be appointed by his majesty, upon the said Propositions, and such other things as shall be proposed by his majesty, for the preservation and defence of the protestant religion, (with due regard to the ease of tender consciences, as his majesty hath often offered) the rights of the crown, the liberty and property of the subject, and the privileges of parliament; and, upon the whole matter, to conclude a happy and blessed Peace. Given at our Court at Oxon, Dec. 13. 1644."

The Parliament's Reply to the King's Answer.] Dec. 19. The lords went upon the matter of the king's last Message, and it was ordered to send to the house of commons to let them know, That upon consideration of the said Message, the lords thought fit to refer it to the committee of both kingdoms, with the addition of three lords, that they may advise what Answer was fit to be given to it, and to report it to the houses: and that they would appoint a proportionable number of their house for that purpose. The additional lords were the earls of Pembroke and Salisbury, and the lord Howard: but it was afterwards agreed at a conference, That 14 lords and 28 commons should be a committee, to whom the king's Message was to be referred, and to advise with the Scots commissioners on occasion, for the sake of expedition, that so the messengers sent from the king might speedily return.

Dec. 19. p. m. The earl of Northumberland reported, "That the select committees of both houses have met, and have advised with the Scots commissioners touching the king's Message; and they offer to their lordships consideration their opinion, viz. To report to both houses, that this committee and the commissioners of Scotland are of opinion, that there be a Treaty for a safe and well-grounded Peace; with such Instructions and in such manner as shall be agreed upon by the two houses, and the commissioners for the kingdom of Scotland. And because the committee thinks that, if the two lords sent from the king should stay here until the two houses have resolved of all particulars concerning the manner of the Treaty, it would be too long, and inconveniences would happen thereupon; the committee, with the advice of the commissioners of Scotland, have prepared an Answer to be sent to the king, by the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton;" which was offered to the consideration of the houses, and read as follows:

"May it please your excellent majesty; We your majesty's humble and loyal subjects of both kingdoms, have considered of your majesty's Message of the 13th Dec. 1644, sent by the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton, directed to the lords and commons assembled in the parl. of England at Westminster, and to the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland now at London; and do, in all humbleness, return this Answer, That we do consent there be a Treaty for a safe and well-grounded Peace; but find that it will require some time to resolve concerning the Instructions and manner of that Treaty: and therefore that your majesty might not be held in suspense, touching our readiness to make use of any opportunity for obtaining such a blessed and happy Peace in all your majesty's dominions, we would not stay your majesty's messengers till we did resolve upon all those particulars; which we will take into our serious consideration, and present our humble desires therein to your majesty, with all convenient speed."

An Ordinance for keeping a Fast on Christmas-Day.] The lords and commons having long since appointed a day for a Fast and Humiliation, which was to be on the last Wednesday in every month, it happening to fall on Christmas day this month, the Assembly of Divines sent to acquaint the lords with it: and, to avoid any inconveniences that might be by some people keeping it as a Feast and others as a Fast, they desired that the parliament would publish a Declaration, the next Lord's day, in the churches of London and Westminster; that that day might be kept as it ought to be, that the whole kingdom might have comfort thereby. The houses agreed to this proposal, and directed the following Ordinance to be published; which bore this title:

An Ordinance for the better observation of the Feast of the Nativity of Christ.

"Whereas some doubts have been raised, whether the next Fast shall be celebrated, because it falleth on the day which, heretofore, was usually called the Feast of the Nativity of our Saviour; the lords and commons do order and ordain that public notice be given, That the Fast appointed to be kept on the last Wednesday in every month, ought to be observed until it be otherwise ordered by both houses: and that this day particularly is to be kept with the more solemn humiliation, because it may call to remembrance our sins and the sins of our forefathers who have turned this Feast, pretending the memory of Christ, into an extreme forgetfulness of him, by giving liberty to carnal and sensual delights; being contrary to the life which Christ himself led here upon earth, and to the spiritual life of Christ in our souls; for the sanctifying and saving whereof Christ was pleased both to take a human life, and to lay it down again."

The lords ordered, That the lord mayor of London take care that this Ordinance should be dispersed to all churches and chapels, within the line of communication and bills of mortality. Afterwards it was made general through the kingdom; in consequence of which Christmas day was no longer observed as a Festival, by law, till the Restoration.

Farther Proceedings in relation to the intended Treaty of Peace.] Dec. 20. The Answer to the king's last Message being now made ready, and signed by the Speakers of both houses, it was ordered to be delivered in the same form the Message was received from those that brought it. Accordingly, the Answer being read to them, the two lords said, They had something to deliver by command from the king, which they delivered in writing, viz.

"My lords and gentlemen; We shall obey your commands in presenting this to the king, and withal desire we may present you what we have in command from him. We observed, when we waited on you last, your lordships desired to receive all in writing; in conformity to it, if your lordships please to assign how it shall be received to-morrow morning, we shall accordingly prepare the best we can, to give you satisfaction."—And then the two lords withdrew.

After some debate in both houses it was agreed, That the same committee should receive what the two lords had to deliver further from the king, that afternoon.

Dec. 21. The earl of Northumberland reported to the lords, That the joint committee of both houses, and the commissioners of Scotland, had received from the king's messengers the following Paper, which was read;

"My lords and gentlemen; We are commanded by his majesty to let you know, that it is his desire, before our going hence, we might receive a resolution to that part of his majesty's desire, expressed in his Message of the 13th Dec. 1644, concerning your treating with him by fit persons to be appointed on either party; that so, according to what hath been agreed upon, we may have opportunity to offer what else we have in charge from his majesty, in order to the procuring of an happy Peace. But yet his majesty earnestly desires, That the way proposed by him may be agreed unto, as that which he conceives to be the most likely means speedily to draw on an happy and well-grounded Peace; whereas, otherwise, the distance of the place, which his majesty is most likely to reside in, as also many other respects, will extremely lengthen the Treaty, and defer the attaining that happy end, a blessed Peace, which his majesty, above all other things, so earnestly desires; and consequently be a cause of the further effusion of his subjects blood, besides the many other losses to the kingdom; which his majesty is so desirous to prevent, that as he will readily do what else shall be requisite on his part, so he will most willingly give such power to the persons imployed by him, as there shall be little or no loss of time upon that occasion. The compassionate sense his majesty hath of the misery and calamity the kingdom doth suffer by this unnatural war, prevailing so far, that he is as earnest in seeking out the remedy, as if he himself were the only sufferer."

Upon receiving this Paper, the committee of both houses, with the concurrence of the commissioners of Scotland, returned this Answer, "We shall presently report this Paper delivered in by your lordships; but we are directed by the houses of parliament to know of your lordships, If you have any thing farther in charge from his majesty to deliver to the houses? If your lordships have, this committee hath power and order now to receive it." The Reply of the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton was this; "We conceive that we may have something farther in charge from his majesty to deliver to your lordships, after you shall have declared your Resolution concerning the managing of the Treaty betwixt his majesty and your lordships, by persons on either part; but have nothing else, at this time, to offer."—The earl having ended his Report, and the same having been made to the commons by their committee, it was agreed, that the select committee should deliver the following Answer:

"My lords; The desire expressed in the last Papers given in by your lordships, is a part of his majesty's Message of the 13th of Dec. and concerns the manner of Treaty; which, according to the Answer already given, will require some time to resolve on: it is therefore the desire of both houses of parliament, and of the commissioners from Scotland, That your lordships would be pleased speedily to make your repair unto his majesty, with the Answer already given to his majesty's Message, brought up by your lordships."

Dec. 23. The Speaker told the house of lords, That the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton had sent to desire him to let their lordships know, that they had commands from the king not to depart from thence, after their Answer, till they should hear from him. But notwithstanding this, it seems, by the Journals, that the two lords did remove this day; for we find an Order of the lords to the lord-general, to appoint an officer to wait on them through the parliament's guards and forces, to see they had no incivilities offered to them. Some time after it was agreed by both houses, That the manner of the treaty might be referred to the committee of 14 lords and 28 commoners, joined with the Scots commissioners as before.

Sir J. Hotham's Petition for a farther Reprieve. Dec. 24. The lords received the following Petition from sir John Hotham, shewing; "That he being exceedingly sensible that he lies under their lordships just displeasure, besides many other grievous burdens, which hath discomposed his mind from that just temper in which he is desirous to depart this life; and seeing that his son's Trial is not yet perfected, the doubtful issue of which hath much hindered the settlement of all his affairs, and driven him into great anxiety of mind, whereby their lordships favour of the ten days last reprieve was rendered, in some manner, less fruitful to him; he therefore humbly prays, that their lordships would grant him such further time as, in their wisdoms, shall seem expedient. JOHN HOTHAM."—The lords sent this Petition down to the commons with a Message, "That they were willing to condescend to it; and the rather, because some Divines had certified that sir John was not in any settled state or condition of mind, for his soul's safety, so as yet to die; and that they had thought fit to reprieve him till the 6th Jan. next, to which they desired the concurrence of that house." The commons fell into a debate of this matter, and the question being put, Whether to agree with the lords? It passed in the negative. But another question being put, Whether to respite the execution of sir John Hotham for any further time? The house divided, and it was carried in the affirmative, 85 against 65, Oliver Cromwell being one of the tellers for the Noes. By this vote sir John got a reprieve for one week longer.

Another Petition from Sir J. Hotham, for sparing either his own, or his Son's Life.—But both are executed.] Dec. 28. Another Petition from sir John Hotham, was read in the lords, “Humbly shewing; That this honourable house's clemency, already experienced, emboldeneth the petitioner to present to their considerations the sad condition of his dejected family; himself and his son being under the heavy sentence of death, and so much the sadder as that they once enjoyed a plentiful measure of their favours; from which, by too many of their own defects, they are now unfortunately fallen. The weight of their lordships just displeasure, under which he now lies, cuts him off from all hopes and claims of former merit, further than what their own free goodness shall intitle him to. He therefore humbly casts himself at their lordships feet, in full submission to their just authority; desiring that, in judgment they will remember mercy; and if such ample measure of their favour, as the petitioner's natural affection, equally prepense to himself and his own bowels, might desire, may not in justice be affordeth to both; yet that his whole family, that was the first that drew their swords in this cause, may not be cut off root and branch; but that a remnant (according as to their just wisdom shall seem most meet) may be left as a monument of this house's clemency to all posterity: and the petitioner, which way soever their lordships favour and wisdom shall incline, shall rest fully satisfied; and shall, in life or death, acknowledge himself ever bound to pray, &c. JOHN HOTHAM.”

The house taking this Petition into consideration, and weighing the former merits and good services of sir J. Hotham, it was resolved; That this Petition shall be sent down to the commons, and that they be desired to concur with this house, that sir John's life may be spared. Accordingly,

Dec. 30. The lords renewed their address to the commons, concerning the sparing of sir J. Hotham's life, and desired their Answer speedily, because the next day was assigned for his execution. But no Answer coming, the first thing we find in the Lords Journals of the 31st of this month, is a reprieve entered for sir John Hotham until Saturday, the 4th of January, following. The warrant was directed to the lieutenant of the Tower, the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, to the provost-marshal, &c. Though, on the close of this day, we find that the commons did send a message up to let the lords know, That they saw no cause but that the execution of sir J. Hotham should go on; and accordingly he was executed on the 2nd of Jan., his son capt. John Hotham, having suffered the same fate the day before. The question for sir John's life, or death, was carried for the latter, in the commons, by 94 against 46; general Cromwell was again a teller for it.

Ordinance passed for taking away the Common Prayer.] Jan. 3. An Ordinance for the taking away the Book of Common-Prayer, and establishing and putting in execution the Directory for the public Worship of God; passed the house of lords, having before been sent up to them from the commons; and was ordered to be printed and published.

A Draught of the Manner of Proceeding at the Treaty to be held at Uxbridge.] This day the lord Say and Sele reported from the committee of both kingdoms, That they have prepared a Draught concerning the Manner of the Treaty of Peace, and think fit that the Treaty be held at Uxbridge; and that 4 lords and a proportionable number of the commons be appointed to treat. The said Draught was read accordingly, as follows:

“May it please your most excellent majesty; We your majesty's most loyal subjects the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England at Westminster, and the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, do make our further Answer to your majesty's Message of the 13th Dec. last, 1644, concerning the Treaty for Peace, as followeth: We do consent there be a Treaty for a safe and well-grounded Peace between your majesty and the parliaments of both kingdoms; and for the present have appointed Algernon earl of Northumberland, Philip e. of Pembroke and Montgomery, Wm. e. of Salisbury, Basil e. of Denbigh, Tho. lord visc. Wenman, Denzil Hollis, Wm. Pierpoint, sir H. Vane, jun. Oliver St. John, Bulstrode Whitlocke, John Crew, Edm. Prideaux, for the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England at Westminster; and John earl of Loudon, lord chancellor of Scotland, Archibald Marquis of Argyle, John lord Maitland, John lord Balmorino, sir Archibald Johnston, sir Ch. Erskine, George Dundas, sir John Smith, Mr. Hugh Kennedy, and Mr. Robert Barclay, for the Estates of the Parliament of Scotland, together with Mr. Alex. Henderson, upon the Propositions concerning Religion; who shall be authorized to meet at Uxbridge on the _____ day of _____ with such persons as your majesty shall, under your majesty's sign manual, appoint for that purpose, (not exceeding 16) there to treat of the matters contained in the Propositions we lately sent your majesty, according to such Instructions as shall be given them; and the Propositions for Religion, the Militia, and for Ireland to be first treated upon and agreed; and the time for the Treaty upon the said Propositions for Religion, the Militia, and for Ireland, not to exceed 20 days; and for the things mentioned in your Message to be proposed by your majesty, when the persons sent by your majesty shall communicate the same to the committees appointed by us as aforesaid, we have directed them to send the same to us, that they may receive our Instructions what to do therein. And to the end that the persons that are to be sent from your majesty and from us with their retinue, not exceeding the number of 108 on either part, may repair to Uxbridge, stay there, and return at their pleasure without interruption, we desire that mutual Safe-Conducts be granted to the said persons, according to the several lists of their names."

Resolved, That this house doth approve of the Draught now read; that the 4 lords, mentioned therein, be sent to treat; and that this paper be communicated to the commons to desire their concurrence therein.

Ordinance for the Attainder of Abp. Laud.]

Jan. 4. The Ordinance for archbishop Laud's Attainder was read a third time in the house of lords, * and agreed to as follows:

"Whereas the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, in the present parliament assembled, have, in the name of themselves, and of all the commons of England, impeached William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England; and, instead thereof, to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law, and to alter and subvert God's true religion by law established in this realm; and, instead thereof, to set up Popish superstition and idolatry, and to subvert the rights of parliament, and the ancient course of parliamentary proceedings; and, by false and malicious slanders, to incense his majesty against parliaments; for which the said archbishop deserves to undergo the pains and forfeitures of high treason; which said offences have been sufficiently proved against the said archbishop upon his Impeachment: be it therefore ordered and ordained, by the lords and commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the said archbishop, for the offences aforesaid, shall stand and be adjudged attainted of high treason, and shall suffer the pains of death; and shall incur all forfeitures, both of lands and goods, as a person attainted of high treason should or ought to do. Provided, That no judge or judges, justice or justices whatsoever, shall judge or interpret any act or thing to be treason, or hear or determine any treason, in any other manner than he or they should or ought to have done before the making of this Ordinance; and as if this Ordinance had never been had or made; saving always unto all and singular persons and bodies politic and corporate, their heirs and successors, (other than the said archbishop and his heirs, and such as claim by, from, or under him) all such right, title, and interest of, in, and to all and singular such of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, as he, or any of them, had before the first day of this present parliament, any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

Jan. 6. The commons being informed, by a message from the lords, that the Ordinance of Attainder was passed, returned an answer to desire their lordships concurrence, that Execution might be done on the body of the archbishop, on the 19th instant; and the proper warrants made out for that purpose, which was agreed to, and orders given accordingly.

The Archbishop tenders the King's Pardon—But is executed.] Jan. 7. The Speaker of the house of lords acquainted them, that he had received a Letter and a box from the archbishop of Canterbury: viz.

For the Right Hon. my very good lord, the lord GREY of Warke, Speaker of the right hon. the House of Peers,

"My lord; In the sad condition in which I now am, as I have understood by warrant this day, I could not think to be so wanting to myself as a Christian, or so ungrateful to his majesty's unexpected favour, as not to tender this his gracious Pardon, by your lordship, to that honourable house; humbly conceiving, that neither this his majesty's gracious pardon for me, or for any person, is any way secluded by an Ordinance of either or both houses of parliament: so, laying myself at their feet, I most humbly desire your lordship this pardon may be presented to their honourable consideration, and I shall ever rest, Your Lordship's humble Servant, WILL. CANT. Jan. 6. 1644."

The Pardon, dated April 12, 19 Car. was afterwards read, but no further notice was taken of it at that time. Though, the same day, at a conference with the commons, the lords acquainted that house with the Pardon; but at the same time told them, That this Pardon did no way alter their lordships judgment, but that the archbishop ought to suffer according to it; which he being informed of, sent the following Petition to the lords, setting forth,

"That their lordships poor petitioner is in much affliction for the censure which is passed against him by both the honourable houses of parliament; and much more for it, that he is to leave the world in such a penal way. Yet since his grey head must needs go with this sorrow to its grave, unless the same power shall be honourably pleased, for his age and calling's sake, to alter the punishment, he most humbly prayeth that their lordships will be pleased to give order, that Dr. Marten, Dr. Sterne, Dr. Heywood, or some of them, having been his chaplains, might, by their lordships favour, though they be now prisoners in Ely-House, have liberty to come to comfort and assist him in this time of his affliction; he being desirous not to have any strangers about him at this time, and no other of his acquaintance being at present in London. W. CANT."

The lords, upon this, gave leave that the persons named should attend the archbishop as he desired, provided their keeper should go with them and see them returned to their prisons,

* Lord Clarendon informs us, that there were only twelve lords present at the passing this bill of Attainder,

And considering the great posts the archbishop had formerly held, their lordships inclined to shew him that favour as to have his head struck off, and not to be hanged. A conference was immediately desired with the commons on these two points, at which we are told, by their Journals, the commons refused the last; and only allowed Dr. Sterne to go to him, attended by Mr. Marshall and Mr. Palmer, two of their own divines, one or both of whom was to be constantly present, whilst Dr. Sterne was with him. However, on the archbishop's petition to the commons the next day, setting forth reasons, from his being a divine, a bishop, one that had the honour to sit in the house of peers, and of the king's most honourable privy council, &c. praying, in those regards, not to be exposed to such an ignominious death, the commons consented to his being beheaded.

Jan. 8. The archbishop addressed the house of lords again, in another Petition, giving their lordships most humble thanks in that they had been pleased to mitigate the severity of his sentence. And further prayed, in regard of his age, his calling, and that he had the honour to sit in sundry parliaments, they would be a means that his body might be left to his servants, to see the same decently interred: which favour, upon the application of the lords to the commons, was at last consented to.

Jan. 10. The last Petition presented to the house of lords, from this unfortunate prelate, was on this day, on which he was beheaded, importing, "That he was not unmindful, nor unthankful, for the late honourable favour of both houses extended to him, which he expressed and did then conceive would be his last request to their lordships. Yet now, in all things summing up himself, as well concerning the outward as inward man; finding his necessities, in regard of the great charge of his imprisonment, had obliged him to contract some small debts beyond that allowance their honourable favours had extended to him out of his sequestered estate; and that he had no means left to bring his body decently to the ground, but to leave it as a charge to his poor servants, who had now in a manner suffered four years imprisonment with him, unrewarded; his humble suit to their lordships (which he knows not whether it would come to their hands before he be no more of this world) was to pray it might be communicated to the honourable house of commons, that as in his allowance whilst he lived, so somewhat might be allotted to answer these humble desires, out of his sequestered estate, by the honourable committee of sequestrations, and that timely, in regard of the disposal of his corpse."

"WILL. CANT."

The lords ordered that this Petition should be sent to the commons, with a desire that they would join with them in referring it to the committee for sequestrations, to give such an allowance for that business as they should think needful. But we do not find that this request of the lords was complied with; for Rushworth informs us, "That his corpse was decently interred, by some of his friends, in Barking church, and the office appointed by the liturgy read over him; which, it is likely, the commons would not have allowed of, had they ordered any money for the expence of his funeral."—The whole Proceedings in this Trial were afterwards ordered, by both houses, to be printed and published, under the direction of Mr. Prynne, with the approbation of the rest of the committee that managed the evidence at it.

PROCEEDINGS RELATIVE TO THE SELF-DENYING ORDINANCE.

We now proceed to the famous Self-denying Ordinance, which quite altered the scene of public affairs, threw the management of the sword into new hands, and was the main foundation of Cromwell's greatness. We shall therefore collect together, in one view, the accounts given us of this extraordinary revolution in politics by the several cotemporary writers.

The Commons take into Consideration the sad Condition of the Kingdom—Speeches of Cromwell, &c. on that Occasion.] Mr. Rushworth tells us, "That on the 9th of Dec. the house of commons having resolved themselves into a grand committee, to consider of the sad Condition of the Kingdom by the Continuance of the War, there was a general silence for a good space of time; many looking one upon another, to see who would break the ice, and speak first in so tender and sharp a point: Amongst whom,

Mr. Oliver Cromwell stood up, and spake briefly to this effect: "That it was now a time to speak, or for ever to hold the tongue; the important occasion being no less than to save a nation out of a bleeding, nay, almost dying, condition, which the long continuance of the war had already brought it into; so that, without a more speedy, vigorous, and effectual prosecution of the war, casting off all lingering proceedings, like soldiers of fortune beyond sea, to spin out a war, we shall make the kingdom weary of us, and hate the name of a parliament: for what do the enemy say? Nay, what do many say that were friends at the beginning of the parliament? Even this, That the members of both houses have got great places and commands, and the sword into their hands; and what by interest in parliament, and what by power in the army, will perpetually continue themselves in grandeur, and not permit the war speedily to end, lest their own power should determine with it. This I speak here to our own faces, it is but what others do utter abroad behind our backs. I am far from reflecting on any; I know the worth of those commanders, members of both houses, who are yet in power; but, if I may speak my conscience, without reflection upon any, I do conceive, if the army be not put into another method, and the war more vigorously prosecuted, the people can bear the war no longer, and will enforce you to a dishonourable peace. But this I would recommend to your prudence, not to insist upon any complaint or oversight of any commander in chief, upon any occasion whatsoever; for as I must acknowledge myself guilty of oversights, so I know they can rarely be avoided in military affairs; therefore, waving a strict enquiry into the causes of these things, let us apply ourselves to the remedy which is most necessary: and I hope we have such true English hearts, and zealous affections towards the general weal of our mother country, as no members of either house will scruple to deny themselves and their own private interests for the public good; nor account it to be a dishonour done to them, whatever the parliament shall resolve upon in this weighty matter.

Another spoke to this purpose: 'Whatever is the matter, which I list not so much to enquire after, two summers are passed over, and we are not saved: our victories (the price of blood invaluable) so gallantly gotten, and, which is more pity, so graciously bestowed, seem to have been put into a bag with holes; for what we won one time we lost at another: the treasure is exhausted; the country wasted. A summer's victory has proved but a winter's story: the game, however, shut up with autumn, was to be new-played again the next spring; as if the blood that has been shed were only to manure the field of war for a more plentiful crop of contention. Men's hearts have failed them with the observation of these things, the cause whereof the parliament has been tender of ravelling into: but men cannot be hindered from venting their opinions privately, and their fears, which are various, and no less variously expressed, concerning which I determine nothing; but this I would say, It is apparent that the forces being under several great commanders, want of good correspondency amongst the chieftains, has oftentimes hindered the public service.'

The Commons resolve, That no Member of Parliament shall hold any Office, Civil or Military.] This debate gave occasion to a Vote, That no member of either house of parliament should, during this war, enjoy or execute any office or command, civil or military, and that an Ordinance should be brought in accordingly. Mr. Whitlocke informs us, "That the motion for bringing in this bill was made by Mr. Tate, who was set on foot by that party who contrived the outing of the lord general, and to bring on their own designs; and they could find no other way, than by passing a Self-denying Ordinance, (as they called it) which would serve their turn, both as a specious pretence of their own integrity, and waving all self-ends, and so plausible to the people; and would also comprehend the lord general Essex with the rest, without naming of him; which, for shame and ingratitude, they could not think fit to be done. That some of them confessed, that this was their design, and it was apparent in itself; and the reason of their doing this was to make way for others, and because they were jealous that the lord general was too much a favourer of peace (a good fault in a general of an army) and that he would be too strong a supporter of monarchy, and of nobility, and other old constitutions, which they had a mind to alter."

A Fast held for the Success thereof.] He adds, "That the parliament having appointed a public Fast to be held on the 18th Dec. both houses kept the same in Lincoln's-inn chapel, and none were present there but the members only; and some said that the preachers desired it might be so, that they might speak the more freely to them, especially upon the point of the Self-denying Ordinance."

Lord Clarendon confirms this account by observing, "That the preachers who were nominated to perform this exercise, were more trusted in the deepest designs than most of those who named them." His lordship then proceeds thus: "When the Fast-day came, which was observed for eight or ten hours together in the churches, the preachers prayed 'the parliament might be inspired with those thoughts, as might contribute to their honour and reputation; and that they might preserve that opinion the nation had of their honesty and integrity, and be without any selfish ends, or seeking their own benefit and advantage.' After this preparation by their prayers, the preachers, let their texts be what they would, told them very plainly, 'That it was no wonder there was such division among them in their counsels, when there was no union in their hearts: that the parliament lay under many reproaches, not only among their enemies, but with their best friends; who were the more out of countenance, because they found that the aspersions and imputations which their enemies had laid upon them, were so well grounded, that they could not wipe them off: that there was as great pride, as great ambition, as many private ends, and as little zeal and affection for the public, as they had ever imputed to the court: that, whilst they pretended, at the public cost, and out of the purses of the poor people, to make a general reformation, their chief care was to grow great and rich themselves; and that both the city and kingdom took notice, with great anxiety of mind, that all the offices in the army, and all the profitable offices of the kingdom, were in the hands of the members of the two houses of parliament; who, as the nation grew poor, as it must needs do under such insupportable taxes, grew very rich; and would, in a short time, get all the money of the kingdom into their hands; and that it could not reasonably be expected, that such men, who got so much, and enriched themselves to that degree, by the continuance of the war, would heartily pursue those ways which would put an end to it; the end whereof must put an end to their exorbitant profit.' When they had exaggerated these reproaches, as pathetically as they could, and the sense the people generally had of the corruption of it, even to a despair of ever seeing any end of the calamities they sustained, or having any prospect of that reformation in church and state, which they had so often and so solemnly promised to effect, they fell again to their prayers, 'That God would take his own work into his hand; and if the instruments he had already employed, were not worthy to bring so glorious a design to a conclusion, that he would inspire others more fit, who might perfect what was begun, and bring the trouble of the nation to a godly period.'

Speeches of Sir H. Vane and Cromwell on that Occasion.] When the two houses met together, the next day after these devout animadversions, there was another spirit appeared in the looks of many of them:

Sir Henry Vane told them, 'If ever God had appeared to them, it was in the exercise of yesterday; and that it appeared it proceeded from God, because, as he was credibly informed by many, who had been auditors in other congregations, the same lamentations and discourses had been made in all other churches, as the godly preachers had made before them; which could therefore proceed only from the immediate Spirit of God.' He repeated some things which had been said, upon which he was best prepared to enlarge; and besought them 'to remember their obligations to God and to their country; and that they would free themselves from those just reproaches; which they could do no otherwise, than by divesting themselves of all offices and charges that might bring in the least advantage and profit to themselves; by which only they could make it appear, that they were public-hearted men; and as they paid all taxes and impositions with the rest of the nation, so they gave up all their time to their country's service, without any reward or gratuity.' He told them, 'That the reflections of yesterday, none of which had ever entered upon his spirit before, had raised another reflection in him than had been mentioned; which was, That it had been often taken notice of, and objected by the king himself, that the numbers of the members of parliament, who sat in either house, were too few to give reputation to acts of so great moment as were transacted in their councils; which, though it was no fault of theirs who kept their proper stations, but of those who had deserted their places and their trusts, by being absent from the parliament; yet that, in truth, there were too many absent, though in the service of the house, and by their appointment; and if all the members were obliged to attend the service of the parliament, in the parliament, it would bring great reputation to their numbers, and the people would pay more reverence, and yield a fuller obedience to their commands:' and then concluded, 'That he was ready to accuse himself for one of those who gained by an office he had; and though he was possessed of it before the beginning of the troubles, and owed it not to the favour of the parliament,' (for he had been joined with sir Wm. Russell in the Treasurership of the Navy by the king's grant) 'yet he was ready to lay it down, to be disposed of by the parliament; and wished that the profits thereof might be applied towards the support of the war.' When the ice was thus broke,

Oliver Cromwell, who had not yet arrived at the faculty of speaking with decency and temper, commended the preachers 'For having dealt plainly and impartially, and told them of their faults, which they had been so unwilling to hear of: that there were many things upon which he had never reflected before, yet, upon revolving what had been said, he could not but confess that all was very true; and till there were a perfect reformation in those particulars which had been recommended to them, nothing would prosper that they took in hand: that the parliament had done very wisely, in the entrance into the war, to engage many members of their own in the most dangerous parts of it, that the nation might see that they did not intend to embark them in perils of war, whilst themselves sat securely at home, out of gun-shot, but would march with them where the danger was most threatened; and those honourable persons, who had exposed themselves this way had merited so much of their country, that their memories should be held in perpetual veneration; and whatsoever should be well done after them, would be always imputed to their example: but that God had so blessed their army, that there had grown up with it, and under it, very many excellent officers, who were fitter for much greater charges than they were now possessed of; and desired them not to be terrified with an imagination, that if the highest offices were vacant, they should not be able to put as fit men into them; for, besides, that it was not good to put so much trust in an arm of flesh, as to think such a cause as this depended upon any one man, he did take upon him to assure them, That they had officers in their army, who were fit to be generals in any enterprize in Christendom.' He said, 'He thought nothing so necessary as to purge and vindicate the parliament from the partiality towards their own members;' and made a proffer to lay down his commission of command in the army; and desired, 'That an Ordinance might be prepared, by which it might be made unlawful for any member of either house of parliament, to hold any office or command in the army, or any place or employment in the state; and so concluded with an enlargement upon 'the vices and corruptions which were gotten into the army; the profaneness and impiety, and absence of all religion; the drinking and gaming, and all manner of licence and laziness;' and said plainly, 'That till the whole army were new modelled, and governed under a stricter discipline, they must not expect any notable success in any thing they went about.'

Upon the reading this Ordinance a third time in the house of commons, Dec. 17, it was assented to; but a Proviso being offered to be added to it, That this Ordinance, or any thing therein contained, should not extend to the earl of Essex lord-general, a long debate arose; and, being put to the question it was rejected, only by 100 against 93; a small majority in the house for Cromwell to build his hopes on at that time.

Mr. Whitlocke's Speech against the Ordinance.] Mr. Whitlocke observes, "That Cromwell had now got a great ascendancy in the house of commons, insomuch, that the lord-general began to be afraid of his power." He has given us a long dialogue in the night-time, at Essex-house, between the earl, the Scots commissioners, Mr. Hollis, sir Philip Stapylton, sir John Meyrick, Mr. Maynard, and himself*, tending to have Cromwell impeached as an incendiary to the state. But this not being thought proper to venture on that time, the Self-denying Ordinance went on in the house of commons; and a clause being offered to be added, That it should not extend to any lord-tenant, their deputies, justices of peace, or commissioners of oyer and terminer, who were members of either house, a debate arose; in which amongst many others, our author spoke against it to this effect:

"Mr. Speaker; I am one of that number of your servants, who have no office or employment, but such as you are now about to except out of this Ordinance†, nor have ambition for any; and therefore may the more freely and indifferently, yet with all submission, humbly offer my reasons against it; as that which I apprehend may prove prejudicial to your service. It hath been objected, That your house, and the house of lords is thin and empty, and you the less esteemed, having so few members here, many of them being employed in offices, that they cannot attend the houses; but that, by this Ordinance, they will be at leisure and liberty to attend the service of the parliament here, and the houses be much fuller than now they are.—I confess, sir, this is fit to be remedied; but I apprehend you have a fitter way, than by this Ordinance, to do it; that is, by issuing out new writs for electing new members in the places of those who are dead, or expelled; and this will satisfy the objection, and engage divers of interest and quality the more immediately in your service: whereas this Ordinance will discontent many, and the houses will be but little the fuller by the passing of it. Another objection is, That if this ordinance do not pass, the Treaty for Peace will not so well proceed, but the particular interests of members of parliament, may retard the same; which will be all taken away by this Ordinance." I am to seek how this can be materially objected, when I suppose, whether this Ordinance pass or not, yet you intend members of parliament only to be your commissioners for that Treaty; and in case some of them be officers, they will the better understand your businesses, on which the Treaty will be grounded.—Another objection is, That unless this Ordinance pass, the great work intended of new modelling your armies, will not so well be carried on, for that by putting all out, there will remain no exception. I should rather have argued, That by putting all members out of their employment, the exception and discontent would be the more general; and by leaving them still in their employments, there would be the less competition and solicitation for new officers in their room.—Another objection or argument is, That the members of parliament, who are officers, being of equal power in parliament, will not be so obedient to your commands, as others who have smaller interests, and would not so much dispute one with another.—Surely, sir, those whose interest is the same with yours, have the more reason to obey your commands than others, and have more to hazard by disobedience than others can have; and in your commands all your members are involved, and it were strange if they should be backward to obey their own orders. Nor will the contests be so frequent and high, between them and other officers, as it will be between those who will be of a more equal condition. But, Mr. Speaker, as you consider the inconveniences if this Ordinance do not pass, so you will be pleased to consider the inconveniences if it do pass. You will lay aside as brave men, and who have served you with as much courage, wisdom, faithfulness, and success, as ever men served their country. Our noble general, with the earls of Denbigh, Warwick, and Manchester; the lords Roberts, Willoughby, and other lords in your armies, besides those in civil offices not excepted; and, of your own members, the lord Grey, lord Fairfax, sir Wm. Waller, lieut. General CROMWELL, Mr. Hollis, sir Philip Stapylton, sir Wm. Brereton, sir John Meyrick, and many others must be laid aside, if you pass this Ordinance. And I am to seek, and I doubt so will they be to whom you shall refer the new modelling of your armies, where to find officers that shall excel, if equal, these. If your judgments are, that, for the public service, it will be expedient to remove any of them from their commands, let the same, if you please, be plainly made known to them from you. Let them have, what they deserve, your thanks for their former good services; and they will not be offended, that you, having no more work for them, do lay them aside with honour. But to do a business of this nature (as hath been well said) by a side-wind, is, in my humble opinion, not so becoming your honour and wisdom, as plainness and gravity, which are ornaments to your actions. I shall conclude with the example of the Grecians and Romans, amongst whom, sir, you know, that the greatest offices, both of war and peace, were conferred upon their senators; and their reasons were, because they, having greater interests than others, were the more capable to do them the greatest service. And having the same interest with the senate, and present at their debates, they understood their business the better; and were less apt to break that trust, which so nearly concerned their private interests, which was involved with the public; and the better they understood their business, the better service might be expected from them. Sir, I humbly submit the application to your judgment; your ancestors did the same; they thought the members of parliament fittest to be employed in the greatest offices: I hope you will be of the same judgment, and not, at this time, to pass this Ordinance, and thereby to discourage your faithful servants."

The Self-denying Ordinance passed by the Commons—But rejected by the Lords.] Mr. Whitlocke proceeds and tells us, "That the debate on this matter lasted till late at night; and then, upon the question, envy and self-ends prevailing, the Ordinance passed the house of commons, and was voted to be sent up to the lords for their concurrence." In this house we find, by their Journals, that it went on very heavily; which occasioned the commons to send several Messages up to desire the lords to expedite this Ordinance; which being read by them twice, a conference was desired with the commons about it. And, in this conference, Jan. 7, the Speaker of the lords was ordered to deliver their Reasons against passing it; which were in these words:

I. "This Ordinance contains matter of importance and an extraordinary nature; and it usually hath been the practice, that Ordinances that have carried with them great alterations, have had such introductions, as have set forth the advantages and necessities thereof, the better to satisfy the world of the justness of our proceedings.—II. The putting every member of either house of parliament into an incapacity of holding military or civil offices, during this war, may be of very dangerous consequence; because, how emergent soever the occasion may be, it cannot be altered without deserting of a positive rule imposed upon ourselves; yet that the world, with their own consciences, may bear witness that they are as willing as any others to sacrifice not only their places and offices, but all that is dearest to them, for the good of religion and the kingdom, they are willing that all places, civil and military, shall be disposed of as both houses of parliament shall judge may contribute most for the good of the public, any crime or just exception being given against such as are now intrusted with offices or commands; but they can in no wise consent to put an incapacity upon themselves, and be made in a worse condition than any free subject.—III. As to that part of the Ordinance which does bar the peerage from military commands, both by sea and land, they cannot consent unto it for these reasons: 1. It deprives the peers of that honour which, in all ages, hath been given unto them, (as may appear by many writers) whose part it was to be employed in military commands, It also crosses the constant practice of the peers of England; for our stories make mention that, in all ages, they have been principally active, to the effusion of their blood, and the hazard of their estates and fortunes, in regaining and maintaining the fundamental laws of the land, and the rights and liberties of the subject; nor was there ever any battle fought for those ends, wherein the nobility have not been employed in places of chiefest trust and command: and it doth not only deprive them of their due honour, but lays a blot upon them by this incapacity; which is a punishment usually inflicted upon delinquents, and such as have highly demerited from the parliament. 2. Though some few of the gentry and commons, as members of parliament, are excepted, yet the rest of the gentry and commons of the kingdom may have liberty to discharge their duty, and the honour to carry on this cause without the peers; so that the case is not alike between the two houses in point of excluding the members of both houses from military employment. 3. They have since these unhappy wars, engaged themselves, by Protestation and Covenant, to assist in this cause, as well with their lives as fortunes: but, by this Ordinance, they are wholly disabled to perform any military service; which is contrary to their Protestation and Covenant. 4. The passing this Ordinance, as to the military part, will produce such an alteration in all the armies, as, in apparent probability, must be of very dangerous consequence to the cause in hand, especially in this juncture of time: and therefore, till a new model be propounded to succeed, they cannot but think the present frame better than such a confusion which is like to follow: nor can we tarry long in the expectation of that new model, because the preparation of it is already referred to the consideration of the committee of the two kingdoms, where the commissioners of Scotland will contribute their advice, and receive their satisfaction in it; for since the whole Scots nation are united with us in this great cause, and cannot but extremely suffer in the miscarriage of our armies; and that we have engaged ourselves to them, that the affairs of both kingdoms, in pursuance of our Covenant, shall be managed by the joint advice and direction of both nations, it deserves consideration how far we shall adventure upon so dangerous an attempt, as the introducing of so great a change in the whole management of our war, without our advising or consulting with them."

Jan. 9. The commons sent up to desire another free conference with the lords, on the subject of the last; which being agreed to and held, the earl of Manchester made the report of it to the lords, "That the committee of the commons declared, Whereas their lordships had sent down to their house the Reasons why they could not pass the Ordinance for exemption from offices, they say they cannot take them into consideration, because they conceive it contrary to the privileges of parliament; and that for these Reasons following: 1. The constant course and privilege of parliament hath ever been, when any Bill or Ordinance hath been sent from one house to the other, that, in case of disagreement, upon alteration or amendment, they have ever sent down the Bill or Ordinance, with the particular amendment or alteration. If the Bill or Ordinance be not sent down, they cannot compare the alterations with the Bill or Ordinance, whereby they may judge how they agree together. 2. And if the amendments or alterations be not particularly expressed, with the part or place of the Ordinance wherein they are to be, mistakes cannot be avoided; nor the way of transacting of Bills or Ordinances in both houses be certain and regular. 3. At the conference, when this Paper was delivered, neither the Ordinance, nor any particular amendments or alterations were delivered; neither, by the paper sent down, doth it appear, that they have agreed to any part of the Ordinance, nor to what part they do disagree; and if the Reasons in this Paper were admitted, no Ordinance would pass at all: and, for these reasons, the house of commons do conceive, That the paper sent down is a breach of the privilege of parliament, and contrary to the constant course of parliament; and, therefore, they cannot take the matter thereof into consideration. The house of commons conceive this Ordinance to be of so high a concern for the public good, as they do desire their lordships concurrence in the speedy passing of it."—Ordered, "That the consideration of this paper brought up now from the house of commons, and the whole business of this Ordinance, be referred to the same committee that was formerly appointed to consider of this business."

Jan. 11. The commons sent up a Message to the lords, to quicken them in passing the foregoing Ordinance; and this day the earl of Manchester reported, from their committee, an Answer to what the commons had last offered, relating to a Breach of Privilege, which was ordered to be communicated to the commons at another conference; and was in these words:

"The lords have considered the Paper delivered by the house of commons, at a conference, the 9th of this month, in Answer to another Paper delivered by the lords, at a like conference, two days before; wherein were contained the Reasons and Grounds of their lordships dissenting from them in the Ordinance for exempting the members of either house from any office, civil or military; and the lords do find that the house of commons have, in their Paper, wholly mistaken the state of the question; for the lords do admit it for truth, what is said by them, 'That, in a Bill or Ordinance, when either house makes alteration or amendment, the Bill or Ordinance itself is returned together with such alteration or amendment; and that, otherwise, mistakes cannot be avoided; nor the way of transacting Bills and Ordinances, in both houses, be certain and regular;' but their lordships do not understand how this rule hath been broken by them, or that it is at all applicable to the present case; for that they had not then any thought of making alterations or amendments in that Ordinance; and cannot but wonder it should be so far mistaken, since they did (as they conceived) offer strong and satisfactory Reasons against the main body of the Ordinance, so penned; it being such as no amendment or alteration could, in their opinions, make it fit for them to pass, except such as should alter it to be quite another thing; so that it could not be expected their lordships should, together with those Reasons, send down the Ordinance, because the Ordinance and those Reasons could not stand together.—Therefore, whereas it is further expressed, by way of complaint, 'That no particular amendments or alterations were delivered,' that is very true, for their lordships did not then intend it; but, by the way, it is observable that the commons do, by their own saying, clear the lords of the breach of the rule laid down by them in the beginning; for, if the lords delivered no amendments or alterations, they could not be liable to an exception for not sending down the Ordinance; and for what is said besides, 'That if the Reasons be admitted, no Ordinance would pass at all,' that is acknowledged; for, in truth, those Reasons were for that end given, that the Ordinance, so penned, should not pass. But that which their lordships are tenderly affected with, is that other expression, 'That the Paper sent down by them is a Breach of Privilege, and contrary to the constant course of parliament.' Their lordships cannot here be silent, knowing how forward the house of peers hath been (which all the world will witness with them) to afford a yielding compliance to almost all the desires of the house of commons; and how careful not to break any of their privileges, even to the prejudice of some of their own; therefore they desire the commons will reciprocally express some tenderness of them; and not to entertain such an opinion, especially in a particular of this nature, wherein their lordships are strongly persuaded that the commons have formerly delivered a clean contrary sense; for the lords well remember, that when they had rejected an Ordinance sent up by the commons, concerning an oath of Secrecy,* to be taken by the committee of the two kingdoms, not having imparted their Reasons for so doing, before, unto that house, the commons desired a conference upon it; and there it was delivered by a worthy member of that house, Mr. Rouse, That a direct denial seemed to cut off all further consideration and conference concerning the matter proposed; especially where a negative is returned before any Reasons proposed or heard, and which, being heard, might have altered the opinion of either house; which

(as was then said) the commons had the more reason to resent, because the lords, having voted Reasons in their own house, would not vouchsafe to communicate them to the commons. This was the opinion then of the house of commons, who found fault because the lords had thrown out that Ordinance, without communicating their reasons before. The lords have now avoided that which the commons then conceived to be an inconvenience, their lordships being desirous to preserve the good understanding which ought to be between the two houses; and therefore would not cast out this Ordinance, so penned, before they had imparted the Grounds and Reasons of their so doing unto the commons; that either they might so satisfy them with their Reasons, or be satisfied by them with better, and both come to be of one mind; which they desired should be in this, and in all things else, and conceived this to be the ready way to it; not suspecting it possible to be disliked by the commons, especially having been so lately moved unto it by the commons themselves; yet this is now said to be 'a Breach of Privilege of parliament, and contrary to the constant course of parliament.' The lords are very sorry to find their actions so misconstrued, and do assure you they had no such intention, the privileges of parliament being sacred unto them: they are bound, by the Protestation and Covenant, to maintain them, which they have done with the hazard of their lives, and loss of their fortunes; and they wish, with all their hearts, some course were taken by the wisdom of both houses, to search out and ascertain these privileges; that neither house might fail in the observation of their own, and of each other's privileges; so to avoid all inconveniences of this nature between the houses for the time to come."

Jan. 13. The commons sent up another Message to the lords, importing, 'That they had put their lordships often in mind of passing this Ordinance, and that delay would not only prove dangerous but destructive. On which the lords went immediately upon consideration of it; and, after debate, the Ordinance being read a third time, and put to the question, Whether it should pass or not, it was carried in the Negative. After this, the lords ordered their committee to meet and draw up another Ordinance to the same intent, with some restrictions, and report it to the house; but we hear no more of it.'

Mr. Whitlocke writes, "That the whole house of commons went up with this last Message to the lords, to importune them to pass this Self-denying Ordinance; and its being rejected was the first thing that began to increase the difference between the two houses, which swelled to so great a height afterwards. And, to shew their resentment in some measure, the lords having agreed to an Ordinance for regulating of free quarter, with this clause added, 'to exempt themselves, their attendants, and the members of the house of commons, from billeting of soldiers,' the latter would not consent to it; they desiring to be in no better condition than their fellow-subjects."

There is nothing material in the Journals now for several days, except some Orders relating to the intended Treaty of Peace at Uxbridge; in which the parliament's commissioners were allowed 80 attendants, and the Scots 30. We shall not enter further into this Treaty; the preliminaries of which, with the consequences and fruitless conclusions, are given at large by Clarendon and Whitlocke; and are also collected into one chapter, in the fifth Volume of Rushworth, and in the King's Works.

The Parliament's Answer to the Dutch Ambassadors last Memorial.] Jan. 17. The States ambassadors had, several times, applied for a clearer Answer to their Proposition of being Mediators between the king and parliament: and, this day, the form of an Answer was read and agreed on by both houses, to be delivered to the Ambassadors by 4 lords and 8 commoners, which was as follows:

"To the first; That the parliament of England have already given such an Answer to that Proposition of the lords the States General of the United Provinces, by which they make offer of their interposition for Peace, as they hope will give unto them full and ample satisfaction, being such as the condition of their affairs would admit; and as they professed it then, so is it still their sense, to set a high estimation upon the great and good affection of those high and mighty lords, so manifestly expressed to them.—To the second; The Proposition made concerning the restitution of ships and damages, was found to concern either the public interest of the state, or the private interest of particular men; those of the first kind were, upon debate, out of respect to the said States General, ordered to be restored; when, for aught appears to the contrary, execution hath been accordingly had: and for damages; as to those it was ordered, That the damages being proved by a legal proceeding, in the high court of admiralty, the parliament would liquidate, and see payment thereof to be made.—For those of the second sort, the houses hold fit that the parties complainants have full liberty to prosecute their interests in the high court of admiralty of England, for such as have not been already sentenced, or by way of appeal for such as have been adjudged there. Wherein the houses, taking notice of the request delivered by the ambassadors, will give command that right shall be done according to the rules of justice. To the third and fourth; That, touching the freedom of commerce and revocation of the Ordinance, both houses of parliament, finding they are matters of very great consequence, have the same under a serious consideration; and will, in convenient time, resolve upon that which shall appertain to justice."

Instructions for the Commissioners appointed for the Treaty at Uxbridge.] Both houses had been for some time, very busy in framing Instructions for their Commissioners to act by, at the Treaty; several alterations, additions, &c. had been made in and to them, by both houses and by the Scots commissioners. At last, they were concluded and agreed to as follows:

INSTRUCTIONS for the COMMITTEES of both Houses of Parliament of England, and for the COMMISSIONERS of the Kingdom of Scotland, respectively agreed upon.

I. "You shall repair to Uxbridge, where you, or any ten of you, whereof some of either house of the parliament of England, and some of the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland to be present, shall treat with the persons sent thither by his majesty, from the 30th of Jan. during the space of 20 days, upon the Propositions concerning Religion, the Militia, and for Ireland, formerly sent to his majesty from his humble and loyal subjects assembled in the parliaments of both kingdoms. II. You shall treat upon the Propositions concerning Religion, the Militia, and Ireland, 3 days a-piece, alternis vicibus, during the space of 20 days; beginning first with the Propositions of Religion, which, as it is of most excellency, so is it to be sought after and finally agreed upon in the first place, before any agreement be made upon any of the other Propositions. III. You shall use your best endeavours that the aforementioned Propositions may be agreed unto, without receding from the matter of them. IV. You shall deliver your demands, and receive Answers to them, in writing. V. The members of both houses of the parliament of England are to give frequent advertisement of their proceedings in this Treaty, to both houses by some of their own members, or otherwise.—By the agreement upon the Propositions for Religion, before a final agreement be made upon any other of the Propositions, we understand the approving of the Covenant, the Directory for public Worship, and the Votes given in by the Assembly of Divines concerning Church Government; and passed the houses; the assenting to the bill against Episcopacy; the ratifying the Ordinance for the calling the Assembly of Divines; and so much as shall pass both houses before the expiring of the 20 days."

REASONS why such Part of the Propositions, as concern Religion, should have precedence before all other.

1. "As the Rule of universal Righteousness prescribeth, that we give unto each one that which is due unto him: so doth the Law of Piety and true Policy require, that Religion which rendereth unto God his due, have the precedence not only in debate, but in determination; and that the House of God according to the example of the wisest of men, be built before our own house. 2. In relation to ourselves; we are first 'to seek the Kingdom of God,' and to prevail for the means for our salvation; having a promise, 'that all other things shall be added;' and a confidence that, from the House of God, blessings shall issue forth upon our own matters. 3. Religion has, upon good reason, the first place in our Solemn League and Covenant; and, upon the same reason, ought to have the first place now in the performing of our vows. 4. All the Reformed Churches, which have their eyes upon us and great hopes from us, will expect this order at our hands; and, according to their intelligence of our proceedings in the matter of Religion, will be comforted or dejected. 5. We cannot express how great an encouragement the settling of Religion will be to the parliament and the national assembly now sitting in Scotland, and to that whole kingdom in their undertaking; and how much it will excite them to maintain religion, once established, and to obtain our other demands, without which religion cannot be preserved. 6. The inverting of this order would obdure the hearts of too many in their error, That religion is not principally intended by us. 7. It might also give hopes to his majesty, that we may be moved, by time, to dispense in some matters of religion, and to part from our conclusions."

Ordinance for New Modelling the Army.

It has already been mentioned, That Cromwell and his party were very industrious to get the earl of Essex discharged from being general of the parliament's army; and they now had interest enough in the house of commons to bring in and carry another Ordinance through that house, under the title of an Ordinance for New Modelling of the Army; but to the same intent as the former. Lord Hollis says, "That this great work had been projected long before, and that Cromwell had broken it to the earl of Manchester in the time of his greatness with him, when he thought him to be one of their own: which was to have an Army composed of those of the Independent Judgment, to interpose if there were like to be a Peace." This Ordinance was sent up to the lords, on the 28th of this month, with a desire of the commons that they would speedily pass it as a thing very conducive to the safety of the nation. The lords read the Ordinance once, and ordered it to be taken into consideration on the 31st, all the lords to be present: but it did not come on as that day, though the commons sent up another message to hasten its progress.

The Commons vote sir Thomas Fairfax to be Commander of the New Modelled Army.

The commons had voted sir Thomas Fairfax to be commander in chief of all the forces, horse and foot, to be raised by the new establishment, and on the new Model, before they sent up the last named Ordinance to the lords, by a majority of 101 against 69. The earl of Clarendon informs us, "That the arguments urged in favour of this appointment were, That sir Tho. Fairfax had behaved himself so signally in their service, in the defeat of colonel Bellasis, and taking him prisoner, which gave them their first footing in Yorkshire, from their being shut up and besieged in Hull; in the overthrow of the lord Byron, and taking all the Irish regiments; and, lastly, in the late battle of York, where he had turned the fortune of the day, when the Scots army was routed, and their general fled." And that Cromwell assured them he was very equal to that task. Lord Hollis accounts for this last circumstance, by saying, "That Cromwell was to have the power, sir Thomas Fairfax only the name, of general; he to be the figure, the other the cypher."—The commons having thus nominated their general; they next proceeded to name every colonel for all the regiments in this new Modelled Army, most or all of whom were devoted to Cromwell's interest, as will appear from the sequel. But somewhat to soften the earl of Essex and his friends, it was ordered, at the same time, That the committee for regulating the armies should consider of, and present to the house, some mark of honour, to be set upon the lord-general Essex; and some other recompence to be conferred upon him, to remain as a testimony to posterity, and an acknowledgement from the parliament of England, of the great and faithful services he had done to the parliament and kingdom.

A Conference concerning the Ordinance for new Modelling the Army.] Feb. 11. The commons sent up to the lords to desire a Conference concerning the Ordinance for New Modelling the Army, which being held in the Painted Chamber, Mr. Lisle, a member of the commons, delivered the following Message to the lords:

"My lords, this Conference was desired with your lordships concerning the new Model of the Army, wherein the house of commons doth agree to most of the proviso's which were sent up by your lordships to their house; only they do think fit to offer some alterations to your lordships in the three first Proviso's. They have commanded me to represent their Reasons to your lordships concerning these Alterations: the first alteration is in your lordships first Proviso, which shall be first read. Provided also, 'That all colonels, lieut. colonels, serjeant-majors, and captains, that shall be employed in this Army, may be such as shall be nominated, appointed, and approved of by both houses of parliament.' The house of commons desire it may be thus amended; Provided also, That the commander in chief, nominated in this Ordinance, shall have power to nominate all colonels, lieut. colonels, serjeant-majors, and all captains, out of any of the forces under the command of the parliament to be approved of by both houses of parliament. My lords, if you please to observe in this Proviso, thus amended, there be these two alterations. 1. That the commander in chief shall have power to nominate all colonels, lieut. colonels, &c. 2. That he shall have power to nominate the officers out of any of the forces under the command of the parliament. My lords, the house of commons have commanded me to offer these Reasons to your lordships, in maintenance of the first Amendment: They do conceive that, by giving of this power to the commander in chief to nominate his officers, he will more oblige his officers, and better enable them to carry on the work. They do conceive there can be no inconveniency in giving him this power of nominating, in regard that both houses are to approve of the officers nominated by the commander in chief. And they do observe, That the power of nominating officers is no unusual or extraordinary power; for this power of nominating is granted constantly and usually to every commander in chief. My lords, they have commanded me further to offer these Reasons in maintenance of the second Amendment: They do intend principally that these officers shall be nominated, by the commander in chief, out of any of the officers under the command of the parliament, whether out of my lord-general's army, or that under the command of the earl of Manchester, or sir Wm. Waller; and if that clause had not been inserted, we could not have named any of those officers. And the clause is more general, because the commander in chief will have the greater latitude, if he desires to nominate such persons for officers, as he shall think faithful and fitting for the service. Your lordships second Proviso is this: Provided further, That all commanders, officers, and common soldiers, that shall be employed in this army, shall take the solemn League and Covenant of both kingdoms, within 20 days next after publication hereof; and shall submit to the form of church government, that is already voted by both houses of parliament.' My lords, the house of commons desire it may be thus amended: Provided further, That all commanders and officers that shall be employed in this army, and to be approved of by both houses as aforesaid, shall take the National League and Covenant of both kingdoms, within 20 days next after such approbation; and all other officers, to be employed as aforesaid, shall take the said Solemn League and Covenant within 20 days after they shall be listed in the said army: and be it ordained, That all the common soldiers of the army shall likewise take the same at such time, and in such manner, as shall be in that behalf directed by both houses of parliament, Wherein your lordships may observe these alterations: 1. In point of time when the officers shall take the Covenant. 2. In point of time when the common soldiers shall take the Covenant. 3. In leaving out this clause, 'and shall submit to the Form of Church Government, that is already voted by both houses of parliament.' My lords, for the first Amendment they present these reasons: They do observe that in your lordships Proviso, the time is not certainly expressed; for your lordships expression is, 'They shall take the Covenant within 20 days, after the publication thereof;' and therefore, to make it more certain, they have added this clause, 'That they shall take the Covenant within 20 days next after the approbation of both houses;' and not only the commanders and officers, approved by your lordships, but all others shall take the Covenant; and therefore it is added, 'That all officers whatsoever shall take the Covenant, within 20 days after they shall be listed in the said Army.' My lords, concerning the Amendment of the common soldiers, in point of time, they have made it on this ground; They do conceive you may be enforced to press some soldiers to serve you in this new Model; and if you should be enforced thereunto, these soldiers may make their excuse of not serving the parliament, on pretence they cannot take the Covenant. They do observe besides, That the recruiting of the army is uncertain; they do not know the certain time, and think it not convenient that, before the army be recruited, they should set down any certain time for common soldiers; but that it may be referred to the wisdom of both houses. For the leaving out of the last clause; they conceive that, on this consideration, there can be no advantage by the last clause, if the Covenant be taken according to the intent of this Ordinance. And they leave it out the rather, because the Resolutions of both houses, concerning Church Government, are not yet perfected; nor their Votes yet compleat. I shall now, my lords, read to your lordships the third Proviso. Provided also, 'That every lord-lieutenant shall, in their several and respective counties, be of the committees now appointed by this Ordinance.' The house of commons do desire that this Proviso may be amended thus: Provided also, That every lord-lieutenant, who is not disabled by Ordinance of parliament to sit in the house of peers, shall, in their several and respective counties, be of the committee now appointed by this Ordinance. Which amendment will stand with so much reason, that they conceive they need not offer any reason for it. To all the rest they agree."

Feb. 13. The lords seem still to have been in no haste to pass this Ordinance, notwithstanding the commons sent up two more Messages to hasten them in it. In the last, Whitlocke says, "That the whole house went up with it, and desired their speedy concurrence to the Ordinance, because no monies were to be raised for the supply of the forces, without the passing of that Ordinance." Upon which the lords took it into consideration again, made some more additions and alterations, and sent them down to the commons; on which they desired another conference with the lords.

Feb. 17. The commons sent up a message to let the lords know, That they did agree with their lordships in the Alterations to the Ordinance for new modelling of the Army. By this Ordinance sir Thomas Fairfax was made general of all the parliament's forces to be raised for the defence of the kingdom; the earl of Essex still continuing, in some sort, general. The Ordinance is of an excessive length in the Journals; specifying all the particular sums to be levied, monthly, on all the counties of England, as well as the commissioners names, who were appointed to take care to see the Ordinance put in execution.

Sir T. Fairfax complimented by the Speaker upon his being appointed General.] Feb. 19. This day sir Thomas Fairfax, the parliament's new general, was called in to the house of commons; where a chair was set on purpose for him, the serjeant standing by with his mace; when the Speaker, by command of the house, addressed him in these words: "Sir; The parliament of England hath commanded up your service hither from the Northern parts: they have heard of your valour, and have had experience thereof for their safety; and have now thought fit to put upon you the greatest trust and confidence, for the security of the kingdom, this house, religion, and liberty, as was ever put into the hands of a subject. They have resolved to put a trust upon you, the command of a very great Army; which they do not intend to employ you in for a matter of discouragement, but will take care such provisions be made to enable you to go on in this great business, that your thoughts shall be solely on action. They are confident of your fidelity, care, and diligence in this cause of God and the kingdom, that now lies at stake: and for the faithful services you have done for the public, I am commanded, by the house, to return you their hearty thanks; and, under God, hope you may be a means to preserve this kingdom: and if you have any propositions to make now, or hereafter, concerning the Army, the house will take them into speedy consideration." There is no Answer put down in the Journals, from sir Thomas Fairfax to this compliment from the chair.

The Treaty at Uxbridge proves abortive.] Feb. 22. The Uxbridge Treaty drawing now near an ineffectual conclusion, two or three Messages were sent from the commons, to desire a free conference with the lords concerning it. In one of the last Propositions from the king's commissioners to the others, they said they were willing to treat with them, how his majesty might, with honour, freedom, and safety, be present with his two houses at Westminster, all armies being first disbanded. In the mean time the lords had agreed, That the earl of Manchester should deliver, at this conference, 'That though this Proposition might carry some specious shew of the king's desire of settling a Peace, by the disbanding of all Armies and coming to his parliament; though they did not conceive any hopes of receiving satisfaction by this Treaty, yet they thought it necessary that the committees of both kingdoms do meet the next day, and consider of something to offer to the houses concerning it: in the mean time, to send to their commissioners at Uxbridge to stay there till further orders.' But, before these orders could arrive at Uxbridge, the parliament's commissioners, their time being elapsed, came to London; for we find that, the next day, the Speaker of the house of lords, by command of that house, returned the lords commissioners thanks for their great pains and care, expressed in the business of that Treaty; the commons did the same to their commissioners; and both houses joined in desiring them to draw out a series of their proceedings at the Treaty, that it might be forthwith printed and published; which was done accordingly. Thus ended this famous Treaty; the ill success of which, Mr. Whitlocke, one of the parliament's commissioners, says, 'caused much trouble in the minds of many honest men, lovers of the peace of their country.'

The Dutch Ambassadors present another Memorial for Peace.] Feb. 24. The States Ambassadors having again desired an audience of the lords, they were this day admitted to it; and one of them delivered by word of mouth, what they had to propose, in French; which being afterwards read by their secretary in English, was left with the lords, and is entered as follows:

"Right Honourable; We have heretofore, as well privately as in public, demonstrated the great desires and sincere endeavours which the high and mighty lords, our lords the States General of the United Provinces constantly continue; that, in a lucky hour, they might see a happy Accommodation between the king and his parliament, and Peace re-established in these kingdoms: and your honours, by your professions by word of mouth, and of late given unto us by writing, the 6th Dec. last past, have not only testified that the said desires and sincere intentions of our lords and superiors were very acceptable unto you; but also you added, That your honours did judge that the said Accommodation and desired Peace, did as highly concern all those that make profession of the true Protestant Religion, and in particular our lords and superiors. All these motives, supplicated by your honours and our duties, have constantly wrought in us a very great care to fix an eye upon his majesty's proceedings and yours; and now, lately, upon the conference and treaty that at present is in hand at Uxbridge; where his majesty and your commissioners labour, as we hope, with utility, to obtain also the much-desired success. We must also say that, at our being at Oxford, we have received the honour of his majesty's ordering to be communicated to us all the passages of that conference; and, by the one and the other, we have observed, in the first place, That his majesty, above all things, desireth an Accommodation with your honours; and that his majesty entirely inclines to give all manner of content and assurance of his affection, in all things which are just and honourable. In the second place we are informed, That by the Answer to the Propositions of your honours, touching the point of church-government, the personal excesses that might have been committed heretofore, were not to be feared for the future. Thirdly, that if, in the form of government itself, and the exercise thereof, and the jurisdiction therein comprehended heretofore, any thing was to be excepted against, your honours can judge if that be not prevented by means of those offers his Majesty hath made to that end. And notwithstanding, sirs, we have seen that the point of Church-Government was yet behind, and without Accommodation, therefore we have been moved to consider more exactly how your honours, in this point, might desire any other or further satisfaction; and we are obliged to say, That this consideration is fallen out so well, that his majesty hath delivered unto us, and permitted us to communicate unto you, That if your honours are not contented with that which he hath offered, by his commissioners at Uxbridge, unto yours there, that his majesty, out of abundancy, is contented that a National Synod may be called and assembled, and thereunto the deputies of all other Protestant Churches of Europe invited for their advice; which synod shall examine all that which concerns the points of religion in the said government of the English church, that might be contrary to the word of God, whether in part or in general; that his majesty is contented to correct and redress it accordingly; and, by that means, as by a common consent of all those that make the same profession of Faith and Religion, to put a good end to all these present distractions."

Both Houses resolve to borrow Money from the City of London.] March 3. The commons sent up to the lords to desire their concurrence, in offering something to the Common Council of London, which was to meet the next day, for borrowing present Monies; and for their better security, to propose to them, That they shall have power to nominate treasurers for receiving the money, to be raised by the late Ordinances for raising of forces, and have what other security they shall desire. The lords agreed to this, but with an alteration, That it should be at a Common Hall, and not at a Common Council; that a general account of the Treaty may be given to the citizens, by some of the commissioners; and that they may press the ending of that Treaty, as a motive to the city to lend such sums of money as are necessary on this important occasion.

A Remonstrance from the Scots Commissioners, in relation to the new Modelling the Army.] This day the earl of Northumberland presented a Paper to the house of lords, from the Scots Commissioners, concerning the Army; as follows:

"In this conjuncture of time and affairs, such as hath not been since the beginning of this unhappy war, the late solemn Treaty of Peace, after so many prefaces and so long preparations, and after so great hopes and expectation of all sorts of persons, having brought forth nothing towards Peace; but, on the contrary, made manifest that, for any thing we can at present apprehend, the public peace must be settled in another way; and thereby having filled with resolution the minds of men formerly doubtful, we, the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, from that affection we owe to the public, from the deep sense of the great trust put upon us by that kingdom, and from our zeal, that, all differences and prejudices laid aside, the great work in hand may be, by united council and strength, carried on to a happy period, do find ourselves pressed to represent our thoughts and desires to the wisdom of the honourable houses of parliament. Whereas, for the better managing of this war, wherein both kingdoms, by their joint councils and forces, are engaged; and upon which dependeth the safety of both kingdoms, in their religion, liberties, and lives; the honourable houses, by their late Order, did refer the making a model and frame of the militia, as should be most for the advantage of the public service, to the committee of both kingdoms; wherein also they had made some progress in the point of strength and maintenance of the army; and it hath seemed good since, to the honourable houses, to put the nomination of the commanders and officers into another way; we, according to the common Covenant, Treaty, and interest of both nations (seeing there is nothing in this war so important, as the right constitution of the army; and nothing in the army so considerable, as the right choice of the commanders and officers) do desire, 1. That as the honourable houses have provided, all the officers of the army may take the Solemn League and Covenant; wherein we acknowledge their piety and wisdom, it being the strongest bond both to unite the army with God and amongst themselves; so, in the same piety and wisdom, they make choice of such as are known to be most zealous for reformation of religion, and of that uniformity which both kingdoms are obliged to promote and maintain with all their endeavours; and whereof the honourable houses, by their Votes, have laid so good a foundation; that so the Votes of the parliament and strength of the army, (which we conceive to be the power and wisdom of the kingdom) may still join in one for the public safety; and that the Scots army, which hath been, and still will be, ready to spill their blood and lives in the common cause, may be encouraged in their undertakings, by their assurance, against all that is or may be said to the contrary, that both armies fight in the same cause and for the same ends; especially for the settling of religion, and defence of that liberty and power, whereby it may be settled and maintained; and that their resolutions be not damped, nor their activity obstructed, by the constitution of the forces here, or any other real evidence of this kind; which, as we are assured, is far from the intention of the honourable houses, so we are confident that their wisdoms will provide against it in the choice of their officers; seeing the commanders and officers are to have so great a charge as is the governing of the ship wherein both kingdoms are embarked in this time of tempest. 2. We desire that the army be not put in worse case, or weakened, by chusing or advancing of such,

who, by their education, have not military abilities and experience; or, through the removing of able and expert men of war from the army, or assigning of lower places in the army to such as, by their own merits, and the justice of the parliament, have formerly been more highly honoured; or, by want of such general officers, as the greatest in military science, and longest experienced in war, have found necessary in all compleat and well constituted armies; and, therefore, that there be particular notice taken of every officer's part for so great a trust; and that the army be full and perfect in all the offices, and all the officers thereof; and that with such expedition as the present posture of affairs doth require. 3. Seeing the honourable houses have judged fit to invite the Scots army to come Southward for the public service, and have written to the parliament of Scotland to that effect, referring the particular provisions to be made for their accommodation, to be reported by us; we do again, earnestly, desire to have an Answer to our paper concerning Monies, Arms, Ammunition, &c. that we may send an express with it, who hath been attending here some days, and hath been every day expected by them. We conceive dispatch in this to be the more necessary, being informed that as the enemy is active towards the West, so hath he a considerable strength marching towards the North; which, joining with the other forces that are there already, and such evil-affected persons as there be too many of in those parts, may increase to such strength as may be of dangerous consequence, if not timely prevented. These our serious thoughts and earnest desires, proceeding from the integrity of our hearts, and our sincere affection to the common cause in this time of so great exigence, without prejudice or respect to any man's person, will, we are confident, be taken and interpreted to no other sense by the wisdom of the houses of parliament, or by any person that loveth the public good. By the command of the commissioners for the parliament of Scotland.

“JOHN CHIESLEY.”

Shrewsbury and Weymouth taken by the Parliament's Forces.] March 4. Intelligence reached parliament of some great advantages gained by their forces against the king's; particularly of the taking Shrewsbury and the retaking of Weymouth: for which a day of thanksgiving was appointed, the preachers named, and the lord mayor and aldermen invited to meet the two houses of parliament at Christ-Church, to celebrate the day.—A Collection was ordered to be made, the same day, in the churches of London and Westminster, for the relief of the widows, maimed soldiers, and other poor in the towns of Plymouth, Melcombe-Regis, and Weymouth, and for the safety of the West.

The Commons declare that they will support the Rights of the Peerage.] By what has passed lately between the two houses, it may be observed, they did not always agree in their sen-iments; but on the contrary, the lords had differed with the commons in many things, which the other thought a great impediment to their labours in the great cause. This had occasioned a rumour, which then prevailed, That the lower house intended to disannul the Peerage.* Upon which the commons thought proper to make the following Declaration, and enter it in their Journals:

“The house of commons taking notice of some unworthy endeavours to asperse the integrity of their proceedings, as aiming at the overthrowing of the Peerage, and undermining the rights and privileges of the Peers, do unanimously declare, That they hold themselves obliged, by the fundamental laws of the land, their several Protestations and Covenant, to preserve the Peerage, with the rights and privileges belonging to the house of peers, equally as their own, and will really perform the same: and as, in the first place, they look to the carrying on that great common cause of religion and liberty, wherein both houses stand mutually engaged; which no respect whatsoever shall make either of them desert, and which they will not, God assisting them, suffer to miscarry; so shall they, to these public ends, be very careful to preserve a right understanding between the two houses; and will maintain the right and honour belonging to the places and persons of the peers of England.”

March 24. A conference was held between the two houses, by desire of the commons, at which sir John Evelyn delivered to the lords the foregoing Declaration, and spoke to this effect:—“That the occasion of this conference was upon some expressions of your lordships, at the last, concerning the happy correspondence between both houses, for the better carrying on the great cause now in hand. That it had been the endeavour of the enemy, from the beginning of this parliament, to sow divisions and jealousies between them; but, by the wisdom of the houses, they were prevented. The commons take special notice of a malicious scandal, spread abroad, of overthrowing the Peerage of England, which they do detest and abhor: and say, That if there be any that do dream it necessary to reduce all things to their first principles, and know no way to perfection but by confusion, may their thoughts perish with them! They cannot forget what your lordships noble ancestors have done for purchasing and preserving the liberties of the kingdom; nor will they forget wherein your lordships have out-done them, for the redeeming and recovering of them; wherein your lordships have denied your own safety, plenty, and all your interests, which will ever be acknowledged by the commons. That the commons will endeavour to find out the authors of this scandal upon them, and will desire your lordships concurrence to punish them; the thing in itself being so much contrary to the laws of nature, antient and laudable customs of all nations, grounds of reason and principles of religion, that they hope they shall use no other arguments to satisfy your lordships, than to tell you, That they that sit in the house of commons are gentlemen; and, that it might appear this was a fixed resolution, and no present complimentary civility, he was commanded to read this Declaration and leave it with your lordships.” Which being read, the lords immediately appointed a committee to consider of this Declaration, and to draw up what they thought fit to return to the commons in Answer to it.

An Ordinance passed by the Commons, for giving additional Power to General Fairfax.] March 29. The commons had passed, and sent up to the lords, an Ordinance for giving some additional Power to sir Thomas Fairfax their new General. The lords read this Ordinance three times, and made one additional clause and two alterations in it, and sent it back to the commons. This created a fresh dispute between the houses; and a conference being held this day about it, the report thereof, to the lords, was, “That the commons looked upon it as an unhappiness, that such a business as this should occasion a difference between the two houses: as to the two Alterations they agreed to the first, but objected to the second, and to the whole additional Clause, concerning the Security of the king’s person, &c. the commons conceiving that this addition would dishearten their soldiers, and encourage the king to adventure his person to come at the head of his army into danger, which perhaps otherwise he would not; and make the soldiers judges whether the king defends religion or not. They desired their lordships expedition in this business, as it so much concerns the safety of the kingdoms.”

Protests against it in the Lords.] After this Report was made, the lords entered into debate upon it; and the question being put, Whether that house would adhere to the Additional Clause as it was sent down to the commons? The Votes were 10 contents and 9 non-contents; but the lord Say and Sele tendering the earl of Mulgrave’s proxy, the votes were thereby made equal.—It does not appear that the Speaker of the house of lords, by a double suffrage, cast this question on either side, but that it stood undecided. For another question was immediately put, Whether to adhere to the Alteration in another clause, concerning forts and garrisons, as sent down to the commons? and it was resolved in the affirmative. The following lords asking leave to enter their dissent before the putting the question, we find it entered accordingly; which is the first Protest of

* Lord Hollis writes, “That General Cromwell declared to the earl of Manchester his hatred of the nobility and house of peers, wishing there was never a lord in England; and saying, He loved such and such, because they loved not lords; and that it would not be well till he was but Mr. Montague.” Memoirs, p. 18.

the lords, with the reasons in form, that we have met with for some years past :

“ Their lordships being satisfied with the Reasons the house of commons gave, at the conference this day, why the Alterations made by the house of peers, in that clause concerning the command of Forts and Garrisons, in the Ordinance for Additional Power to sir Tho. Fairfax, should not stand : and being, in an extraordinary manner, sensible of the great prejudice and hazard it may be to the safety of the parliament and kingdom, if, by the insisting upon the said Alteration, there be any delay in passing the said Ordinance ; to clear themselves of any inconveniences which may hereby happen, in a business of so great concernment, they have entered their Dissent as aforesaid. Salisbury, Say and Sele, Pembroke and Montgomery, Wharton, Northumberland, H. Kent, Howard, C. Nottingham.”

It was ordered, also, that the aforesaid lords should have leave to enter their Dissent to the Question concerning the whole Additional Clause to the Ordinance, whenever it should be carried against their Votes. Then a committee was appointed of those lords, who had voted for adhering to the Alteration, to prepare Reasons for it, to be offered to the commons at the next conference.

March 31. The question concerning the Additional Clause was again put, and the Votes standing exactly as before, ten to nine, were made equal by the earl of Mulgrave's proxy ; so that it remained still undecided.

The same day came up a Message from the commons to the lords, importing, “ That they had lately sent up an Ordinance for Additional Power to sir Thomas Fairfax, which their lordships had returned with an Addition and Alterations. That the commons sent it up again, with Reasons, to which they have not heard any thing from their lordships. Now the commons had received Letters, this morning, That the Army is in mutiny and disorders, and they know not who to obey till this Ordinance be passed ; sir Thomas having no power to do any thing : the house of commons say, “ They have done their parts ; therefore if any inconveniency comes upon the staying of it, they conceive it will not lie upon them.” Mr. Lisle carried up this Message attended by the whole house, the Speaker leaving the chair for that purpose.

The Lords sent first for Answer, “ That they would return one by messengers of their own ;” and then sent two to acquaint the commons, “ That they were resolved to sit that afternoon, at four o'clock, about important business concerning the public ; and to desire that they would sit likewise, if it stood with their conveniency.” Agreed to.

March 31, p. m. The lords sat in order to determine this affair, if possible ; and the question for the lords adhering to the Additional Clause, which was again read, being put, it was once more carried in the affirmative. The lords following entering their dissent, for the reasons given in the last ; and to acquit themselves of all inconveniences which might happen in a business of so great concernment. Northumberland, Kent, Pembroke and Montgomery, Say and Sele, Salisbury, Wharton, North, Howard.

Ordered, That the last named committee shall draw up Reasons, to be offered to the commons at a conference, for adhering to the Additional Clause as aforesaid. And in regard it was then late, and the drawing up the Reasons would require some time, the conference was desired to be the next morning at 10 o'clock.

The E. of Essex resigns his Commission of Lord General.] April 1. The earl of Denbigh, one of the committee for the Reasons to be given to the commons, reported them to the house ; but the earl of Essex cut this matter short, by desiring that he might have leave to present, and deliver up, his commission to the houses ; and so, he said, there would be no obstacle for the passing of the clause, concerning the Forts and Garrisons, to be put under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax. The lords, after this Declaration of the lord generals, retracted all their former Votes and Resolutions ; and acquainted the commons at the conference, That they agreed with them in leaving out of the Ordinance the Additional Clause and the Alterations ; which plainly proves what the earl of Essex had said, “ That his Commission was the only obstacle that prevented it.”

The Earl's Declaration upon that Occasion.] April 2. The earl of Essex, according to his promise, brought his Commission, as General in Chief, to the lords ; and delivered it to them, along with a Declaration, which he desired might be read ;* viz.

“ My lords ; Having received this great charge, in obedience to the commands of both houses, and taken their sword into my hand, I can, with confidence, say, that I have for this now almost 3 years, faithfully served you ; and I hope, without loss of honour to myself, or prejudice to the public ; supported therein by the goodness of God, and the fidelity and courage of a great many gallant men, both officers and soldiers : but I will neither trouble you, nor myself, by repeating either the difficulties or danger we have overcome, or the service I have done you.—I see by the now coming up of these Ordinances, that it is the desire of the house of commons, that my Commission may be vacated ; and it hath been no particular respect to myself (whatever is whispered to the contrary) that hath made me thus long omit to declare my readiness thereto ; it being not unknown to divers men of honour, that I had resolved it after the action of Gloucester ; but that some importunities (pressed on me with arguments of public advantage, and that by those of unquestionable affection) overruled me therein. I now do it; and return my commission into those hands that gave it me; wishing it may prove as good an expedient to the present distempers, as some will have it believed; which I shall pray for with as hearty zeal as any can desire my doing that which I now do.—I think it not immodest, that I intreat both houses, that those officers of mine, which are now laid by, might have their debentures audited, some considerable part of their arrears paid them for their support, and the remainder secured them by the public faith; and that those of them that remain questioned may be brought to some speedy trial, whereby they may receive either the punishment or justification that is due to them: under which notion, I remember only three; of whom I must testify, that they frankly and courageously have adventured their lives, and lost their blood, for the public; and that with continued fidelity, for ought ever I could observe.—My lords; I know that jealousies cannot be avoided in the unhappy condition of our present affairs: yet wisdom and charity should put such restraints thereto, as not to allow it to become destructive. I hope that this advice from me is not unseasonable, wishing myself, and my friends may, among others, participate the benefit thereof; this proceeding from my affection to the parliament, the prosperity whereof I shall ever wish from my heart, what return soever it bring me; I being no single example, in that kind, of that fortune I now undergo. Essex.”

The Earls of Manchester and Denbigh resign their Commissions.] Next, the earl of Manchester signified to the lords, “That he having received the honour to be major general of the associated counties of Essex, Hertford, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, and Lincoln, by Ordinance of both houses, wherein he had faithfully, to his power, served them; he, perceiving he can be no farther useful to the houses in that way, desires the favour that he may have leave to resign up the said commission to the houses.”

Then the earl of Denbigh also signified to the lords, “That he having received authority from the houses of parliament to be chief commander in the associated counties of Warwick, Salop, and Stafford; wherein he hath endeavoured to discharge his duty faithfully; and, as affairs are now disposed, his lordship cannot be further useful in that way, he desires he may have leave to resign up his commission to the houses again.”

Hereupon the lords appointed a committee, to consider what course was fit to be taken, for the satisfaction of those officers that will be out of employment by the earls of Essex, Manchester, and Denbigh's having surrendered their commissions; and to report the same to the House. It was also ordered, That the Declarations of the said earls be communicated to the Commons at a conference.

VOL. III.

Declaration of both Houses in Favour of these three Earls.] The same day the lord Wharton reported from that committee what they conceived fit to offer on that occasion; which was read and approved, as follows:—“The earls of Essex, Denbigh, and Manchester, having this day, in the house of lords, tendered and laid down their commissions, that house desired this conference to acquaint the commons therewith; and that the lords have accepted thereof, in which the concurrence of the commons is desired, their commissions being derived from the authority of both houses. And the house doth hereby further declare their sense, That they look upon this action of these lords, in this conjuncture of time, as a fit testimony of their duty to the houses of parliament, under whom they have so long served in so eminent employment. And the house of peers also desire, that their services and fortunes may be taken into consideration, in such a way as may, according to their several merits, express the acceptance and value both houses have of their faithfulness and industry, in the commands and hazards they have undergone for the public good of the kingdom and safety of the parliament. And this house doth propound to the house of commons, that some speedy course may be taken and declared, that the officers which are laid aside, who have served under any of these three lords, may have satisfaction in the point of their arrears, by the payment of some part thereof for their support, and security for the remainder on the public faith.”—To all these proposals the commons gave their assent, and appointed a committee accordingly.

The Lords pass the Self-denying Ordinance.] April 3. To strengthen the good agreement between the two houses, the lords read a third time and passed the Self-denying Ordinance, for discharging the members of both houses from enjoying any office military or civil, unanimously; and resolved to have a conference with the other house to acquaint them with it; at which conference the lord Say and Seal delivered himself in this manner:—“The lords have passed the Ordinance sent up by you, for discharging the members of both houses from all offices, both military and civil, without any addition or alteration, to prevent delays: this Ordinance being passed, the lords think fit to propound that those places in the kingdom, which the nobility usually heretofore have been intrusted with, as the Great Seal, that of the Revenue, and the Admiralty and Navy, being now managed by committees, those committees may consist of members of both houses, as the power they exercise is derived from both: to this end they desire, that the Great Seal may be continued in the hands of those lords and commons who are now intrusted with it; that a proportionable number of lords may be added to the committee for the Revenue; that the Admiralty and Navy may be settled in a committee of lords and commons, chosen for that purpose; and, lastly, that this may be done by Ordinance of parliament, to continue for six months."

The ORDINANCE was as follows :

" Be it ordained by the lords and commons assembled in parliament, That all and every of the members of either house of parliament shall be, and, by authority of this Ordinance, are, discharged, at the end of 40 days after the passing of this Ordinance, of and from all and every office or command military or civil, granted or conferred by both or either of the said houses of this present parliament, or by any authority derived from both or either of them, since the 20th of Nov. 1640.—And be it further ordained, That all other governors and commanders of any islands, town, castle or fort, and all other colonels, and officers inferior to colonels in the several armies, not being members of either of the said houses of parliament, shall, according to their respective commissions, continue in their several places and commands wherein they were employed and intrusted the 20th of March, 1644, as if this Ordinance had not been made. And that the vice-admiral, rear-admiral, and all other captains, and other inferior officers in the fleet, shall, according to their several and respective commissions, continue in their several places and commands wherein they were employed and intrusted the said 20th of March, 1644, as if this Ordinance had not been made.—Provided always, and it is further ordained and declared, That during this war, the benefit of all offices, being neither military nor judicial, hereafter to be granted, or any way to be appointed to any person or persons by both or either house of parliament, or by authority derived from thence, shall go, and enure to such public uses, as both houses of parliament shall appoint; and the grantees and persons, executing all such offices, shall be accountable to the parliament for all the profits and perquisites thereof, and shall have no profit out of any such office, other than a competent salary for the execution of the same, in such manner as both houses of parliament shall order and ordain.—Provided, That this Ordinance shall not extend to take away the power and authority of any lieutenancy, or deputy-lieutenancy, in the several counties, cities or places; or of any Custos Rotulorum, or of any commission for justice of peace, or sewers, or any commission of oyer and terminer, or goal-delivery.—Provided always, and it is hereby declared, That those members of either house, who had offices by grant from his majesty before this parliament, and were by his majesty displaced sitting this parliament, and have since, by authority of both houses, been restored, shall not, by this Ordinance, be discharged from their said offices or profits thereof, but shall enjoy the same; any thing in this Ordinance to the contrary thereof notwithstanding."

The Lords Answer to the Commons' Declaration in regard to the Peerage.] April 4. The earl of Northumberland, from the committee appointed to consider of the Declaration of the commons in regard to the preservation of the Peerage, and what was to be delivered at a conference about it, read the following Paper, which was agreed to by the whole house :

" The lords taking into consideration the seasonable and acceptable Declaration, which the house of commons lately made with respect to the Peers, have thought fit to let you know, that, notwithstanding some discourses that pass frequently about this town, they could never suspect that the house of commons, composed of so many gentlemen of antient families, would do any act to the prejudice of the nobility of England; so as, upon this assurance which you have given them by this Declaration, they do rest fully satisfied of the house of commons real intention to maintain the rights, privileges, and honours belonging to the places and persons of the peers; which doth not only encourage them chearfully to join with you in hazarding their lives and fortunes, for the carrying on of this common cause, wherein both houses and the whole kingdom are now so deeply engaged; but will, by the blessing of God, prove the most effectual and certain means so firmly to unite the houses, and settle so perfect an understanding between them, as shall frustrate the endeavours of all those who seek to misinform, asperse, or divide the houses; and may, probably, soonest deliver the kingdom from the miseries which they suffer by this unnatural war: and the lords do desire the house of commons to be assured, that they will be as tender of any thing that concerns the house of commons, as they can be of their own honour and just rights."

Ordinance for an Oath to be taken by all that come in to the Protection of the Parliament.] April 5. The lords read a third time and passed an Ordinance, 'For enabling the commissioners of the great seal, and the other committees in their several counties, to tender an Oath to all such persons, of what degree or quality soever, that should come in to the Protection of the Parliament.' By this Ordinance, every person, that had lived within the king's quarters, or been aiding, assisting, or adhering unto the forces raised against the parliament, and had or should come to inhabit or reside under the power and protection of the parliament, was required to take the following Oath :

" I, A. B. do swear from my heart, that I will not, directly nor indirectly, adhere unto or willingly assist the king in this war, or in this cause, against the parliament, nor any forces raised, without the consent of the two houses of parliament, in this cause or war. And I do likewise swear, That my coming and submitting myself under the power and protection of the parliament, is without any manner of design whatsoever to the prejudice of the proceedings of the two houses of this present parliament; and without the direction, privity, or advice of the king, or any of his council or officers, other than what I have now made known. So help me God, and the contents of this book."

Within a few days after the passing of this Ordinance, the following peers, who had left the king's quarters at Oxford, came to London, and took this Oath before the commissioners of the great seal, viz. the earls of Leicester, Bedford, Clare, Holland, Thanet, Monmouth, Carlisle, and Westmoreland; with the lords Paget, Rich, Coventry, and Saville.

The Earl of Warwick's Declaration on surrendering his Commission of Lord-Admiral.] April 9. The earl of Warwick signified to the lords, That as he had received the honour from the parliament to be Admiral of England, so he, as willingly, desired leave of that house to surrender his Commission; which he did accordingly, with this Declaration:

"My lords; Being lately in Kent, to speed out the fleet, that an easterly wind might not prevent their seasonable getting out of the river; and receiving notice of an Ordinance of parliament, whereby the members of both houses, holding offices under their authority, stand discharged after the end of 40 days, I thought it my duty (after my giving in charge to the captains then in those parts to be faithful to their trust) to make my return back, that I might testify my chearful compliance with the houses resolution. While I have had the honour to serve the parliament in the great trust by them reposed in me, both since my being lord-admiral and before, I have endeavoured to perform my duty with fidelity and diligence; being acted therein by no other design, but a desire to advance God's glory, and my country's service: and my endeavours, though accompanied with those common infirmities that are incident to men, have, through the blessing and goodness of God, not been without some visible advantage to the public; being made instrumental to preserve the parliament's interest in the Fleet, when it was laboured, by letters and commands, under the broad seal, from his majesty, to be turned against them: and some service hath accrued to the state by the relieving our friends, and interception of supplies intended to the enemy, besides those less observable preventions of danger, which, without a vigilant eye, might have infested the kingdom.—But as I did, in obedience to the command of both houses, receive, and hitherto manage, that employment; so did my heart, with all possible readiness, submit to their pleasure, so soon as it was held forth in that Ordinance: and therefore, in testification of that high and honourable esteem that I owe, and sincerely bear, to their wisdoms, I do, with all humility and chearfulness, resign and surrender into their hands the office of Lord-Admiral, wherewith they were pleased formerly to intrust me: and shall value it as my highest honour and contentment, next to my God, to be serviceable to them and my country, in any other condition whereinto his providence shall cast me; not counting my person nor dearest interests too precious to be laid out in maintenance of that great cause of religion and liberty, wherein they are so justly engaged. And, in all their resolutions, my faithful and ready concurrence shall demonstrate to all the world, that my highest ambition is no other, than to contribute my best endeavours for their service; and that I am resolved to stand and fall with them in the upholding God's truth and the public liberty; knowing well, by many years experience, that the welfare of this kingdom cannot subsist without God's blessing in the preservation and safety of the parliament; which I here present as the real and candid expressions of a mind full of integrity and humble respect towards them. And I shall join my prayers, together with my utmost assistances, that as God hath thus far honoured them with doing of great services to his name, so he will continue to shine upon their councils, until this shaken kingdom be established upon a lasting, honourable, and holy foundation. WARWICK."

This Declaration being read, the lords ordered it to be delivered, at a conference, to the commons; which was done the next day, with an introduction in the same words as that before to the earl of Essex. Both houses also passed the same complimentary Vote on this lord as on the last resigning lords; and this office of lord high admiral was, soon after, put under commissioners of both houses, by an Ordinance made for that purpose.

The Dutch Ambassadors Speech at taking Leave of the Parliament.] April 10. The Ambassadors from the States of Holland had been now a long time in England, without effecting any thing in their Mediation for Peace, between the king and parliament; they therefore desired an audience of leave from the latter, which was this day granted them by the lords; at which they spoke, and afterwards delivered, in French, the following Memorial. There is a translation of it entered in the Lords Journals, but it is very incorrect. The following is taken from a copy of the times, translated by their Excellencies secretary: * and we find, by the Commons Journals, that complaint having been made to that house of the printing this translation, it appeared to have been done by the Ambassadors orders, at which the commons took great offence, as will appear hereafter.

THE SPEECH of the STATES Ambassadors Extraordinary, at their taking leave of the Parliament,

"Right honourable; Two things have moved our lords and superiors to send us their ambassadors extraordinary into this kingdom, viz. Their duty, and your service. The first consisted in their power, and in the resentment of the present distractions; the other being altogether in your choice to accept, if you should like of it. We have long ago, and divers times, spoken unto your honours of the one and the other; as likewise unto the king, who hath honoured so much our state, as to have accepted the offers of our interposition. But we are still with your honours upon the same terms we were at the beginning, without any certitude or likelihood to be accepted. We have already obtained our leave from the king, and have left his majesty full of good-will and disposition for a just and reasonable Accommodation; likewise we parted from him well satisfied concerning the point of the Evangelic-Protestant Religion, upon the offers he hath lately permitted us to make.—And as concerning the royal rights or prerogatives, the liberties and privileges of this kingdom, and the parliament, and of all the subjects, no doubt when that his majesty shall be satisfied, he will also satisfy every one.—But, sirs, we can stay no longer here, unless your honours accept of our interposition, without which we are useless; and from hence it is our lords and superiors have charged us, in such a case, to take our leave and return to our own home. In performance of which last duty, we are here come before you, assuring you, we shall never cease to wish unto this heretofore flourishing kingdom, an Accommodation and Peace; which is, and ever will be as profitable as necessary.”

State of the Parliament's Army under the Command of Sir Tho. Fairfax.] April 28. A List, of the pay and entertainment of the Army under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax, was read and agreed to by the lords. In this List are included all the general officers of the field and train; 11 regiments of horse, 12 of foot, with a regiment of dragoons and all their officers; the total sum per annum, for maintaining this army, amounted to 623,523*l.* 12*s.* There are various ways pointed out, in the Journals, for raising the money for maintaining this army, by many heavy taxations on all who were subject to the power of parliament: nor could the king do otherwise in his quarters, for the support of his forces and garrisons; which, as it appears from Rushworth, were, at the beginning of this campaign, much more numerous and better stationed than those of his adversaries.

April 28. A Vote passed both houses for sending sir Thomas Fairfax and his army into the West of England; particularly for the relief of Taunton, then closely besieged by the king's forces. But, some days after, on the news that prince Rupert and Maurice, with general Goring, had joined their forces and were come near Oxford, the parliament ordered sir Tho. Fairfax to be recalled from his march to the West, and to keep nearer home till further orders.

General Cromwell's Account of his Success in Oxfordshire.] The committee of both kingdoms reported to the lords a Letter they had received from lieutenant-general Cromwell, concerning the defeat of some forces of the king's under colonel Windebank, as follows:

“My lords and gentlemen; According to your lordships appointment, I have attended your service in these parts, and have not had so fit an opportunity to give you an Account as now: so soon as I received your commands, I appointed a rendezvous at Watlington; the body being come up I marched to Wheatley Bridge, having sent before to major-general Browne for intelligence; and it being market-day at Oxford, from whence I likewise hoped by some of the market people to gain notice where the enemy was. Towards night I received certain notice by major-general Browne, that the carriages were not stirred, that prince Maurice was not here, and by some Oxford scholars, that there are 4 carriages and waggons ready in one place, and in another 5, all (as I conceived) fit for a march. I received notice also that the earl of Northampton's regiment was quartered at Islip; wherefore, in the evening, I marched that way, hoping to have surprized them; but, by the mistake and failing of the forlorn hope, they had an alarm there, and to all their quarters, and so escaped me, by means whereof they had time to draw all together. I kept my body all night at Islip, and, in the morning, a party of the earl of Northampton's regiment, the lord Wilmot's and the queen's, came to make an infall upon me. Sir Thomas Fairfax's regiment was the first that took the field, the rest drew out with all possible speed; that which is the general's troop charged a whole squadron of the enemy, and presently broke it; our other troops coming seasonably on, the rest of the enemy were presently put into confusion; so that we had the chase of them 3 or 4 miles; wherein we killed many, and took near 200 prisoners, and about 400 horse: many of them escaped towards Oxford and Woodstock, divers were drowned, and others got into a strong house in Bletchington, belonging to sir Tho. Cogan, wherein colonel Windebank kept a garrison with near 200 men, whom I presently summoned; and, after a long Treaty, he went out about 12 at night, with these terms here inclosed, leaving us between 2 and 300 muskets, besides horse, arms, and other ammunition, and about threescore and eleven horses more.—This was the merey of God, and nothing more due than a real acknowledgment; and though I have had greater mercies, yet none clearer; because, in the first, God brought them to our hands when we looked not for them; and delivered them out of our hands, when we laid a reasonable design to surprize them, and which we carefully endeavoured. His mercy appears in this also, that I did much doubt the storming of the house, it being strong and well manned, and I having few dragoons, and this being not my business; and yet we got it. I hope you will pardon me if I say, God is not enough owned; we look too much to men and visible helps; this hath much hindered our success; but I hope God will direct all to acknowledge him, alone, in all. Your most humble Servant, OLIVER CROMWELL. Bletchington, April 25, 1645.”

The king so much resented this surrender, so near Oxford, that colonel Windebank, the commander of this party, was afterwards tried by a court-martial, condemned for cowardice and treachery, and shot at Oxford for it.

General Cromwell continued in his Command in the Army, notwithstanding the Self-denying Ordinance.] May 10. The parliament proceeded to name all the officers that were to serve in their different garrisons, according to their late Self-denying Ordinance; a long account of which is in the Journals. But we find that general Cromwell, though a member of the house of commons, was ordered to continue in his command for 40 days longer; his last advices shewing that he was of signal service to the cause. "This dispensation," says Mr. Whitlocke, "was much spoken against by the earl of Essex's party, as a breach of that Ordinance, and a discovery of their intentions to continue whom they pleased and to remove others from command, notwithstanding their former Self-denying pretences."

How accounted for by the Contemporary Historians.] Lord Hollis writes, "That this continuance of Cromwell's command in the army was so gross and diametrically against the letter of the Self-denying Ordinance, that it put them to some trouble how to bring it about. For this, says he, Cromwell's soldiers, forsooth, must mutiny, and say, 'They will have their Cromwell, or they will not stir.' Hereupon he must be sent down. Yet for these very men had Cromwell undertaken before, when, upon debate, the inconveniency was objected which might follow by discontenting the common soldiers, who would hardly be drawn to leave their old officers and go under new, he could say, 'That his soldiers had learnt to obey the parliament, to go or stay, fight or lay by the sword upon their command;' which prevailed with a great many to give their Vote with that Ordinance. By this trick a little beginning was made towards the breach of it, which was soon made greater: for they caused a report to be spread, That the king was bending with his forces towards the Isle of Ely, which none could save but Cromwell, who must be sent in all haste for that service, and an order of dispensation is made for a very few months; but with such protestations of that party, that this was only for that exigency, and that for the world they would not have the Ordinance impeached; that Mr. Solicitor* said, 'If no body would move for calling him home at the expiration of that time, he would.' But all this was to gull the house. Mr. Solicitor had forgot his protestation, and before that was out there is another Order for more months, and so renewed from time to time; that, at last, this great commander is riveted in the army, and so fast riveted, as after all his orders of continuance were at an end, he would keep his command still, notwithstanding that Ordinance, without any order at all of the house for it."

Lord Clarendon also gives the following account of Cromwell's dextrous management on this occasion, "As soon as the Self-denying Ordinance was passed, and before the resignation of the earl of Essex, the party that steered had caused Cromwell to be sent with a body of horse into the West to relieve Taunton, that he might be absent at the time when the other officers delivered their commissions; which was quickly observed, and thereupon orders were given, to require his present attendance in parliament, and that their new general should send some other officer to attend that service; which was pretended to be done, and the very day named, by which it was averred that he would be in the house. A rendezvous was then appointed, for their new general to take a view of their troops, that he might appoint officers to succeed those who had left their commands by virtue of the Ordinance; and likewise in their places who gave up their commands, and refused to serve in the new model, who were a great number of their best commanders. From this rendezvous the general sent to desire the parliament, 'that they would give lieut. general Cromwell leave to stay with him for some few days, for his better information, without which he should not be able to perform what they expected from him.' The request seeming so seasonable, and being for so short a time, little opposition was made to it; and shortly after, by another letter, he desired with very much earnestness, 'that they would allow Cromwell to serve for that campaign.' Thus they compassed their whole design, in being rid of all those whose affections they knew were not agreeable to theirs, and keeping Cromwell in command; who in the name of Fairfax, modelled the army, and placed such officers as were well known to him, and to no body else, and absolutely governed the whole martial affairs."

The E. of Warwick delivers to the Lords the State of the Fleet.] May 13. The earl of Warwick reported to the lords, 'That some of the parliament's ships had taken a vessel, in which was found a commission from the king to grant licences to all states to take up ships to be employed against the parliament: there was also another commission read, taken at the same time, constituting sir N. De Wit chief commander of a fleet of 6 ships or more, to do all possible damage and hostility, in commerce or navigation, to every of his majesty's subjects, who were or should be then in rebellion against him.' Upon which, the earl was ordered to give the house the State of the Fleet, as it was then, in order to obviate the dangers threatened by these two commissions. Next day, the said earl delivered in the following Paper:

"My lords; In obedience to your lordships command, I do present unto you the State of the Fleet now at sea, as followeth: The number of ships and vessels provided for this summer's expedition (besides 6 for guard of the fishermen and colliers) are 49, whereof about 10 are small vessels; and, of them, some of little other use but as packet-boats; which Ships and Vessels are thus to be disposed, viz. For a guard of the Irish seas, 9; whereof 2 are packet-boats; one employed remote on the North-west of Ireland. For the Scots Guard, in pursuance of the Treaty, 7; besides one more that is to be taken up. Designed to the blocking up of Bristol, 7; whereof 3 taken out of the other squadrons, and 4 additional, besides 2 shallops, and 2 other shallops for Weymouth. At Guernsey, for safeguard thereof, and blocking up Castle-Cornet, 3. For convoy at the Downs, less cannot attend than 5. There will be through the whole expedition, in port, to revictual, repair, go up with prizes, &c. by estimation, 5; in toto, 37. So there will rest 13, upon which the performance of these services will necessarily depend, viz. The attendance of the enemies ports in the West and North of England; the appointing of ships to lie before Ostend, Dunkirk, Newport, St. Malo, &c. to intercept ammunition, &c. the encouragement and relieving of the parliament's ports; the plying at sea, from the North of England to the Land's-End Westward; the preventing and resisting of affronts for maintaining the sovereignty of the seas.—And, considering the daily and great losses of our merchants by sea; the number of ships employed against the parliament, under pretence of his majesty's commission; the further preparation of shipping in Holland, Ostend, and other parts of Flanders, to infest the trade of this kingdom; and that, if the enemy continue to disturb the trade of the kingdom, and seize our ships, the enemy will be thereby furnished with a considerable fleet from ourselves; the Customs and Excise, whereby the preparations both by sea and land are maintained, will be much withdrawn; the merchants will be impoverished in their estates, and discouraged in their trade; the mariners will be partly necessitated, through want of employment here, and partly encouraged by the profitableness of employment elsewhere, to betake themselves to foreign services. I shall be bold therefore humbly to offer to consideration, Whether the public service of the kingdom will not suffer, if a greater number of ships be not provided and set forth."

When this Memorial was read in the house of commons, they next proceeded to name a commander in chief, or vice-admiral of the Fleet, for this summer's expedition, and appointed captain Batten for that expedition*. And the question being proposed, Whether the lords concurrence should be desired to this Order? It passed in the negative by only 41 against 39.

The Parliament resolve to besiege Oxford. May 17. The commons sent up a Message to the lords, to let their lordships know, "That the house of commons, out of a desire to put an end to this miserable war, do think it fit that Siege be laid to the city of Oxford, for the taking it, it being the center of our troubles. There being a considerable strength of Scots and English in the North, to hinder the king's army from going Northward, and able to give him battle; likewise affairs are of that good posture in the West, as to give battle to any forces there; so that it will conduce most to the ending of the war to send a sufficient force to besiege Oxford; to that purpose the commons desire their lordships concurrence for the approving this design, for the speedy reducing of Oxford; and that the city of London, at a common council, be acquainted therewith, by some other members of both houses, on Tuesday next, at three in the afternoon; and the reason of this design urged, and their concurrent assistance desired: and further to desire their lordships would nominate some of their house to go to the common council, that they may nominate a proportionable number. And because that men and money are the only sinews to carry on this design, they have framed a copy of a letter to be sent to the several counties who are behind in their payments of the assessments for the maintenance of sir Thomas Fairfax's Army, and to further the recruiting of that army; and desire it may be referred to the committee of both kingdoms to send away those Letters."

Pursuant to this, the lords having given their concurrence, the Siege of Oxford was commenced; which, however, at that time, proved of no effect.

The Parliament's Remonstrance to the Dutch, relating to the Conduct of their Ambassadors. May 28. The following Declaration was published by order of both houses, on occasion of the conduct of the States Ambassadors Extraordinary, which, as we before took notice, (p. 358) had given great offence to the parliament:

To the High and Mighty Lords the STATES GENERAL of the United Provinces of the Netherlands.

"High and mighty lords; We the lords and commons of England, in parliament assembled, do, with all thankfulness, acknowledge your Christian and neighbourly zeal to the peace of this nation, wherefrom we doubt not, and from no other consideration, you were pleased to employ Boreel of Amsterdam, and De Reed of Utrecht, both made knights, and afterwards Barons, by the king, as your Ambassadors for inviting him to return to his duty, and for restoring us to a better confidence of his future carriage: notwithstanding your fair intentions, (which perhaps, being well managed might have produced happy effects) we must not conceal from you, that your ministers have grossly abused their trust, to our prejudice, in making themselves rather interested parties than public agents; and to shew that not only you have been deceived, but we despised and affronted by them, we think fit to present the inclosed* to your consideration, wherein they were not satisfied to reproach us to our faces, and to take upon them to judge the quarrel against us, except they gloried in it by making their boldness public, and increasing it by the addition of their own authority. Other particulars concerning the same persons we have here authorized these bearers (unto whom we desire credence may be given) to relate unto you, and demand justice upon them, in our behalf: upon the whole matter, we do not doubt but that you, who very well know how much more ill there is in war than in oppression, will either afford your best assistance in suppressing tyranny and preserving our religion, or at least be indifferent spectators of our labours to deliver ourselves: and, God be blessed for it, our condition is not yet so low but that we can resent, if not return, both courtesies and injuries; which we therefore add, because we know it will be comfortable to our friends to hear, and because we desire to give a testimony thereof, if it shall please you to express unto us wherein we may be useful to your States, our honoured neighbours and Predecessors, in the like sufferings."

The great Successes of the King's Army.]

June 1. The campaign being now opened, the king's forces, at the beginning of it, gained greatly on the parliament. His majesty took the field in person, and soon after, general Fairfax laid siege to Oxford; but, upon the taking of Leicester by storm, by the king's forces, together with some other fortresses, deserted by the parliament, orders were sent to Fairfax to raise the siege. These, with some other advantages, as the raising the siege of Chester, &c. made the royal army seem so formidable, at this time, as if nothing could withstand it.

Petition from the City of London to the House of Lords on that Occasion.] To shew in what terror and consternation the city of London was then in, we subjoin the following Petition from the Magistrates of that body, read in the house of lords on the 5th of this month.

To the Right Honourable the Lords now assembled in the High Court of Parliament, The PETITION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled,

"Humbly sheweth; That the inhabitants of this city, and parts adjacent, are generally most deeply sensible of those pressing miseries, under which they and the whole kingdom now groan, and that imminent ruin which is coming upon both through the relieving of Chester, and the inexpressible loss of Liecester, the barbarous cruelty executed there, the danger of the rest of our garrisons well-affected thereabouts, and the increasing and prevailing of the enemy, both by sea and land, like a mighty torrent: that, among other causes which have had a deep influence upon this sad posture of our condition, the said inhabitants apprehend that the not compleating of sir Thomas Fairfax's army, according to an Ordinance of parliament in that behalf; the want of such a committee in that army, as may give our commanders in chief power and encouragement to improve all present advantage, without attending commands and directions from remote councils; the calling back of lieut. gen. Cromwell and major-gen. Browne, when they were pursuing the enemy; the not advancing of our brethren in Scotland into these Southern parts; the great decay of trade and discouragement of merchants, for want of a constant convoy; his majesty's publishing his case of the proceedings at the late Treaty, and the parliament not publishing their sense thereof, and their resolution against free trade, by sea, to such ports as are, or shall be, in the power of the enemy, have been the chief.—That great numbers of those inhabitants have lately expressed their earnest desires, by Petition and otherwise, to the representative body of the city, in common council assembled, that this their deep sense and apprehensions might forthwith be made known to both houses of parliament; their humble suit, that the remedies might speedily be considered of, and effectually executed; and their resolutions, according to all former expressions, that they will not think their lives, or any thing they possess, too dear to hazard for their encouragement and preservation.—Therefore, the petitioners, for preventing of further miseries, inconveniences, and utter ruin of the parliament, this city, and kingdom, make it their humble request to this honourable house, that care may be taken for the speedy recruiting of sir Thomas Fairfax's Army. And, for his encouragement, that such a committee may be sent to that army, as may give the commanders in chief, of whose faithfulness the kingdom hath had such large testimonies, power and encouragement to improve all present advantage as aforesaid; that the said army, or such part thereof as your wisdoms shall think meet, may be ordered forthwith to march towards our enemies in the field, as well for the regaining of Leicester, if it be possible, before it be made impregnable by fortifications, as also for prevention of the enemy's further surprizing of other places of strength, and destroying the rest who have appeared in defence of the parliament, and for preservation of the kingdom; that our brethren of Scotland may be the more earnestly pressed to march Southwards; that lieut. general Cromwell may presently have power to raise and command the Association, until such other course be taken as may attend the safety of those counties, and of the city and kingdom; that the navy may be so ordered as may encourage merchants and advance trade, by having constant convoys; that the proceedings at the late Treaty may be forthwith published by the parliament, and their resolutions against free trade as aforesaid, And the petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c. MICHEL."

The earls of Northumberland and Manchester, and the lord Roberts, were appointed to draw up what Answer was fit to be returned to this Petition pursuant to the sense of the house.

June 5. The said lords made their Report; and the aldermen and others, who had presented the Petition, being called in, the Speaker delivered the sense of the house to this effect: "He took notice of their good affections in their care for preventing some probable disorders; that the house recommended it to the care of those who have the government of the city, to hinder any thing prejudicial to the privileges of the parliament; in which the public safety is involved, and unto which they are by the Solemn League and Covenant obliged. For the matters contained in their Petition they would take them into their consideration in convenient time; and made no doubt but the city would acquiesce with the judgment of parliament."

It is easy to see, by this Answer, that the lords were not over well pleased with the subject and nature of this Petition. But, however it was, either this Remonstrance from the city, or the king's growing strength and progress, quickened the parliament's several committees for war to write into various counties to put the Press Ordinances in full force, for raising men to compleat their general's army; they being, this day, informed, that the king was marching Southward, his forlorn hope being at Harborough, the main body following, and the foot quartered about Kibworth, Noseley, Skeffington and Tilton, in Leicestershire.

The Parliament resolve to allow Pensions to such Members as had lost their Estates.] About this time it was, that the commons made an Order on purpose to relieve their own Members, who had lost or been deprived of the benefit of their Estates, by this unnatural war, so termed, made by the king against the parliament, or were in such necessity, that they could not, without supplies, attend the service of the house. These were to be allowed four pounds a week separately, to be paid quarterly, to begin from Lady-Day last, out of the revenues of the king, queen, or prince that were in their hands.

An intercepted Letter from the Lord Digby.]

June 7. An intercepted Letter, from the lord Digby to colonel Wm. Legge, governor of Oxford, was read to the lords in hæc verba:

"Dear Governor; Just as this messenger was taking horse, I received yours of the 22d, for which I thank you; assuring you that nothing can come more welcome to me than your kindness. The reason of my limitation in your orders, concerning the Oath, was, chiefly, not to give umbrage to my lord Southampton, if it had been general. I have not time to write at large, both to you and my brother secretary, in cypher; and therefore must refer you to his letter, wherein you will see where our design lies. The letter to C. C. C. contained nothing but a dislike of my Answer to the Propositions you write of, as not at all satisfactory; all is villainy and juggling amongst them. Dear Will, adieu; let us hear from you often. I am your faithful friend and servant, GEO. DIGBY. May 26, 1645."

The ambiguity of this Letter made the lords believe that it was a business of great concernment; they therefore thought it fit to be examined by a joint committee of both houses, who were accordingly appointed, to send for and examine such persons as they should think proper, to discover the truth of this business; to keep secrecy, and report it afterwards to the house.

Letter from General Fairfax, &c. to desire the Continuance of Cromwell in the Army.]

June 10. A Letter from general Fairfax and other officers, was this day read to the lords; the purport of which was to continue general Cromwell in the Army, notwithstanding the Self-denying Ordinance; and was as follows:

"My lord; Sherrington, June 8, 1645.

"Upon serious consideration how the horse of this army may be best ordered to the advantage of the public service, we find, that being as great a body as ever the parliament had together in one army, and yet having no general officer to command them; for want thereof, both much of the service they might do will be impeded, and great danger and inconveniences may befall the whole army, especially in a day of battle: therefore, we make hold to represent to your lordships and the honourable house our humble desires, that lieutenant general Cromwell, so long as his attendance on the house of commons may be dispensed with, may be appointed to execute that place; which we hope may prove as advantageous to the general good, as it will be acceptable to us, &c. Thomas Fairfax, John Butler, Cha. Fleetwood, Edward Whalley, Philip Skippon, Tho. Sheffield, Tho. Rainbow, Henry Ireton, Harcourt Leighton, Tho. Herbert, John Potter, Wm. Spencer, Wm. Slaine, Leonard Watson, Tho. Hammond, E. Mountague, John Pickering, Robert Hammond."

The lords ordered this letter to be taken into consideration the next morning, and all the lords to have notice to attend. But there is no further mention made of it in the Lords Journals. The commons, however, ordered that Cromwell should command the horse, during such time as that house should dispense with his attendance; and sent a letter to him for that purpose. And it being very probable that the Armies might be engaged very speedily, it was ordered, by both houses, "That the Assembly of Divines should be desired to set apart the next day, June 11, for seeking God, by prayer, to bless and prosper the parlia-

Information of some Members being concerned in a Plot against the Parliament.] June 11. At this time it was that the commons began to suspect a Plot, wherein some of their own Members were concerned. The first Information of it to the lords was this day, on the oaths of Salwey and Greensmith, read as follows:

"This day, about half an hour after twelve o'clock, Mr. James Cranford, minister, came to the Exchange in London; and did there openly declare and affirm, That there was discovered to the parliament a great treachery in the committee of both kingdoms, some whereof had assumed to themselves a power to be a sub-committee; and had, for about 3 months last past, treated secretly with the king for the procuring and making their own peace, and for the surrendering and delivering up the parliament's forces, castles, and garrisons; and the houses of parliament had chosen a committee of 7 lords and 14 commoners, to search out this treason; and that there were divers amongst them, who were of the former sub-committee, that treated with the king. And Mr. Cranford being asked, Whether this that he reported was certain and true? he affirmed it was, and said, 'Let it fly as far as it will, for it is true.' This we do declare and affirm to be the substance of Mr. Cranford's speech upon the Exchange, to us and divers others. Dr. Ashton, col. Gore, capt. Jenner, and Mr. Ballow, can give further information about this matter. Rd. Salwey, John Greensmith."

The lords ordered this Information to be communicated to the commons; with a desire that a committee of that house might meet with the lords of the committee for the lord Digby's Letter, to consider of it this afternoon; and that Mr. Cranford be sent for to appear before this committee, and likewise the other witnesses to be further examined.

By referring this Information to the committee on lord Digby's Letter, it seems that the lords thought there was some connection between those two businesses; and it appears still plainer, by a Message from the commons, sent up the same day, desiring, That the person of the lord Saville should be secured and his papers sealed up; and that he should be examined before the same committee, behaving reported, That a member of the house of commons, had given intelligence at Oxford. All which the lords ordered accordingly; and that the committee on lord Digby's Letter should be reduced to 2 lords and 4 commoners.

June 13. Some farther intelligence was made to the lords respecting this matter. The lord Roberts reported from the committee of both kingdoms, then sitting at Derby-house,

"That this committee had appointed a sub-committee, who had power to treat for the delivering up any considerable garrison of the enemies; or bringing over any considerable force, and for sending out such as spies, to keep intelligence with the enemy." But the said sub-committee being now dissolved, it was desired, That any of them might give account to the houses of their proceedings therein; also that the houses would use expedition in this business, for avoiding the aspersions which may be cast upon the members of that sub-committee.

Declaration of the Lords Warriston and Say and Scle relative thereto.] Lord Roberts also delivered in a Paper, containing the lord Warriston's Declaration,* relating to the knowledge he had of this business; which was read, in hæc verba:

"All my knowledge concerning the sub-committee is this only, That this sub-committee was made first, and then renewed, without putting any of our members upon it; yea, none of us remarking that such a thing was appointed: that, within two days after the renewing of it, some of the members of the houses, of this committee, called for the Order, and desired some of our members to be added; whereupon, about the 7th of May, my lord chancellor was added, and I, in his lordship's absence: that until the afternoon wherein the report was made to the committee, being the 6th of June, I never was called to that sub-committee: that, the day before the report, my lord Say was pleased to tell me thus much in general, That the business was some overtures for the surrendering of Oxford, and bringing over to the parliament some of the king's horse; and that he would take some time to communicate the particulars to my lord chancellor and me. That, at that meeting, immediately before the report, my lord Say told me, That it was Goring's horse should be brought over; that colonel Legg was the man who should surrender Oxford; and that my lord Saville was the man who did deal with the one and with the other, and who assured him of it; as also that he had revealed to a lady, by decyphering a letter come to him from Oxford, that Hollis was the man that kept weekly correspondence with Digby; but, withal, that he now heard the business would fail; whereupon we all resolved, for preventing jealousies and misrepresentations of the sub-committee, to make our report to the committee, and to desire the vacating of that Order; but to speak nothing of Mr. Hollis, because we conceived there was no sufficient ground to call any man's name in question; and so the report was made. Since the report yesternight, my lord Say was pleased to tell me the rest of the circumstances, which now his lordship reports to the committee, and to shew to me my lord Saville's Letter to my lady Temple: and the lord chancellor of Scotland did further declare, That he did not know there was any such sub-committee appointed, nor any such order or power given to them, neither when it was first appointed, nor when it was again renewed; but that his first knowledge of it was upon the 7th of May; at which time he and myself were added to the sub-committee; but that he was never called to that sub-committee, nor did meet with them, nor know any thing at all of the business, till the sub-committee was vacated; after which time my lord Say was pleased to acquaint him therewith."

This Declaration and the rest of the foregoing Papers, reported from the committee of both kingdoms, were ordered to be communicated to the house of commons.

June 14. This day the lord Say and Sele delivered in to the lords a Declaration, in writing, concerning the business of the sub-committee of both kingdoms; and it was ordered, That the committee for lord Digby's Letter might make use of this Relation as they should see cause.

"When my lord Saville came from Oxford, after he had been examined, and given satisfaction to the lords, and was set at liberty, he came to me and told me, That, upon the breaking of the Treaty at Uxbridge, many were much exasperated against Digby, and other counsellors that they conceived were the cause thereof; and the earl of Newport, before he came from Oxford came to him, and willed him to propose this to those that he thought fit to intrust with it, that col. Goring, being infinitely incensed against the lord Digby and others, for the disgrace put upon his father in France, would come over to the parliament, and bring over those horse he commanded with him, upon condition that he and his father might be well received; they expected not to be employed, but only the favour to enjoy their liberties and estates; and withal, when this was done, col. Legg should deliver up Oxford to the parliament, both being agreed upon between them: he said also, That being come to the parliament, he desired to make it appear that he came with real intentions to serve them to the utmost of his power; and therefore would do his best endeavours to effect the particulars abovesaid; for which they would lay down the way how they might receive security in what they desired; and that being done, the time and manner should presently be agreed upon: besides this, he said He knew there was constant intelligence given to Oxford, every week, of every thing that was done in the houses, or in the committees, by one of the house of commons; and that himself had given part of 3*l*. a week, which was given to one that brought the papers weekly: and he said, That Digby, when he used to reckon up the advantage they had on their side, was used to add this above all the rest, That he had a sure card amongst themselves, that never failed him in any thing of moment; and he would endeavour to do his best to discover these, that he might do the parliament service. These were his overtures to me, to which I answered, That though this were such as, if they might be effected, were likely, at this time, to put an end to all our miseries; yet, how specious soever they were, nothing of this nature was to be meddled withal, without leave from the committee of both kingdoms; and, therefore, if he were confident to do any good in these particulars, and could be an instrument to do the parliament so great service, I would offer these overtures to the committee of both kingdoms; and if they would appoint a sub-committee to treat with any that might be instruments thereof, it might then be proceeded in, otherwise not. He gave me thanks for giving him that advertisement, which, he said, he knew not, and might thereby have run himself into danger.—I did move the committee of both kingdoms in it, and they appointed a sub-committee to treat with any about the delivering up of any considerable garrison'd town into the parliament's hands, or drawing over any considerable forces of the king's to the parliament's side, or discovering any persons who gave intelligence to Oxford. This was entered by Mr. Chiesly, Mr. Frost being otherwise employed, in a paper by itself, which Mr. Chiesley affirmed, when it was called for, he had put into the box where the other papers of entries were; but when it was sought for, it could not be found; wherefore the committee was moved to appoint it to be entered by another Order, which was done according to the former; and, some days after, my lord of Essex called to have the order read, and my lord of Warwick moved that some of the Scots commissioners might be added, which was done. After the first order, my lord Saville sent to the party to let him know that what he desired would be performed, and, upon performance of his part, 10,000*l*. would be given. He received a note from col. Legg, that the lord Newport had not fully instructed him in all particulars concerning that he wrote of, but he would send to him to receive more full directions; and he might assure himself he should find him the man he took him for. This note he shewed to me, for I had told him that it was suspected, while he pretended a treaty upon these particulars, he might thereby take advantage to treat about other propositions with other persons; and I told him it was liable to suspicion. He thereupon protested very deeply, that he treated about nothing but these, nor with any other; and said he would receive the sacrament upon it that it was true; and that he would willingly take the new Oath made for those that came from Oxford, which accordingly he did take; and protested he should receive nothing from Oxford but I should know of it, to prevent that suspicion; for of his messengers, or the times of sending, or of the way of it, I knew nothing. The next that I heard was this, my lady Temple told me there came a man who brought a letter to my lord Saville; she saw him deliver it sealed; he called her into the room, and said he would keep his promise, and receive nothing from Oxford but she should see; and that I should know it. When it was opened it was in cyphers; he began to decypher it, and called her after he had decyphered some, which was compliment; and said, 'here is something.' Then she saw him after, as he decyphered it, produce this, 'Now, my lord, I tell you a secret of all secrets, which you must use only for caution, and reveal to none; Hollis is the man that keepeth constant intelligence and correspondence' (one of these words it was she told me) 'with Digby.' My lady Temple told me she had told the same to Mr. Solicitor, I being out of town: and my lord Saville, when I came back, told me the same; and said, He was sure it came from one who knew the secrets of the king's breast; but would not name the person. I told him, That this was a thing of a very tender nature; for on the one side, if this were a truth, without God did preserve us almost by a miracle, we must needs be ruined, for all our secret councils were discovered; on the other side, if this should be taken for a proof against a man, it would be in their power to ruin any man here at their pleasure; therefore, if this were truth, if he could make it out so as it might have a sufficient proof, it were a great service, considering how destructive it would be if true. He said he would use his best endeavour.—After this, Oxford being besieged, I pressed him to put it to an issue, for I told him, The hanging of it thus long would breed jealousy, it being a fortnight or 3 weeks sometimes before I heard any thing of him; all that I heard I did, from time to time, communicate to Mr. Solicitor and Mr. Crew; and when the Scots commissioners were added, I told my lord Warriston first of the particulars which were the subject of the design, and then I desired to attend my lord Loudoun and him some afternoon, when we might more fully declare to them the persons and particulars together. Having been in the country, after I came home, the siege being raised from Oxford, and conceiving that nothing more would be effected herein, we resolved to desire the committee might be dissolved, and did so; after which I received from my Lady Temple a note, written to her by my lord Saville when I was in the country, wherein he shewed by what means this design was overthrown; and affirmed, That he was assured there was a real intention in it, if it had not unhappily miscarried; and that upon my sending to him that he should desist, he would be sure to send no more messengers. I presently sent him word that the committee was dissolved, and he must not send any into the king's quarters.—This is all the treaty that I ever knew any thing of; and I think the committee of both kingdoms, being appointed by the parliament to manage the war, if such offers of so great advantage to the parliament being made known to any of the committee, he should not have acquainted the committee with it, or they neglected to make use of it so far as to see if they might be effected, neither had done their duty."

was brought up from the commons by sir Robert Harley, to acquaint the lords with three Letters they had received from sir Tho. Fairfax, lieut. gen. Cromwell, and the Commissioners of the Army, giving intelligence of a happy victory it had pleased God to give their forces, two days before, under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax, at Naseby, in the county of Northampton: and, because Almighty God might have the only praise, the house of commons, he said, "desired their lordships concurrence, that Thursday next, the 19th, might be kept a day of public Thanksgiving, at Christ-Church in London. That they had thought of Mr. Marshall and Mr. Vynes, to preach that day before both houses, if the lords would consent to it. They also desired, That these Letters, from the Army, might be printed and published, and some rewards given to the messengers who brought the happy news. That Letters of Thanks be sent to sir Tho. Fairfax and the general officers, and that a jewel of 500*l.* value be presented to the former, as a testimony of their affections to him, and of the esteem they had of his services." The lords agreed to all this, with an addition, That the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London be invited to meet the two houses at Christ-Church on the day appointed; and that Friday, the 27th instant, be likewise set apart for a day of public Thanksgiving in all churches and chapels of this kingdom under the power of the parliament.—Next follow, in the Lords Journals, copies of the 3 Letters beforementioned, and a list of the prisoners taken at the Battle. Two of the prisoners, taken at this Battle, were members of the house of commons; sir Henry Vaughan, a colonel in the king's service, and sir Wm. Portman; who being brought to the bar of that house, the Speaker told them, "That they had falsified that trust their country had intrusted them with, for the good of religion and public liberty; that by the treachery and infidelity of such as them, this unnatural war had happened, and so much of their countrymen's blood had been shed; and, for their unfaithfulness and treasons to their king and country, they were to be committed prisoners to the Tower for high treason; and should be proceeded against according to law."

General Cromwell has leave to continue in the Army 3 months longer.] This day also the commons sent up another Message to the lords to let them know, "That, in regard of the service lieut. general Cromwell was then engaged in, and the 40 days for the continuance of his employment being near expiring, they thought fit to desire their lordships concurrence, That he might be farther continued lieut. general of the army in the present service; and have the established pay of it during the pleasure of both houses." This Message being considered of by the lords, after a debate upon it, the question was put, Whether Mr. Cromwell should be lieut. general as the commons desired, or not? It was carried in the Negative. But to sweeten this Vote to the commons, the lords, at the same time, voted "That Mr. Cromwell should continue lieut. general of the horse, and have his pay according to the established pay of the army for 3 months, from the end of the 40 days, formerly granted him; which the commons agreed to."

There is nothing material now entered in the Journals for several days, except some small advance in the business of the late Plot; wherein we find that the lord Saville, for refusing, on his examination, to name the person who wrote to him concerning Mr. Hollis, was committed close prisoner to the Tower.

A Motion in the House of Lords for Peace.] June 10. This day a motion was made in the house of lords, "That upon the great and good success the parliament's forces had over the king's at Naseby Field and elsewhere, some course might be thought of to put an end to all these distractions, and to settle a firm and well-grounded Peace, by sending Propositions to the king." Upon which, it was resolved to have a conference with the commons about this business, and that the same should be communicated to the Scots commissioners; and a committee of 11 lords was immediately appointed to draw up what was fit to be offered to the commons at the said conference.

Advice from the Earl of Leven, of the Scots Army's Advance Southward.] June 23. The Scots Army being now far advanced into England, the condition of these auxiliary forces will be best understood by the following Letter from their General, which was this day read:

"My lords and gentlemen; I received your Letter, directed to the committee and myself, representing your desires for the speedy advance of this army, and expressing your care to procure from the city of London a month's pay, and also their suit to the committee of the house of commons, that equal care may be had of our army as of their own; all which we cannot but, with thankfulness, acknowledge to be no small matter of encouragement, and to take it as an assurance of the same care for the rest of the months: and we do hereby likewise make known to your lordships, that, in obedience to your desires, we are thus far advanced; being most willing to apply ourselves, with all cheerfulness, to whatsoever undertaking may conduce most to the improving of that late victory, wherewith you were also pleased to acquaint us, in that way which shall be propounded for the happiness of this kingdom and the strengthening of the firm unity of both, than which we have nothing more in our care; and shall embrace all opportunities to evidence our constant affection to this common cause, for the regaining of a blessed Peace and settlement of Religion; but, because your lordships are shortly to receive a more particular account of our ways and intentions by Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Gillespie, I shall forbear to add any thing at present; but remain, Your &c. LEVEN: Mathfield, June 20, 1645."

The E. of Leven marches with the Scots Army towards Worcester.] June 30. Both houses wrote the following Letter to the Scots Army to desire them to march towards Worcester. It was directed to the earl of Leven, as follows:

"My lord; Your letters, sent to the committee of both kingdoms since you came into Nottinghamshire, have been read in both houses of Parliament; wherein they find you are most willing, with all cheerfulness, to undertake whatsoever may conduce most to the improving of the late victory; for which, and your other expressions to employ the army for the best advantage of the common cause, the houses do return unto you their most hearty thanks; and understanding from the committee of both kingdoms, that, by their Letter of the 25th and 27th instant, they desire the speedy advance of your Army into Worcester, the houses do approve thereof, and do also desire your speedy march accordingly; which they conceive most necessary, in regard sir Thomas Fairfax, with his army, is gone far Westward for the relief of Taunton and our forces there, whose necessities were so pressing that we could not stay sir Thomas till you were acquainted; assuring ourselves that you will make the greater expedition, lest the king, who is yet weak, may recruit himself to a considerable army, and, in the mean time, plunder and destroy all the neighbouring counties. The houses do take special care for the month's pay for your army; 13,000*l.* of it is ready, and the rest will be provided in few days, and sent to meet you."

The King's Letters taken at the Battle of Naseby.] June 30. The king's own cabinet having been taken at Naseby Field, wherein were copies of several Letters from him to the queen; the house of commons sought how to make use of them to his majesty's disadvantage and their own service;* and this day sent up the following Resolutions they had come to, in order to make these Letters public; which were all of them agreed to by the lords:—1. "That the most material Letters and Papers, taken at Naseby Field, be communicated to the city at a common hall. 2. That the lords be desired to appoint a committee of their house to join with a committee of a proportionable number of this house, to peruse the Letters and Papers taken at Naseby Field, to consider what letters are most material and most fit to be communicated to the Common Hall, and to make observations upon them, to be communicated with the letters. 3. That the time to be desired for this common hall to meet, shall be on Thursday next. 4. That no person do presume to print any part of the Letters to be communicated at the common hall, without special orders from both houses, and that it be declared that both houses do intend to print them speedily; and this Order to be sent to the warden at Stationers-hall, and published at the common hall. 5. That these Letters and Papers be communicated to the committee of both kingdoms, to the end they may take copies to transmit into Scotland, and to foreign parts as they shall see occasion. 6. That use be made of these Letters and Papers in the Declaration concerning the Treaty, and the Great Declaration to the world. 7. That these Letters and Papers shall be put in a safe and public hand and place, to the end that all such as desire it may peruse the originals of these letters; and that this be published to the city at a common hall. 8. That it be referred to the committee of lords and commons, to be appointed to peruse these Letters and Papers, to appoint a hand and place wherein these letters and papers shall be placed for the public view, and of other circumstances to be observed for the more convenient preserving of them, and putting of them to public view; and that the committee do make report of their proceedings upon the matters referred unto them, before Thursday next."

The discovery and seizure of the King's Letters put a stop to all propositions for Peace; and the Journals of both houses breathe nothing but the voice of war.

The Parliament's Observations on the King's Letters taken at Naseby.] July 3. The earl of Northumberland, from the committee appointed to inspect the King's Letters, reported to the house what Observations had been made on them, in order to their being communicated to the city, at a common hall that afternoon. To this report we have subjoined the passages in the King's Letters to the Queen, on which the animadversions are grounded:

1. "That the king endeavours to overthrow the act of parliament, and his public Declarations of acknowledging this parliament at the Treaty, by an act of council at Oxford, and an entry upon the council-book. 2. That his owning of the parliament was only to draw on the Treaty, by which he hoped for advantage, without any intention to acknowledge it in deed. 3. That the king would never have acknowledged the parliament, if he had had but two men to have stuck to him in denying it; himself being more ready to destroy the parliament, and more violently bent against it, than his very Oxford council. 4. That the kingdoms and parliaments could hardly expect, but with great difficulty, to have assurance to rest upon any thing that the king declares, when his public Declarations are thus undermined by private Acts and Registers."

liament, I shall refer thee to Digby for particular satisfaction; this in general, if there had been but two, besides myself, of my opinion, I had not done it; and the argument that prevailed with me was, That the calling did no way acknowledge them to be a parliament; upon which condition and construction I did it, and no otherwise, and accordingly it is registered in the Council-books, with the council's unanimous approbation; but thou wilt find that it was by misfortune, not neglect, that thou hast been no sooner advertised of it."

5. "That the king endeavours to bring in a foreign prince, of the Romish religion, with an army of strangers, to invade this kingdom, which the king and his party hath solemnly protested never to do. 6. That the king and queen expect assistance in this business, by shipping, from the Prince of Orange, from whom, being a Protestant prince, we had reason to hope better."

(No. 32.) Oxford, March 30, 1645.

"I must again tell thee, that most assuredly France will be the best way for transportation of the duke of Lorraine's army, there being divers fit and safe places of landing for them upon the Western coasts, besides the ports under my obedience, as Selsey near Chichester, and others, of which I will advertise thee when the time comes."

(No. 26.) Oxford, Feb. 19, 1645.

"Dear Heart; I cannot yet send thee any certain word concerning the issue of our Treaty; only the unreasonable stubbornness of the rebels gives daily less and less hopes of any accommodation this way; wherefore I hope no rumours shall hinder thee from hastening all thou mayest, all possible assistance to me, and particularly that of the duke of Lorraine's; concerning which I received, yesterday, good news, from Dr. Goffe, that the Prince of Orange will furnish shipping for his transportation; and that the rest of his negotiation goes hopefully on."

7. "That the embargo of the merchant ships is a special fruit of the queen's negotiation there, who useth means to bring enemies upon us, and to take trade and commerce from us. 8. That the king will make no Peace but such a one as shall invite the queen's return, with

As for trusting the rebels, either by going to London or disbanding my army before a peace, do no ways fear my hazarding so cheaply or foolishly; for I esteem the interest thou hast in me at a far dearer rate, and pretend to have a little more wit (at least by the sympathy that is betwixt us) than to put myself into the reverence of perfidious rebels.'

And in this not only their obedience but their judgments concur.'

9. "That he will be constant to the bishops and his friends, and not admit of Peace without putting a short period to this perpetual parliament."

But, as thou loves me, let none persuade thee to slacken thine assistance for him who is eternally thine. C. R.'

10. "That the king intends to take away all penal laws against the Papists in England, by the arms and assistance of papists, and in their favour. 11. That the same power that may take away these laws, may take away all other laws; and so, by force, subject both religion and liberty to the will and pleasure of the king and Roman Catholics."

(No. 28.) 'Oxford, March 5, 1644.

'It being presumption, and not piety, so to trust to a good cause, as not to use all lawful means to maintain it, I have thought of one means more to furnish thee with for my assistance, than hitherto thou hast had: it is, that I give thee power to promise, in my name, to whom thou thinkest most fit, that I

'will take away all the Penal Laws against the Roman Catholics in England, as soon as God shall make me able to do it; so as by their means, or in their favours, I may have so powerful assistance as may deserve so great a favour, and enable me to do it.'

12. "That they who have deserted their trust in parliament, and given up their lives, fortunes, and consciences to a compliance with the king, will be now despised by the name of a base, mutinous, and mungrel parliament, because they yet retained a little conscience of religion in this parliament."

(No. 29.) 'Oxford, March 13, 1644.

'Dear Heart; what I told thee the last week concerning a good parting with our lords and commons here, was, on Monday last, handsomely performed; and now if I do any thing unhandsome or disadvantageous to myself or friends, in order to a Treaty, it will be meerly my own fault; for I confess, when I wrote last, I was in fear to have been pressed to make some mean overtures to renew the Treaty, knowing that there were great labouring to that purpose: but now I promise thee, if it be renewed, (which I believe will not, without some eminent good success on my side) it shall be to my honour and advantage, I being now as well freed from the place of base and mutinous motions (that is to say, our mungrel parliament here) as of the chief causers, for whom I may justly expect to be chidden by thee, for having suffered thee to be vexed by them.'

General Fairfax's Letter concerning the Rising of the Club-Men in Wiltshire and Dorsetshire.] July 5. A Letter from general Fairfax to the committee of the two kingdoms, was read, giving an Account of a new independent Army, called Club-Men, raised of themselves, but grown at this time to a very considerable force, who seemed to threaten mischief to both or either of the contending parties, as they saw occasion: the rise of them will be best understood by general Fairfax's Letter, viz.

"My lords and gentlemen; My former letters acquainted your lordships with my resolutions to march Westward for the relief of Taunton, in pursuance whereof I am advanced as far as Blandford. I could not hitherto give your lordships an account of the condition of these counties of Wilts and Dorset, in arms under the name of Club-Men; they pretend only the defence of themselves from plunder, but not to side either with the king's forces or the parliament's, but to give free quarter to both. The heads of them are all, so far as I can learn, such as have either been in actual service in the king's army, or those that are known favourers of that party; nay, some having commands at the present with the king. I hear they have drawn up certain Articles, whereunto they have subscribed, for the managing and maintaining this new Party. They have drawn up Petitions, one to the king and the other to the parliament, the copies whereof

* The French Resident in England.

I have herewith sent unto your lordships. The heads of them have had some treaties with the governors of the garrisons, both of king and parliament, that lie nearest to them, and have agreed to pay contribution to both: I hear 50*l.* to Tolson-House, and the like to Langford-House. They have appointed treasurers of their own for the receiving and paying of the same, and the garrisons, in consideration hereof, are not to raise contributions to themselves.—I have sent your lordships one of their Warrants for raising of Money, and paying it to Mr. Hollis of Salisbury, who is one of their heads for that purpose. They give passes to some of their party, whom they call Associates, to pass freely in the country without molestation. They inlist themselves under several officers, and meet daily in great bodies at their rendezvous, and boast they can have 20,000 men at 24 hours warning. For assembling them together, their heads send out to several towns, and by ringing of bells, and sending of posts from one rendezvous to another in the several towns and hundreds, they draw into great bodies; and, for distinction of themselves from other men, they wear white ribbons, to shew, as they say, they are desirous of peace. They meet with drums, flying colours; and, for arms, they have muskets, (some, I hear, have been sent them from Sherborne) fowling pieces, pikes, halberts, great clubs, and such like. They take upon them to interpose between the garrisons on either side; and when any of their forces meet in places where they have sufficient power, as Salisbury and the like, they will not suffer them to fight, but make them drink together, and so make them depart to their several garrisons. They have come into our horse-quarters, and steal horses where they find them at grass, and carry them into the woods. They will obey no warrants, no further than they are compelled, for sending in of provisions for the army, or draughts for the carriages, in these two counties. They are abundantly more affected to the enemy than to the parliament, and publickly declare whatsoever party falls on them they will join with the other; and those of the inhabitants of these counties, who are really affected to the parliament, that do not join with them, are daily threatened by them, and suspect the issue of it will be very mischievous.—I have the enemy before me, towards whom I am advancing with all expedition, and these men, who are very numerous, and acted by men so dangerous, as for the most part their leaders are, I know not what they may attempt; I therefore desire your lordships advice in this business, being uncertain what to do before I hear from you.—I am careful to prevent any just cause of clamour from the country, through any disorders of the army, and hope there will be care taken for the sending money to us, that they may be able to give contentment to the people, by discharging their quarters: but I do not all doubt that, if some speedy course were taken for the quieting or suppressing them, it would be no hard work; but I know not what it may prove in time. I find them generally very confident of their cause and party, and if hereafter they should presume to give laws to the armies, as they do to the garrisons, it may be of evil consequence.—For the present, I shall offer to your lordships the commanding of col. Fiennes's and col. Norton's regiments of horse into these parts; who, with the assistance of col. Ludlow, sheriff of Wilts, and the garrisons in these parts, may be able, at least, to keep them from drawing into any great bodies, to the disturbance of the country.—I desire your lordships speedy answer, and remain, your's, &c. THO. FAIRFAX. Blandford, July 3, 1645."

There was also read a Warrant of the Club-Men, under the hands of Thos. Bennet, Thos. Hollis, Thomas Rose, Wm. Gould, Matthew Mervin, sent to the Tything-men of Ebbesbourne:

"Whereas several Petitions for Peace are intended to be agreed upon by the inhabitants of this county of Wilts, and to be presented, the one to his majesty, and the other to the houses of parliament, it was thought fit by divers gentlemen and others, inhabitants of the division of Sarum, who are already agreed and entered into an association concerning the same, that during such time as the said Petition shall remain unanswered, a speedy course should be taken by way of Treaty between the said gentlemen and inhabitants of the said division, and the commanders of the several garrisons of Langford and Fallersdowne, as well for peace and safety of the inhabitants of the aforesaid division, and others who are charged by way of contribution, or otherwise charged or molested by either of the two garrisons, as also for the necessary subsistence of the said garrisons; upon notice whereof divers gentlemen and inhabitants of the said division did meet, with the commanders of the several garrisons of Sarum, the 13th of this instant June, and there did conclude upon certain Articles, both for the peace and safety of the county, and the subsistence and maintenance of the two garrisons, as may appear under the hands of the gentlemen and inhabitants of the said division and commanders of the said garrisons, together with a confirmation under the hands of the committee then at Fallersdowne, in the behalf of that garrison: therefore you the inhabitants of the parish of Ebbesbourne-Wake, are desired, by the gentlemen whose names are here subscribed, to pay, or cause to be paid, to the sworn constable of the hundred, the sum of 2*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* at or before the 21st instant, being for one whole week last past, whereby the constable may return and pay the same to John Holles of New Sarum, gent. who is deputed by the gentlemen and inhabitants to receive the same; to the intent to discharge the payments promised to the garrisons, and for the same to be accountable, when he shall be thereunto required, and upon account to pay the remainder of his receipts, if any such shall be, unto such as he shall be ordered therein: and you are likewise to return the several names of every person, who stands charged therewith within your tything, together with the particular sum of every such person so taxed, and who they are, in your tything, that refuse or neglect to pay the same. Your friends, &c."

Next the Examination of Christopher Dale, of Salisbury, was read, concerning the Club-Men.

"Christopher Dale, of Salisbury, examined, saith, That, when he was taken yesterday, at Salisbury town-end, by a soldier of this army, upon suspicion of being a spy, he was then returning home to Salisbury from Wincanton, together with some butchers of that town, with whom he went there to have his mare restored unto him, and was then bringing her home to Salisbury. He denieth that he came purposely to view the army, or went out of his way between Wincanton and Salisbury to view the same; but it fortuned that as he was on his journey the army marched cross that way, and he kept on his way through the army, making no stay to observe it. He acknowledged, That heretofore he bore arms for the king, and served as a quarter-master under col. Bampfild of the enemy's party: but saith, That he laid down his arms about three quarters of a year ago, and hath never since served on either side. But he further saith, of late he hath associated himself with those they called Club-Men of Salisbury; that he knoweth no other end of that association but to defend themselves and their goods against all plunderers; but not to oppose either army: That for the town of Salisbury, there are chosen 16 men, viz. 4 out of every parish, to be their leaders, to guide and direct; and Mr. Hollis is chief over all. He conceiveth that about Salisbury there are near 700 Club-Men, which at several times appeared; but he conceiveth that there are more that are associated. That he believes the town is able to furnish these Club-Men with arms, viz. some with pikes and muskets, and others with carbines and pistols; but he thinketh that there is the like Association of Club-Men all over Wilts, and that divers gentlemen, in their several parishes, do appear to conduct; but he can certainly name none but Mr. Justice Bennet, Mr. Gold, Mr. Ashton, and Mr. Edw. Topp. That they have met at several rendezvous; that he was present at one rendezvous at Groveley, where he met the Club-Men of Salisbury, with some other Club-Men of part of that county; and at that time there appeared about 4000, as was generally said and believed: and besides this rendezvous, there were kept other rendezvous for other parts of the county, viz. Warminster, Stonage, White-Parish, and Uphaven; but what number there met at this rendezvous he knoweth not. That at the rendezvous where he met at Groveley, there were certain Articles read and proposed to them, which they all assented to, by giving a shout; but what the effect of those articles were, more than to defend themselves against plunderers, he cannot tell; but it was then said, they were to be sent both to king and parliament to see how they would like them. And, two or three days afterwards, some of the garrisons of Forceley and Langford met at Salisbury with the Club-Men, upon the invitation of the Club-Men, when and where the said Articles were again proposed, as he hath been informed; and thereupon, in the conclusion, it was agreed, that the Club-Men should give 50*l.* a week to each garrison, until the king and parliament had given Answer to their Articles."

Also a copy of the Petition of the Club-Men was read, directed to the King, for Peace, &c.

The Humble APPLICATION of your most loyal and obedient Subjects, the distressed Protestants, inhabiting the Counties of Dorset and Wilts,

"Sheweth, That your suppliants having more deeply than any other parts of this kingdom, tasted the miseries of this unnatural and intestine war, which hath been the more extremely embittered unto them by the pressures of many garrisons both here and in the neighbouring counties, and the opposite armies continually drawn upon them by reason thereof, did lately hope that, by means of the Treaty proposed by your majesty to the honourable houses of parliament at Uxbridge, they might once again have reaped the blessed issue of their long-lost peace, in the happy accommodation of the present differences, without further effusion of Christian blood; but finding themselves utterly fallen from those hopes, and so too justly fearing that the extremity of these calamities, which the continuance of this bloody war is likely to produce, will daily grow more insupportable, unless our unchristian divisions may timely be prevented by some sudden accommodation, they do here first and freely acknowledge, with sorrow and shame, before God and man, That as it was their extreme ingratitude, with the disesteem and abuse of their former peace, which justly bereft them of that inestimable blessing; so it is their manifold unworthiness which yet withholds it from them; and therefore, in submission to the disposition of the Divine clemency, they cease not heartily to pray that God, in good time, would graciously answer the incessant applications of his church with a blessed restoration of her and their peace. And that they be not wanting to themselves in the search and pursuance of those means which may procure such a happy restitution, they likewise cast themselves at your majesty's royal feet, humbly imploring you to lend a gracious ear to a farther Treaty for Peace, if it shall be proffered to your majesty by the two houses of parliament; for proposal whereof your petitioners have made the like address to them, that such a firm Peace may once again be established amongst us, that may prove for the advancement of God's glory, in the maintenance of the true reformed protestant religion; for the safeguard of your majesty's royal person, honour, and estate; for security of the privileges and immunities of the parliament; and for the preservation of the liberties and properties of the subject; all which they conceive to be the four main Articles of that general Protestation to which the body of this kingdom have formerly sworn: and although they dare not presume to intermit themselves into the debate of those two great mysteries of state, concerning the prerogatives inseparable from your majesty's royal person and power, and the just privileges of parliament, both of which are left to their prayers, only for a wished determination and a happy composition of them; yet they find themselves bound in conscience, first, and chiefly, as Christians, to maintain and advance, with the utmost hazard of their lives and fortunes, the true reformed protestant religion; and next, as free-born Englishmen, not degenerate from the virtues of their fathers, by all possible and lawful means to preserve and uphold the native inheritance of their laws, their liberties and properties, which they equally hold in esteem even with life itself.—And the said petitioners do likewise humbly pray, That, in case such a Treaty may be mutually and unfeignedly admitted, your majesty, for your part, would once again be graciously pleased to press the cessation of arms during the said Treaty, that the two houses of parliament may be induced to do the same, that a Treaty for Peace may not proceed in blood; and because your petitioners are no longer able to subsist under the impossible observance of so many contrary commands of so many garrisons and several armies, (who, under pretence of contribution, and by immeasurable taxes, continual free quarter, and incessant plunderings, contrary to your majesty's Proclamation in that behalf, have scarcely left your poor suppliants sufficient for the support of life) they do most humbly beseech your most sacred majesty, that, out of your royal clemency, whereby you were wont to resent the misery of your poor distressed subjects, you would be graciously pleased that the number of your garrisons in these counties may be lessened, in case the two houses of parliament shall, upon your subjects petition to them in that behalf, do the like with the garrisons in their hands; and that all such your garrisons as shall seem necessary to be upheld within these counties for the defence thereof, may be intrusted in the hands of the said counties, to be maintained at the charge of the inhabitants thereof; and not to be delivered up by them to any persons, but such only as, by the joint consent of your majesty and the two houses of parliament, shall be authorized to receive the same. And they most humbly pray, That, during their service in maintaining the garrisons, your majesty would be graciously pleased to free the said inhabitants from all manner of payments, and all other incumbent charges, save only the necessary quarter of your majesty's armies in their

march towards other parts: and because many dissolute persons, taking advantage of these distempered times, and of the abatement of the edge of justice, do, without restraint, commit many heinous offences, to the great dishonour of Almighty God, and a scandal to your royal government established by the laws of this realm, they further humbly pray, That all acts of parliament, unrepealed and yet in force against such offenders, may be presently put into execution by such officers as the same acts enable thereunto, without any disturbance in the execution thereof: and that all such persons as either are or have been in arms, or otherwise assistant to either party in this unhappy war, who, for fear, have absented themselves from the places of their usual abode, or are imprisoned only as favourers of the other party, may be peaceably permitted to return to their wonted homes and habitations, and to the obedience of the established laws.—And your said petitioners humbly desire your gracious majesty to understand, that their frequent meetings have been hitherto, as appears, for no other end, save only for opportunity, jointly, to present their great grievances by this innocent and humble way of petitioning; and to unite themselves as, by the purport of the Protestation and your majesty's Proclamation in their behalf, they humbly conceive they lawfully may do, for the maintenance of their religion, laws, liberties, and properties, against all unlawful violence and plundering whatsoever, until it shall please Almighty God to put an end to these sad distractions.—In the last place, for the prevention of all misunderstandings, and for the fuller expression of their peaceable intentions, in whatsoever may be required of them as touching the premises, they humbly beseech your gracious majesty, that they may have your majesty's warrant for the safe intercourse of those who shall be employed by them in this address to your sacred majesty."

The like Petition to the parliament, from the Club-Men, mutatis mutandis, is entered in the Lords Journals; the consequences of which will shortly appear.

Mr. Cranford fined by the Commons, for aspersing several of their Members.] July 18. The commons, by a committee, had been all this time in examination of the business relating to what Mr. Cranford had declared, concerning the defection of some of their members, (p. 369); and unanimously resolved, "That the said report was false and scandalous: that the words he had spoken against Mr. Crew, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. solicitor St. John, and sir Henry Vane, jun. were also false and scandalous; that he should pay to each of the said gentlemen the sum of 500*l.* as damages, for their reparation; that he should make an acknowledgment for his offence, and express his sorrow for the same, at the bar of the house of commons; and that he should be committed prisoner to the Tower during the pleasure of the house."

July 19. The commons proceeded upon the report concerning lord Saville's Paper, wherein Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitlocke were taxed with treachery, when they acted as the parliament's commissioners at Oxford, and agreed that it should be finally laid aside: but, at the same time, it was ordered, That those gentlemen might prosecute the lord Saville if they thought fit. Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitlocke being extremely particular in their respective narratives of this business, we shall pass it by with a reference to their Memorials.*

Instructions for the English Commissioners appointed to reside with the Scots Army.]

July 28. The Instructions agreed upon by consent of parliament, for Commissioners to be sent to reside in the Scots Army, for the better carrying on of the war, and managing the affairs of that army, were these:

INSTRUCTIONS for _____, and Edward Lord Montagu, sir John Corbett, Bart. Humphrey Sallwey, esq. col. Wm. Purefoy, and Edward Baynton, esq.

"Whereas, by several Treaties agreed between the two kingdoms, divers things are to be performed and done by the joint advice of both kingdoms, or their committees thereunto authorized, which cannot be so well transacted but by those upon the place; you, or any three of you, have therefore hereby full power and authority given you to go to the Scots Army now in England; and to advise, debate, and conclude, with our brethren of Scotland, or such as shall be authorized by them thereunto; and, by joint advice with them, to put in execution all such matters and things concerning the well ordering, directing, and disposal of the forces brought in and employed by them for our assistance, as shall be found requisite and needful, from time to time, for the prosecution of this cause, and the ends expressed in the Covenant.—You shall do your utmost endeavour that the enemy be vigorously prosecuted, and all advantages taken, for the speedy ending of this war.—You are to do your utmost endeavours for the continuing a good correspondency between the two kingdoms, and their forces.—You are to acquaint them with the great straits we are in for want of money; and that whatsoever failing of payments, according to the Treaty, have been from hence, have not proceeded from any want of affection, or intention to make good our engagements.—You are to acquaint them, That a weekly assessment is made for the maintenance of their army; and that care is taken for the speedy payment thereof.—That there may be no want of provisions, and other necessities, for the army, you are hereby authorized to send warrants, under the hands of you, or any three of you, to the counties of Hereford, Monmouth, Worcester, Glamorgan, or any other counties where the Scots armies shall march, or adjacent counties, as you shall think fit, for the furnishing provisions, and other necessities, for that army.—And you are to call to your assistance, and to name and authorize, such gentlemen and others in the aforesaid counties, and such other counties where that army shall march, as you shall think fit, to be such committees for the better putting of this Instruction in due execution: and the committees in the said several counties are hereby required to be, from time to time, aiding and assisting to you herein.—You are to endeavour, That all provisions, or other necessities, provided by your care, be so ordered, that account may be made what is taken; and that the said provisions may be discounted upon the pay of the said army.—You are hereby likewise authorized, as you may see cause, to help the Scots army with recruits of such horses, upon account, as shall be lost in the service.—You are to take care that no protection be granted to any delinquent, contrary to the Ordinance of parliament. You are further to take care that the several Ordinances be put in due execution against all delinquents, notwithstanding any protection whatsoever. You are to acquaint both houses with your proceedings from time to time; and to observe these Instructions, and such further directions as you shall receive from both houses of parliament."

Instructions for the Commissioners appointed to go to the Parliament of Scotland.] The houses had been also a long time in framing Instructions for a Committee to go into Scotland, to regulate such matters with the Parliament there, as were then necessary to be done. All which are contained in the following Articles:

I. "You shall forthwith repair into the kingdom of Scotland; and you shall make your addresses to the parliament there, or any deputed by them as shall have power and authority to treat with you, upon such matters as you have received, or shall receive, in charge; and to negotiate in that kingdom as committees or commissioners of and from the parliament of England: and, having performed the things wherewith you are intrusted, you are to return and repair to the parliament of England, to render an account of your employment. II. You are to let them know the two houses good acceptance of that brotherly assistance they have received from that kingdom; and return them thanks. III. You are to let them know, That a good and mutual correspondency between the two kingdoms, united in this great cause by Solemn League and Covenant, is very earnestly desired by both houses: and you are, to that purpose, to use your best endeavours for the continuing thereof; and to give the best satisfaction you can, in all things that may seem to have given any occasion of difference; and to desire the like from them: IV. To acquaint them with the great straits we are in for want of money; and that whatsoever payments from hence have not been made, in pursuance of the Treaty, it hath not proceeded from any want of affection, or want of intention to make good our engagements. V. You shall propose, That the works about Carlisle may be slighted, and the place dismantled; and that the Scots garrison, now in Carlisle, put in there without the consent of the parliament of England, be forthwith removed, in pursuance of the large Treaty of both kingdoms. VI. You shall demand that the several garrisons in Warkworth Castle, Tinmouth Castle, Newcastle upon Tyne, Hartlepoole, Stockton Castle, and Thirlewall Castle, may be removed; being placed there without the consent of both houses of the parliament of England, or their committees. VII. You shall insist upon it, That all protections already given to the persons, goods, or estates, of any delinquents, without the consent of the parliament of England, or their commissioners, be limited to their just intentions; which is, only for restraining of the soldiers from all acts of violence against the persons so protected; and not extended to the prejudice of any Ordinance of parliament, or Order of both or either house of parliament: and that no protections be granted, or capitulations made, without the consent of the parliament of England, or their committees: and that, if any protections have or shall be granted or made otherwise, they shall be held void and null. VIII. That a Commission be granted under the Great Seal, as in 1641, for the taking and adjusting the accompts of Yorkshire, of the city and county of the city of York, Northumberland, the borough of Berwick upon Tweed, Cumberland, Westmoreland, the county of Durham, and county of Newcastle, between the Scots Army and the said several counties, arising either by assessments, free-quarter, billeting, or any other way. You shall offer to the parliament of Scotland, or their committees, that they may send some commissioners, if they please, to be present at the adjusting of the accompts in the several counties above-mentioned. IX. You shall take care that all the Articles of the several Treaties between the two kingdoms be observed and kept. X. You shall represent to the parliament of Scotland, or their committees or commissioners in that behalf, all oppressions, wrongs, and injuries, offered contrary to the said Articles; and desire such remedy as to justice shall appertain."

The Scots Commissioners desire that Propositions of Peace may be sent to the King.]

July 29. The earl of Northumberland presented a Paper from the Scots Commissioners residing in London, bearing date the day before: viz.

"Having now seen and perused the divers Letters and Papers, of great importance, mentioned in the Answer of the honourable houses of parliament to our Paper of the 20th of June, which may give light to the future proceedings of both kingdoms; having also observed the good success of the parliament's forces since that time, whereby the king and his armies are brought to a much lower condition, which, in Divine Providence, may be a further preparation to a happy Peace; and having also reason, from what we have learned in time past, to apprehend that men will not be at rest, but still be dealing under-hand, and tampering for a Peace of their own making, and for their own private ends, to the great prejudice of the public, and the further alienating of the king's heart from a safe and well-grounded Peace, and the delaying of the intentions of both kingdoms; we do, in all earnestness, desire, upon the grounds and considerations presented in our former Paper, to know the minds and resolutions of both houses in a matter of so great consequence, as is the renewing the desires and propositions of Peace, in such manner as shall be thought fit, that we may make the same known to the parliament of Scotland, now sitting, which may expect no less from our trust and diligence." By command of the commissioners for the parliament of Scotland. John Chiesley."

Aug. 11. A conference was held between the two houses, on the subject of the above Paper; the report of which made to the lords was, That the commons had taken it into consideration, and had resolved, that the good condition the parliament were now in, should not make them further off from desiring a safe and well-grounded Peace. But because there had been such ill success in the manner of the late Treaties, they had made certain Votes to which they desired their lordships concurrence: "1. That in such Propositions as should be next sent to his majesty, for a safe and well-grounded Peace, a positive answer shall be desired from himself, without any Treaty. 2. That Propositions shall be sent to his majesty for a safe and well-grounded peace. 3. That such desires as shall now be made to his majesty for Peace, on behalf of England or Ireland, shall be presented in bills to him. 4. That these Votes may be communicated to the Scots commissioners, and be treated on by the committee of both kingdoms." To all which the lords consented.

Aug 12. Oliver Cromwell, by an Ordinance of parliament, was continued general of the horse for 4 months longer.

Aug. 19. The lords, on a petition of the lord Saville and lord Powys, prisoners in the Tower, representing their miserable estate, being deprived of all they were worth, and nothing left either to pay their keeper's fees, or pay for their diet; the lords ordered that 7*l.* a week should be allowed each of them, out of their own sequestered estates, for their present maintenance.

The Club-Men declared Traitors.] Aug. 23. A Declaration was passed against the people called Club-Men, That all persons whatsoever, who shall associate or assemble themselves together in arms, in any parts of the kingdom, without authority of the parliament, are hereby declared traitors to the commonwealth, and to be proceeded against accordingly.

The E. of Montrose's Victory in Scotland on behalf of the King.] Aug. 26. Several letters from the North were read; one from the lord Wharton, giving some account of the great victory the earl of Montrose had gained over the Scots Covenanters, near Glasgow, in Scotland. Also, that the plague being at Edinburgh, the parliament there had agreed to send commissioners to treat with the English at Berwick. By these letters, Montrose's victory is said to be compleat, and that he was perfect master of the field in Scotland.

A Memorialist of these times,* whom we have not before quoted, tells us from his own knowledge, "That it was this time debated, whether the king should march with his army into Scotland; which had been done, but two things prevented it: 1st, The plague was broke out there, and multitudes died of it; which made the king backward, and the men more backward. 2ndly, the marquis of Montrose having routed a whole brigade of Lesley's best horse, and carried all before him, wrote to his majesty, that he did not now want assistance; but was in hopes, in a few days, to send a body of foot into England to his majesty's assistance. This over-confidence of his was his ruin; for, on the contrary, had he earnestly pressed the king to have marched, and fallen in with his horse, the king had done it, and been absolutely master of Scotland in a fortnight's time; but Montrose was too confident, and defied them all, till at last they got their forces together, and Lesley, with his forces out of England, worsted him in two or three encounters, and then never left him till they drove him out of Scotland."

Sept. 15. The lords, after many delays, resumed the consideration of the Ordinance for the Sale of Delinquents Estates; and, after long debate, in a committee of the whole house, the lord Say and Sele reported, That the sense of that committee was, That a new Ordinance should be drawn up for the sale of the lands and revenues belonging to archbishops, bishops, deans, deans and chapters, to be employed for the same ends and uses, mentioned in the Ordinance for the sale of delinquents estates; with an exception of all impropriations and tythes, belonging to them, as were fit to be employed for the increase and maintenance of the ministry. And, in this, such delinquents estates should be added, as that house should think fit. A committee of 7 lords was immediately ordered for that purpose.

Bristol taken by General Fairfax.] Sept. 19. A Letter was received from general Fairfax, with an account of his taking Bristol, and a long narrative of the proceedings therein.

A member of the house of peers having now lain a long time under confinement, for a charge of High Treason from the commons, the lords, this day, remonstrated to them, by message, "That they could not, in justice, detain him any longer from his seat in parliament, (being committed July 13, 1644) and therefore should restore him to it on the 27th instant, unless they do receive further cause from the commons to the contrary." To which the commons answered, "That in regard a member of their house was out of town, who had all the Papers relating to lord Hunsdon's affair, they desired a fortnight's more time than their lordships had appointed." Agreed to.

* Memoirs of a Cavalier; generally supposed to be written by commissary-general Wilmot, afterwards lord Wilmot.

A Letter from sir T. Fairfax, enclosing one to him from the Prince of Wales, for Peace.] Sept. 26. A very extraordinary Letter, sent from sir Tho. Fairfax to the commissioners of both kingdoms, was read to the lords, with one inclosed in it from the Prince of Wales; viz.

For the COMMITTEE of both Kingdoms at Derby-House.

"My lords and gentlemen; His highness the Prince of Wales having sent me, by his trumpet, this inclosed Letter, which doth express what he desires from both houses of parliament, I thought it my duty, by your lordships means, to acquaint them with it, and not to hinder the hopeful blossom of your young peace-maker; (if I may be so bold here to term him so) which may prove a flower in his title more glorious and sweet to us than the rest of his ancestors, if it please the Lord to create Peace by him. I shall desire to know your lordships further pleasure in this, which shall be observed by Your lordships humble Servant, THO. FAIRFAX. Bath, Sept. 20, 1645."

The Prince's Letter was as follows:

"For sir Thomas Fairfax:

"We have so deep a sense of the present miseries and calamities of this kingdom, that there is nothing we more earnestly pray for to Almighty God, than that he would be pleased to restore unto it a happy Peace, and we should think it a great blessing of God upon us, if we might be so happy as to be an instrument in the advancing of it: and therefore we have resolved to send two of our Council unto the king, our father, with some such overtures as we are hopeful may conduce thereunto; and do hereby desire you to send, or procure from the lords and commons assembled in parliament at Westminster, a Safe-Conduct for the lord Hopton, and the lord Colepeper, with 12 servants, to go to our royal father, and to return to us; and we should then manifest to the world our most earnest desires to stop this issue of blood, which must otherwise in a little time, render this unhappy land yet more miserable. Given at our Court at Exeter this 15th day of Sept. 1645. CHARLES P."

Hereupon it was ordered, That the Prince's Letter and that of sir Thomas Fairfax be recommended to the committee of both kingdoms, and communicated to the Scots commissioners; and that the said committee take the said Letters into present consideration, and return their sense to both houses respectively with all convenient speed; and that the concurrence of the commons be desired. These Letters were sent down to that house accordingly.

Sept. 27. For the taking of Bristol, and the advantages gained over the king, whose armies and garrisons were now almost entirely broken and subdued in all quarters, the houses made an Order for a public Thanksgiving.

The Lord Saville, who had been bailed, recommended.] Oct. 1. The house of lords having admitted the lord Saville to bail, and he being thereupon set at liberty, the commons, at a conference, represented this to the lords as wronging their justice, for these Reasons: "That the lord Saville having taxed Mr. Hollis with keeping correspondence with the lord Digby, and revealing their secrets to the enemy; a crime no less than high treason, if true: and grounding all this upon a Letter; which, not proving, he was liable, as making himself thereby the author of the report, to be punished as a false accuser: That the lord Saville's having prevailed before the committee, and refused to declare from whom he received that Letter, was a high contempt of their house; and therefore it was against all law and reason, that a person committed for a contempt of a court, should be bailed by that court whilst he continues in that contempt. Besides, the commons urged that they had other matters against him; as his holding correspondence with the enemy, and his sending them notice what was doing in the houses and in the army, &c. For all which the commons desired that the lords would remand the lord Saville back to the Tower, there to remain close prisoner as he was before, till he conform to the Order of both houses;" which was done accordingly.

This day a Remonstrance from the Scots Commissioners to the Parliament was read, complaining of Want of Pay for their Army, and other inconveniences they met with. A similar Remonstrance was also received on the 9th instant; but the houses seemed to take little notice of these Memorials, by their giving no Answer to them all this time.

A Letter from the Earl of Lincoln, concerning his not taking the Covenant.] Oct. 11. A remarkable Letter from the earl of Lincoln is entered in the Lords Journals this day, relating to his having omitted to take the Solemn League and Covenant; which, with the Resolutions of the lords thereupon, run thus:

To the Right Hon. the lord GREY of Warke, or any other who is Speaker pro tempore of the House of LORDS, to be communicated to their lordships:

"My lord; Upon resolves in the house of lords, the 10th of August 1644, now 14 months since, That no member or assistant of that house not having taken the National Covenant, shall sit in the house after the 17th of the same month, before the taking thereof; finding myself debarred of the undoubted right of a peer to sit in parliament, the most antient and greatest honour, as I conceive, belonging to the peerage, I have in this length of time, according to the best of my judgment, weighed with myself the cause of my sequestration; and being deprived of this my undoubted privilege, without any charge against me personally made, nor any judgment upon me given, which should render me unworthy and incapable to enjoy my privilege; (in which case and proceeding I never doubted the power of either house over their members,) I humbly offer to their lordships, Whether, for a bare omission, or deferring upon a scruple of conscience, wherein I yet remain unsatisfied, to do that which is not imposed by any act or ordinance of parliament, with any penalty, upon the meanest subject, that myself should be debarred of the highest and most undoubted privilege of a peer? This I hold it my duty to intimate to their lordships for the present, and for posterity, that that Vote may be, as many others have been, taken into their further honourable considerations, and myself freed from the restraint of enjoying my privilege, which I have, with your lordships, by Ordinance of this parliament, protested to maintain. My lord, I do, in this, not look merely upon mine own interest, but upon the high and general concernment; and rest Your lordship's most humble Servant, T. LINCOLNE. Berkshire-House, Oct. 10, 1645."

This Letter the lords ordered to be taken into consideration on the 13th instant; when a Message from the house of commons, Aug. 10, 1644, and a Vote of this house upon it were read, concerning the peers taking the Covenant; and, after debate, it was resolved, "That the said Vote, now read, should be repealed." Thereupon, the earl of Lincoln was called in to take his place in that house as a peer.

An Ordinance was this day agreed to for borrowing 40,000*l.* at the rate of 8*l.* per cent. interest, to be raised by voluntary Subscriptions, or by Assessments, &c.

A Complaint from the Committee at York, against the Scots Army.] Oct. 15. The lord Roberts reported a conference with the commons, wherein two Letters from the North were exhibited, and several Resolutions of that house thereupon. These letters were addressed to their Speaker, Wm. Lenthall, esq.; and first that from the Committee of the house of commons then residing at York: viz.

"Sir; To appease a dangerous mutiny, at the time when the king, with his forces, advanced into this county, and sent out Proclamations that all from 16 to 60 should come unto him for guarding of his person to this city; and for the encouraging our horse, both officers and private men, we promised them a month's pay, which was the least of their demands. We have with much labour, and by engagement of our particular credits, advanced a fortnight's pay unto the troopers; but it is impossible for us to pay the rest unto them out of these parts, which are so impoverished; and the whole North-Riding is now not only taken up in quarters, but also exceedingly assessed in money, by the Scots; so that we cannot raise sufficient for the growing pay of the foot. The horse do again begin to make high and peremptory demands of their fortnight's pay in arrear; which, if not speedily paid, will occasion as high, if not an higher, mutiny than the former. We hear from London, that the 10,000*l.* is already taken up by the horse officers, and for discharge of other debts and engagements; so that there is no other way left for keeping our horse together upon service, than a present Order to be given by the parliament for advancing that sum, which will amount unto 3000*l.* or thereabouts. We earnestly intreat you to acquaint the house therewith, on whose favour we rely, hoping a speedy course will be directed by them for making supply hereof, otherwise we cannot be able long to do them service in these parts. We remain, &c. York, Oct. 4, 1645."

The other Letter was from the Commissioners of Assessment in the several Ridings of Yorkshire:

"Sir; It hath often been represented from this county, that the intolerable burdens of armies, English and Scots, have reduced great numbers of families to the extremities of poverty; for the redress whereof earnest request hath been made from the commissioners, in behalf of the inhabitants of the country; who, having lately received some relaxation of their sufferings, by the removal of the Scots army Southwards, and the reducing sundry of the enemy's garrisons, were settling themselves to some industry to support themselves withal; wherein they were not a little encouraged by the Ordinance of Parliament, appointing the charge of the Scots Army to be indifferently supported by a general assessment laid upon the kingdom, whereof they were only to bear a proportionable share: but now, as soon as their harvest is reaped, and provisions made by every family for their proper subsistence for the year following, the Scots Army is unexpectedly returned into these parts again: and albeit we, the Commissioners of the several Ridings, have made known unto them, that we neither have authority to impose any such burden upon the country, and, if we had such power, yet that we know the country unable to bear them, without the universal ruin of the inhabitants; nevertheless the commanders of the said army have, of themselves, taken up quarters in the North-Riding, and spread their charge, and send out their warrants in other parts of the county, requiring from the people such vast sums of money and proportion of provisions, as have not been heard of in other parts of this kingdom; which nevertheless they force the people to bring in to them.—These impositions, thus laid by them upon the country, as we understand by daily complaints brought to us from several places, are, in most parts of the country, after the rate of 144,468*l.* per mensem, being distributed in the same measure through the whole country, and in some other parts not so much; but in no place, that we have yet heard of, less than after the rate of 45,000*l.* per mensem; and all this taken under pretence of order from their superior officers, besides the infinite oppressions and extortions of the soldiers, who take away the subjects horses, goods and money, without any public order, which we conceive may equal the proportion of their certain assessments.—These insupportable burdens must of necessity produce an universal poverty and desolation of the country, and so prepare the dispositions of the people to desperate associations and resolutions, to rise in opposition; which, how destructive it may prove to the present union of the two nations, we leave to your consideration. And we may not omit herewith to represent unto you, as a matter conducing to the same end, that the ways to raise money in this country, for the pay of our own army, being wholly obstructed by those levies of the Scots, that take up the whole substance of the country, it will be impossible to restrain our own soldiers, who were mutinous before; but that now their distempers will be much increased, and being united to an oppressed people, may give a more speedy vent to the heart-burnings and discontents contracted by these sufferings, which visibly tend to the utter confusion of this country.—Sir, whatsoever our succeeding miseries may be, yet we conceive we have now fully discharged our duties in making this Remonstrance of our sufferings to that honourable house, which is the only place, under Heaven, from whence we can hope for relief; and our request is, in order to the prevention of these imminent dangers, that the Scots army may be immediately removed from these parts, and some course taken for reparation of the country's sufferings by the other parts of the kingdom liable to the burden of that army; which we humbly desire may be immediately presented by you to the house from your, &c. York, Oct. 3, 1645."

Votes of the House of Commons in Consequence thereof.] The lord Roberts farther reported, That Mr. Tate, one of the managers at the conference, said, That at the same time the foregoing Letters were read in the house of commons, they had also received from their lordships two Papers, which had been delivered in by the Scots Commissioners, one dated the 29th Sept. last, and the other the 9th instant, upon all which they had passed these Votes:

1. "That this house doth declare, That as they are bound by the Covenant and Treaties to maintain the union and good correspondence between the two kingdoms, so it is their Resolution to employ and continue their utmost endeavours to maintain the same accordingly.
2. That the Scots Army's not engaging against the enemy, according to the desires of both houses, and their continuance in the Northern parts, contrary to those desires, is not only unserviceable, but prejudicial to those ends for which their assistance was desired, and destructive to those parts of the kingdom.

That their laying of taxes, and raising of money upon the subjects of this kingdom, and plundering their houses and goods, is against the Treaty, and against the liberty of the subject, which both kingdoms are bound to preserve; and doth disable the kingdom from paying the monthly Assessments for the maintenance of that army and the forces of the Northern Association. 4. That it be declared to the inhabitants of the Northern Association, That they are not bound to pay any such monies as are or shall be taxed upon them, without the power or authority of both houses; by the Scots officers, or any other person. 5. That whatsoever goods, monies, horses, or provisions have been, or shall be, taken from any the inhabitants of the Northern Association, or of any other parts of this kingdom, without the power and authority of both houses of parliament, by any of the Scots Army, shall be repaid unto them out of the monies designed for the maintenance of that army. 6. That such commissions shall be issued under the great seal, into every county of this kingdom where they shall be desired, for the certifying what money, billet, horses, cattle, goods or provisions, have been levied or taken by any of the Scots Army; with like powers and authorities as are contained in the commissions already issued, in that behalf, into divers of the Northern counties. 7. That whatsoever money, horses, goods, or provisions have been, or shall be, levied or taken by the Scots Army, upon the inhabitants or subjects of the kingdom, shall be accounted as so much of the pay of the Scots Army; and that this kingdom is disengaged from the payment of so much as the same, upon proof, shall amount unto. 8. That in case the pressures of the Scots Army upon the subjects of this kingdom be continued, and unless satisfaction shall be given touching those pressures, it cannot be expected that this kingdom shall make payment of 31,000*l.* per month to the said army. 9. That it be desired that satisfaction should be given to this kingdom, that such forces of the Scots nation as have been put into the several garrisons of Newcastle upon Tyne, the city of Carlisle, and town of Hartlepoole, the castles of Tinmouth, Warkworth, Thirlewall, and Stockton, without the consent of both houses, may be forthwith removed; to the end they may be disposed of in such manner as shall be thought fit by both houses of the parliament of England. 10. That the Letters from the Committees of York, of the 3rd and 4th of this instant Oct. with the Votes thereupon, be communicated to the lords at a conference. 11. That the Votes formerly passed the house, for removing the obstructions that happen in bringing in the Assessments for the Scots Army, and for the providing of 30,000*l.* for that army upon their coming to Newark, be communicated to the lords at this conference."

The lord Roberts added, That, at the said conference, Mr. Long reported from the city, That they would endeavour, and were in good hopes to effect, the providing of 30,000*l.* for the Scots Army, in case they should be before Newark by the 1st Nov. otherwise not; and he further read these Votes following, made by the commons: 1. "That the Scots Answer, touching the marching their Army to besiege Newark, is not satisfactory. 2. That the Scots commissioners be desired to give a positive and speedy answer, touching their army's marching to besiege Newark. 3. That some gentlemen be sent into the city of London to borrow 30,000*l.* towards paying off the Scots Army; and that the Assessments, due and payable out of the several counties for that army, shall be the security for payment of the said money, together with interest for the forbearance thereof. 4. That 200 barrels of powder, with bullets proportionable, and a double proportion of match, be forthwith provided and furnished for the Scots Army, in case they shall be before Newark by the 1st of November."

The lords put off the consideration of all these Letters and Resolutions of the commons for two days, and ordered all their members to be summoned against that time. On the 18th, every one of the aforesaid Resolutions were severally read, and unanimously agreed to.

General Pointz's Victory near Sherburne.] Oct. 20. Letters from general Pointz were read, bringing an account of another great Victory gained by him against the king's forces near Sherburne, in Yorkshire. For this another day of thanksgiving was appointed.

Tiverton taken by General Fairfax.] Oct. 23. A Letter was received from sir Thomas Fairfax, giving an account of the taking of Tiverton. Hereupon the lords ordered, That a Letter be written by their Speaker to sir Tho. Fairfax, to give him thanks, in the name of that house, for his great care and pains in the conduct of the army.

Oct. 28. A Thanksgiving was ordered by both houses for the reducing of the counties of Pembroke, Caermarthen, and Cardigan, to the obedience of the parliament, by which his majesty lost almost all his interest in those parts.

Intercepted Letters from the King to the Marquis of Ormond, &c.] Oct 30. In order to shew to what a distressed condition the King's affairs were now reduced, we here subjoin a series of Letters, which were taken in the late fight at Sherburne. They were delivered to the lords at a conference, and this day read in their house.

The King's Letter, under his own hand, to the lord marquis of Ormond. Caerdiff, July 31, 1645.

"Ormond; It hath pleased God, by many successive misfortunes, to reduce my affairs of late from a very prosperous condition to so low an ebb, as to be a perfect trial of all men's integrity to me; and you being a person whom I consider as most intirely and generously resolved to stand and fall with your king, I do principally rely upon you for your utmost assistance in my present hazards. I have commanded Digby to acquaint you at large with all particulars of my condition, what I have to hope, trust to, or fear; wherein you will find, that if my expectation of relief out of Ireland be not in some good measure, and speedily answered, I am likely to be reduced to great extremities. I hope some of those expresses, which I sent you since my misfortune by the Battle of Naseby, are come to you; and I am therefore confident that you are in a good forwardness for the sending over to me a considerable supply of men, artillery, and ammunition. All that I have to add is, That the necessity of your speedily performing them is made much more pressing by new disasters; so that I absolutely command you, what hazard soever that kingdom may run by it, personally to bring me all the forces of what sort soever you can draw from thence, and leave the government there during your absence in the fittest hands that you shall judge to discharge it; for I may not want you here to command these forces which will be brought from thence, and such as from hence shall be joined to them: but you must not understand this as a permission to you to grant to the Irish, in case they will not otherwise have a Peace, any thing more in matter of religion than what I have allowed you already; except only in some convenient parishes, where the much greater number are papists, I give you power to permit them to have some places which they may use as chapels for their devotions, if there be no other impediment for obtaining a Peace; but I will rather chuse to suffer all extremities, than ever to abandon my religion, and particularly either to English or Irish rebels; to which effect I have commanded Digby to write to the agents that were employed hither, giving you power to cause to deliver, or suppress, the letter as you shall find best for my service. To conclude: If the Irish shall so unworthily take advantage of my weak condition, as to press me to that which I cannot grant with a safe conscience, and without it to reject a Peace, I command you, if you can, to procure a further cessation; if not, to make such divisions as you can amongst them; and rather leave it to the chance of war between them and those forces which you cannot draw from thence to my assistance, than to give my consent to any such allowance of Popery, as must evidently bring destruction to that profession, which, by the grace of God, I shall ever maintain through all extremities. I know, Ormond, that I impose a very hard task upon you; but if God prosper me, you will be an happy and glorious subject; if otherwise, you will perish nobly and generously, with and for him who is your assured friend, C. R."

The King's Letter to Prince Rupert; Caerdiff, July 31, 1645.

"Nephew; This is occasioned by a letter of yours that the duke of Richmond shewed me yesternight; and, first, I assure you, that I have been, and ever will be, very careful to advertise you of my resolutions so soon as they were taken; and if I enjoined you silence to that which was no secret, it was not my fault, for I thought it one; and I am sure it ought to have been so. Now, as for your opinion of my business, and your counsel thereupon, if I had any other quarrel but the defence of my religion, crown, and friends, you had full reason for your advice; for I confess that, speaking either as a mere soldier or statesman, I must say that there is no probability but of my ruin; yet, as a Christian, I must tell you that God will not suffer rebels and traitors to prosper, nor his cause to be overthrown; and whatsoever personal punishment it shall please him to inflict upon me must not make me repine, much less give over this quarrel. And there is as little question that a composition with them, at this time, is nothing else but a submission; which, by the grace of God, I am resolved against, whatsoever it cost me; for I know my obligations to be, both in conscience and honour, neither to abandon God's cause, injure my successors, nor forsake my friends. Indeed, I cannot flatter myself with expectation of good success, more than this, to end my days with honour and a good conscience; which obliges me to continue my endeavours, as not despairing but that God may yet, in due time, avenge his own cause; though I must avow to all my friends, that he who will stay with me at this time, must expect and resolve either to die for a good cause, or, which is worse, to live as miserable in maintaining it as the violent rage of insulting rebels can make him.—Having thus truly, and I believe impartially, stated my case unto you and plainly told you my positive resolutions, which, by the grace of God, I will not alter, they being neither lightly nor suddenly grounded, I earnestly desire you no ways to hanker after Treaties; assuring you, as low as I am, I will do no more than was offered in my name at Uxbridge; confessing, that it were as great a miracle that they should agree to so much reason, as that I should be, within a month, in the same condition as I was immediately before the Battle of Naseby. Therefore, for God's sake, let us not flatter ourselves with these conceits; and believe me, the very imagination that you are desirous of a Treaty, (for that, at this time, and a submission is all one) will but lose me so much the sooner. Wherefore, as you love me, (whatsoever you have already done) apply your discourse hereafter according to my resolution and judgment.—As for the Irish; I assure you they shall not cheat me, but it is possible they may cozen themselves; for be assured, that what I have refused to the English, I will not grant to the Irish rebels; never trusting to that kind of people, of what nation soever, more than I see by their actions; and I am sending such a dispatch to Ormond, as I am sure, will please you and all honest men; a copy whereof, by the next opportunity, you shall have. Lastly, be confident that I would not have put you nor myself to the trouble of this long letter, had I not a great estimation of you, and a full confidence of your friendship to C. R."

The King's Letter, in his own hand, to the Marquis of Ormond, to hasten a Peace in Ireland.

"Ormond; I find by yours to Digby, that you are somewhat cautious not to conclude the Peace, without, at least, the concurrence of the council there; which, if you could procure, I confess it would be so much the better; and therefore I have sent herewithal another letter to you, to be communicated to them which takes off those restrictions which I laid formerly upon you in a public letter; but the Irish Peace is of such absolute necessity, that no compliments or particular respect whatsoever must hinder it; wherefore I absolutely command you, without reply, to execute the direction I sent you the 27th of Feb. last, giving you leave to get the approbation of the council, so as, and no otherwise, that by seeking it, you do not hazard the Peace, or so much as an affront, by their foolish refusing to concur with you; promising you, upon the word of a king, that if God prospers me, you shall be so far from receiving any prejudice by doing this so necessary a work, though alone, that I will account it as one of the chiefest of your greatest services to me; and accordingly you shall be thought upon by your assured friend, C. R."

The Lords Journals add, That there were divers other Letters communicated at the conference, but the foregoing were the principal.

Prince Rupert's Letter to the Parliament for a Pass to leave the Kingdom.] Nov. 1. The first occurrence of this month worth our notice, is a Letter to the parliament from prince Rupert, whom the king had stripped of all his commissions about six weeks before, on account of his surrendering Bristol to general Fairfax:

"My lords and gentlemen; Having determined with my brother prince Maurice, my lord Hawley, lord Gerrard, sir Rd. Willis, and many officers and gentlemen of quality, to leave this kingdom, being altogether disengaged from that service we have been in; it hath given me the occasion to desire this favour from you, that you would grant a Pass for me, my brother Maurice, and those noblemen and gentlemen that come along with me, together with their servants, horses, and all necessaries, to go beyond the seas, or to retire to their houses, as shall be most for their convenience;* and I engage my honour, for myself and them, that no act of hostility shall be done by us; and that there is no other design in our going, than to go whither our particular occasions and desires shall lead us. I have therefore addressed unto you this gentleman, lieutenant colonel Osborne, who can assure you that my intentions are no other than what I have here professed; and, by him, I shall expect the return of my desires, wherein you will oblige, your friend and servant, RUPERT. Wiverton, Oct. 29, 1645."

This request being taken into consideration the same day, both houses agreed to grant a Pass as desired, upon the conditions expressed in the Letter. But at the same time, a committee of lords and commons were appointed to consider of the manner of this Pass, and report the same to the houses.—A day or two after the committee brought in a form of a Pass, which was read and approved of, along with the Instructions for those that should take the engagement required; which was, never more to bear arms, or act any thing against both houses of the parliament of England, or against the estates of the parliament of Scotland, or against any of their forces in any of the king's dominions.

Nov. 11. The lord Wharton and the rest of the English Commissioners being returned out of Scotland, this day his lordship delivered in to the house an Account of their Negotiation. After this Report, the Speaker was ordered to give the lord Wharton thanks from the house, for his pains in this business; which was done accordingly.

Letter from Mr. Strickland, the Parliament's Agent at the Hague.] Nov. 23. This day was read, in the house of Lords, a Letter, from Walter Strickland, esq. the Parliament's Agent at the Hague, which gives an account of what was then doing on the other side of the water:

For the Right Hon. the COMMITTEE of both Kingdoms at Derby-House.

"Right Honourable; The letters of both houses and their committees I delivered to the States General, and to the States of Holland. They will send copies to the admiralty and recommend the expedition of that affair. I hope it will go well with them in Hall and York. De Witt is at the Hague. My lords, the States are informed, by their ambassador, that the parliament suffers the Spaniard to take up men at London to serve against them in Flanders. Many of the well-affected here are scandalized at it, as if the parliament inclined much to favour the interests of Spain. They speak about the parliament's maintaining trade with Dunkirk their enemy, yet forbid them the trade of the Havens in the king's hands. It is like there will be ill blood betwixt the king of Portugal and this state; for the Portugals in Brazil, in the West-Indies, have taken a strong fort, called St. Austin's fort, from the States. and, some say, two ships laden with arms sent from hence. The Portugal ambassador here will not seem to know any thing of it, nor avow it as the king's act; in the mean time the West-India Company are preparing ships and for their relief, and have 50,000*l.* to do it withal. Your honours will see the story more fully by the inclosed Letter, printed here. My lords, there is a constant report, believed by many, that a fleet of 28 great ships shall lie upon our seas for the king of France. This is of great concernment; and though I will not write it for a certainty, nothing yet being acted in it by the state, yet I have heard it spoken of by men of quality; so that I durst not but advertise your honours of it, as a thing which is jealous; but if the ships be to be made or bought here, as some report they are, it will give jealousy to others as well as to us. I shall give you advice as I shall have further occasion hereafter. I hear, from good hands, that not only France and Sweden, but most of the princes of Germany declare themselves favourable to the interest of the Elector's Family; and some think the Swedes, and the Emperor might more easily agree than the house of Austria and the French. The Prince of Orange came home last night late, or this morning, for it was after midnight when he came into the Hague. I am informed that sir John Henderson, who came out of Denmark to , was here; that he saith, he will go into Scotland from hence; and that the king will speedily make a Peace with the parliament of England or Scotland, but not with both: This is design not opinion. I am, &c. WALTER STRICKLAND. Hague, Nov. 26-30, 1645."

* Mr. Whitlocke writes, 'That the number of these were about 400, the meanest whereof was a captain, who had laid down their commissions, deserted the king, and betook them to Worton-House, 14 miles from Newark, where they stood upon their guard.' Memoirs, p. 185.

This Letter was ordered to be communicated to the commons, and their concurrence desired, that it may be recommended to the admiralty to have a care of the sea affairs.

Resolutions of the Commons, in regard to Promotions and Grants in their intended Propositions for Peace.] Dec. 1. The house of commons debated the Propositions of Peace to be sent to the King, and, inter alia, came to the following remarkable Resolutions:

"That his majesty be desired, in these Propositions, to grant the title and dignity of a baron of England to sir Thomas Fairfax, and the heirs male of his body; and that an estate in land of 5000*l.* per annum be settled on him and his heirs for ever, in fee simple, in acknowledgment of his many great and faithful services to the kingdom: that his father, Ferdinando lord Fairfax (of Scotland) be made a baron and an earl of England. And, for the same reasons, That Robert earl of Essex, Algernon e. of Northumberland, Robert e. of Warwick, and Philip e. of Pembroke and Montgomery, be made dukes; and that Wm. earl of Salisbury, and Edward earl of Manchester, be made marquisses. That Wm. lord visc. Say and Sele, John lord Roberts, Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, and Philip lord Wharton, be made earls. That Denzil Hollis, esq. be made a viscount of England. That sir Henry Vane, sen. be made a baron. That Oliver Cromwell, esq. lieutenant general, and sir Wm. Waller, be made barons of England, and have each 2500*l.* per annum, settled on them and their respective heirs for ever, in fee simple.

That sir Arthur Haselrig and sir Philip Stapylton have each 2000*l.* per annum. That sir Wm. Brereton have 1500*l.* per annum. And that major-general Skipton have 1000*l.* per annum, settled on them and their respective heirs for ever, in fee simple. That the persons now named to be created dukes, marquisses, earls, viscounts, or barons, shall inherit the said respective titles and dignities, in the same priority and precedence, according to those respective titles of dignity, or other precedencies they now hold. That the lands and estates this day conferred, except the estate conferred upon sir Tho. Fairfax, shall not inure to the persons they are conferred upon, until the public debts and engagements of the kingdom be first satisfied. That this house doth declare, That it shall be an acceptable service for any person to inform this house of any of their members that, by himself, or others, directly or indirectly, hath taken or received any money or other thing, of any persons, for any matter depending in this house or any committee thereof, since the beginning of this parliament."

Mr. Whitlocke adds to the foregoing Resolutions, That the lord Howard was to be made an earl, also sir Philip Stapylton and sir Arthur Haslerig, barons: but the Journals make no mention of these three last intended promotions.

A Joint-Committee appointed to attend the Parliament's Army at the Siege of Newark.]

Dec. 2. The earl of Manchester acquainted the lords, That he had received a Letter from the earl of Leven, with notice that he was come up with the Scots Army to Newark; and desired to know who should command there in chief. Upon this the house thought fit to appoint general Leven to command all the forces, both English and Scots, that should be employed before Newark, during their continuance at that place: but, at a conference with the other house respecting this appointment, the commons were not willing to trust the command to one person, and desired that a joint-committee of English and Scots should reside with the army before Newark and act in that office; which was agreed to by the lords, with this proviso, That the English committee should consist of a number of lords and commons, to act under such instructions as should be agreed on by both houses.

This day the commons sent up a Message to the lords, importing, "That they had considered the great pressures and miseries the kingdom laid under, by this unnatural war; and out of their desires to have a safe and well-grounded Peace obtained, they had prepared some Propositions to be presented to his majesty, in which were some alterations different from those presented formerly to him; and to which they desired their lordships concurrence."

The King's Message of the 5th Dec. for Peace.]

Dec. 8. Whilst these Propositions were under the consideration of the Lords, the Speaker acquainted that house with a Letter, delivered him by a trumpet the night before. It was a Letter from the King, inclosed in one from Sir Thomas Glemham, governor of Oxford; which was read as follows:

For the SPEAKER of the House of PEERS pro tempore.

"C. R. His majesty being deeply sensible of the continuation of this bloody and unnatural war, cannot think himself discharged of the duty he owes to God, or the affection and regard he has to the preservation of his people, without the constant application of his earnest endeavours to find some expedient for the speedy ending of these unhappy distractions, if that may be, doth therefore desire, That a Safe Conduct may be forthwith sent for the duke of Richmond, the Earl of Southampton, John Ashburnham and Jeffery Palmer, esqrs. and their attendants with coaches, horses and other accommodations for their journey to Westminster, during their stay there, and return when they shall think fit: Whom his majesty intends to send to the lords and commons assembled in the Parliament of England, at Westminster, and the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, furnished with such Propositions as his majesty is confident will be the foundation of a happy and well-grounded Peace. Given at the Court at Oxford the 5th Dec. 1645."

The lords took this Message into consideration; and it was moved to send it to the commons with this sense upon it, viz. 'That this house did not think it fit there should be a Safe-Conduct granted to those four persons upon this Letter.' But the question being put, Whether to have this sense declared before it be sent down? it was resolved in the negative. Thereupon the Letter was sent to the commons, with a desire only that they would communicate it to the Scots commissioners.

Dec. 9. The trumpet which brought the foregoing Letter from the king, was sent back with the following Letter, signed by the Speakers of both houses:

For sir THOMAS GLEHAM, Governor of Oxford,

"Sir; We have received your Letter of the 5th instant, with his majesty's inclosed, and have sent back your trumpet by command of both houses, who will, with all convenient speed, return an Answer to his majesty, and rest Your loving friends, &c."

The Parliament's Answer to the several Papers lately presented by the Scots Commissioners.

Dec. 10. The following Answer to the several Papers lately presented by the Scots Commissioners being agreed upon, was read in the house of lords this day:

"The lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England at Westminster, having received several Papers from the Commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, particularly one of the 29th Sept. and another of the 9th Oct. to the matters therein contained they return this Answer: Concerning the Payment of the Scots Army, so much insisted on in your lordships Papers, the several Declarations, and the divers courses and ways which, in the said Papers, are expressed, and acknowledged by your lordships to have been made and taken by us for the payment of that army, sufficiently witness our constant care and manifold endeavours for the supply thereof; and if all those ways have, notwithstanding, proved so little effectual as your lordships alledge, yet can it not in any sort be imputed to the houses of parliament; who no sooner have had any wants of that army, or any obstructions in the ways taken for the entertainment thereof, represented unto them, but they have forthwith applied themselves to supply the one and remove the other, to the utmost of what lay in their power. Before the Scots Army was entered into this kingdom, we appointed a committee to sit purposely at Goldsmiths-Hall, to provide monies and necessaries for the support thereof; this committee hath sat ever since constantly to that end and to put forward the execution of our Ordinances therein, whereat, twice a week, some of the commissioners of Scotland themselves were present, to be witnesses and promoters of their diligence; the same committee had their agents in every county: to quicken the execution of our orders below in the country, we allowed salaries and rewards to the diligent, we gave power to punish the negligent, and all that should in any sort divert or obstruct the coming in of those assessments: When the course first designed for the payment of the Scots army, out of the estates of papists and other delinquents, answered not expectation, we provided for it as for other armies, by way of tax and assessment upon several counties; and when those of the Northern parts proved insufficient for so great a charge, we added others thereunto, and those of the most entire and quiet parts of the kingdom; where first was laid an assessment of 200,000*l.* in gross, and after, a monthly assessment of 21,000*l.* per month. There was never any expedient offered unto us for the removal of any obstruction in the raising of those assessments, which we did not readily assent unto; there was never any thing desired of us by our brethren of Scotland, which was in our power to grant, which we have not willingly agreed unto for the more speedy and effectual execution of our Orders for the pay and support of that army; there was no course taken for any other army, but we have taken the like also of the Scots; so that we may truly affirm, That it hath not rested on us, that that army hath not been as well paid and provided for, as any other whatsoever; but if the activeness and great successes of some other armies have given us more credit in procuring money to be advanced for them, or more quickened the spirits of the people to pay in their assessments to them, surely that ought not to be turned into matter of complaint against us, having found the same by experience, from time to time, in the payment of the armies of our own nation; possibly also the pay of other armies may appear more constant, and their wants less, than it is well known to us that both one and the other have been: neither have our endeavours been altogether so ineffectual for the supply of the Scots army, but that from the 6th Oct. 1643, to the 1st Nov. 1645, there hath been actually paid to them, in money, and provisions for which money hath been issued out of Goldsmiths-hall, the sum of 229,629*l.* sterling, besides 9000*l.* in money and lead paid unto them at York; and what they have received upon the assessments of the Northern parts, appointed to be paid into the lord mayor of York, and upon the 5th and 20th part, and from the Coal and Excise of Newcastle, and of the Northern parts, or otherwise, by any assignments of both houses of parliament; and likewise besides another assignment of 2000*l.* per month, assessed upon the county of York, in monies and provisions, for 4 months during the siege of York and after, amounting to 88,000*l.* and also besides 10,000*l.* more to cloath the soldiers of that army upon their return to Newcastle, over and above all that themselves had levied in the several counties where they have been, and their free quarter and disorderly plunderings; which (if they have been so excessive as the cry thereof from several parts representeth them to our ears) it is not much to be wondered at, if the water run more sparingly from the cisterns and conduit, when it is so much exhausted at the spring head, from whence the assessments for the entertainment of that army, and others, should have risen.—Concerning the Excise of the Northern parts, and the ways that are alledged to be taken to divert it from the Scots army, by forestalling it here in the South, and applying it to other uses; no such practices have been made known to us; and whensoever they shall be discovered, we shall be ready to apply fitting remedies thereunto.—And for the Coal of Newcastle; possibly the profits thence arising might fall very short of the estimate made thereof, in some one month; but, in other months, it hath come in in greater quantities; and we find that, for these twelve months last past, there hath actually come in, and been taken to the use of that army, upon the coals of Newcastle and Sunderland, above 53,000*l.* sterling, whereof 4500*l.* were of the customs belonging to the navy: and if, upon taking of Newcastle by the Scots army, the course for the managing of the coals, settled by both houses of the parliament of England, in the committee of Goldsmiths-Hall, had not been interrupted, the committee might have been better able to have given an account of any decay of trade therein, and how it hath happened that many months it hath fallen below the first estimate thereof.—Having made Answer to the most material points in your lordships Papers, concerning the Pay of the Scots Army; as you have very frequently and very freely declared unto us the wants and necessities thereof, through default of pay, so shall we also, with the like freedom and brotherly affection, represent to our brethren of Scotland some particulars concerning the proceedings of that army: it is well known unto your lordships, that we have, upon divers occasions, signified our advices and directions how that army might employ itself most effectually for the advancement of the public service of this kingdom, by engaging against the common enemies, and the places held and possessed by them; wherein, by what occasion we know not, we have found ourselves several times disappointed of our hopes and expectations; by which means not only the common cause hath been retarded, but also the ends frustrated for which the assistance of so great an army was desired by us, which was, that a speedy conclusion might be put to these unhappy wars. We shall not need to go further back for an instance than to that whereof the sense is freshest in our minds, and which, in that conjuncture of time, and of our affairs, proved very prejudicial to the service of this kingdom; which was the continuing of that army in the North, where no enemy was, and not marching to besiege Newark, at such time as it was thereunto desired by both houses of parliament; although they not only expressed their desires therein, but also their care in the provision of money and ammunition to enable and encourage them to undertake that work; but having received no satisfaction at all in that particular until that now, by your lordships Letter of the 12th Nov. the resolution of the general, the earl of Leven, concerning the marching of that army towards Newark, was signified unto us: by means of this delay, not only the Northern parts have lain all this while under a most unsupportable burden, but also the fairest opportunity that hath yet offered itself unto us, since the beginning of this war, of putting an end to our miseries, together with the season of the year for the speedy reducing of that place, which was the principal ground of our resolution in that particular, is already slipt out of our hands; and the advance of the 30,000*l.* which we had good hope, and some assurance of, from the city, for the use of that army, in case it came to Newark before the 1st Nov. and not otherwise, is rendered more difficult and doubtful unto us.—It was far from our intentions, that the Scots Army should neither be provided for by us, nor yet suffered to provide for their own subsistence; nor doth the contrary appear by any actions or omissions on our part, nor yet by any sufferings of that army; but that, according to our power, we have made provision for them, and that they also have supplied themselves.—We shall remember, according to your lordships expressions in your Papers, 'That not written Ordinances but real Payments must satisfy the necessities of the soldiers;' and we hope it shall be as well remembered also, how far better than paper our Ordinances have proved to that army, which hath not been more ready to engage itself really in the service of this kingdom, than we have been forward to pay it, and really to satisfy the necessities of the soldiets; and therefore desire that such expressions may be foreborne, which may seem to derogate either from the honour of the proceedings or of the Ordinances of parliament.—When the Treaty was concluded between the two kingdoms, it was supposed that such might be the wants or necessities of this kingdom, as that they might not be able to make due and constant payments to the Scots army; yet was it not supposed, that, in default thereof, they might forbear to engage their army, much less lay taxes upon the people of England to pay themselves, this kingdom being to give their public faith for the payment of their arrears, with interest; as, on the other side, the kingdom of Scotland gave their public faith, That neither their entrance into, nor continuance in the kingdom of England, should be made use of to any other ends than such as are contained in the Covenant and Articles of the Treaty. That it is contrary to the liberties of the subjects of England, that any taxes or levies of money should be made, raised, or levied upon them, without the consent of both houses of parliament, we need not declare to your lordships: and we are sorry that the cries of the people which continually sound in our ears, especially of the Northern parts, brought to us under the hands of such as we have entrusted there, should enforce us to represent unto our brethren of Scotland the great complaints which, long since, and at this present, are made of the laying of taxes of money, and other things, by some of the Scots army; and that also in very vast and excessive proportions, besides free quarterings and disorderly plunderings of horses, and other goods; which courses being taken and continued, it cannot be expected that we should continue the monthly pay of that army; which, though we have not taken occasion to stop and surcease upon taxes and levies of monies, and other proceedings of that army, yet we expect, as that which of right is due, that, out of it, deduction and satisfaction shall be given in the premises.—And as we are obliged to make good the monthly pay of that army, according to the Treaty, so long as we shall find it necessary to use the assistance thereof within this kingdom, and no longer; so is that army likewise bound to demean themselves conformable to the tenor of the Treaty; and, according thereunto, to give satisfaction unto this kingdom that such forces of the Scots nation, as have been put into the several garrisons of Newcastle upon-Tyne, the city of Carlisle, and other places in the North, without the consent of both houses of the parliament of England, shall be removed; to the intent that the same may be disposed of in such manner as shall be thought fitting by the said houses of parliament, the performance whereof we have demanded from the kingdom of Scotland, by our Letters to that parliament.—These things we held ourselves bound to represent to our brethren of Scotland, as well in discharge of the trust reposed in us, for the preservation of the interest and liberties of this kingdom, as also the better to maintain the union and good correspondency between the two kingdoms; which being the surest foundation of security and prosperity to both kingdoms, it always hath, and always shall be the firm resolution of both houses of the parliament of England, to maintain and preserve the same, according to the Covenant and Treaty; the common rules and marks which both kingdoms have set up to themselves to steer their course by in the pursuing of their joint interests, and for the attaining of the good ends therein expressed and contained, from which we desire that there may be no swerving on either side; hoping and expecting the like redress and satisfaction from our brethren of Scotland, upon any infringement thereof, as we should be ready to give unto them, if any such thing should happen on our part.—Concerning Religion and the settling of Church Government; as there is nothing wherein we have more desired to approve our consciences to God, and our actions to the world, so do our hearts give us a very clear testimony of the faithful and diligent discharge of our duty therein, according to the trust reposed in us, and the Covenant taken by us; and we conceive our actions witness no less to all that will rightly weigh and consider what we have already done therein, and with what diligence and zeal we have, from time to time, proceeded in that Work of God; being resolved to continue in so doing, till we have fully supplied what shall yet appear to be wanting therein: it being always to be remembered, that the preserving the liberty and freedom of our debates and resolutions in parliament, is not to be interpreted or termed negligence or delay in us.—As to the Propositions of Peace to be sent to his majesty, in pursuance of our Resolutions of the 6th Aug. communicated to your lordships; we have proceeded therein as the exigence of our affairs would permit; and the Propositions being at this present continually in agitation and debate in parliament, we are resolved to apply ourselves both speedily and effectually to the perfecting of them, according to the present state of affairs; and we doubt not but our actions shall testify to our brethren of Scotland, and all the world, that there is no earthly thing more in our thoughts and desires, than the settling of a safe and well-grounded Peace in the three kingdoms, for which we have done and suffered as much as any kingdom in the world."

Draught of an Answer to the foregoing Message from the King.] The same day the following Draught of an Answer to the king's last Message was read and agreed to by the lords; the earl of Lincoln only dissenting:

"May it please your majesty; The lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England at Westminster, have received your Letter of the 5th of this instant December, by a trumpet from sir Thomas Glemham; and having, together with the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, taken the same into their serious consideration, have commanded us to return this their humble Answer. They have, in all their actions, manifested to your majesty and the world, their sincere desires that a safe and well-grounded Peace might be settled in your three kingdoms; and, for the obtaining so great a blessing, shall ever pray unto God, and use their utmost endeavours; and should have counted it a great happiness, if your majesty's actions had been answerable to the expressions you have so often made concerning your desire of Peace. As to your majesty's desire of a Safe-Conduct for the coming hither of the duke of Richmond, the earl of Southampton, John Ashburnham, and Jeffry Palmer, esqrs. with Propositions from you; the persons formerly employed from your majesty, on the like occasion, having agitated other things to the disadvantage of the parliament, they cannot admit thereof. And finding that former Treaties have been made use of by your majesty for other ends, under pretence of Peace, the lords and commons, and the commissioners for the kingdom of Scotland, sithence the Breach of the Treaty at Uxbridge, have resolved and agreed to send Propositions and Bills unto your majesty, for the obtaining of a safe and well-grounded Peace; and to desire your answer unto them, without any Treaty to be had thereupon; and this they intend to do with all convenient speed."

Exceptions made by the Scots Commissioners, to the above Answer.] Dec. 13. The foregoing Draught being ordered to be communicated to the Scots Commissioners for their approbation, before it was sent away, they returned the following Answer and Exceptions to it:

"My lords and gentlemen; Having received from your lordships his majesty's Letter of the 5th of this instant, to the house of peers, and at the same time a Draught of the Answer of both houses to that Letter, we find in that Answer some particulars, wherein we are named as consenters, to which we cannot agree; neither would it, we are confident, have been expected from us, if our former Papers had been considered, or we consulted therein, as formerly upon the like occasions; concerning which we are ready to give your lordships satisfaction by conference.—By command of the Commissioners for the parliament of Scotland. JOHN CHIESLEY."

EXCEPTIONS to the foregoing Draught of an ANSWER to the King's Message.

"Whereas, according to the Order of both houses of parliament, a Draught of their Answer to his majesty's late Letter is, by this honourable committee, communicated to us, the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland, we have taken both the Letter and the Draught of the Answer into our serious consideration; and, with the honourable houses, do, in the name of the parliament of Scotland, from our hearts pray and desire, according to our former wishes and endeavours, that a safe and well-grounded Peace may be settled in his majesty's dominions; which we are apt to conceive may now, by the blessing of God, be brought to pass, when both his majesty hath made the motion on one hand, and the honourable houses of parliament have resolved and agreed to send Propositions and Bills to his majesty on the other, for the same much-desired end.—Only, according to our interest and affection, and in relation to so great a happiness, we do express our sense concerning some particulars in the Answer: First, If that it may seem good to the wisdom of the honourable houses, instead of these words, 'And should have accounted it a great happiness if your majesty's actions had been answerable,' that the expression might run thus, 'And shall account it a great happiness that your majesty's actions be answerable.' Next, Concerning that part of the Answer, which seemeth to bar all further Treaty, we refer ourselves to our Paper of the 14th August, wherein we declared ourselves most willing, that not only the three main Propositions debated at Uxbridge, but also all or any of the other Propositions of Peace, already agreed upon by the joint consent of both kingdoms, which, upon mutual debate, should be adjudged necessary, should be sent, with a desire of a positive Answer without any Treaty; but, withal, did shew, that if any new Propositions of Peace, or any material additions to, or alterations of, the former Propositions were to be sent, in that case we were necessitated to send them to the kingdom of Scotland, to be there considered and approved; as is more fully contained in that our Paper, which we desire may be taken into consideration at this time; and this is all that is in our power, or can be expected from us, in matters of so great importance as cannot be determined without the particular knowledge and express consents of the parliaments of both kingdoms, united by so many bonds of covenant of doing and sustaining in this common cause.—To the point of denying the Safe-Conduct; the houses having declared their opinion, we do agree, and earnestly do desire that, without delay, the Propositions, already agreed upon, may be sent to his majesty for a positive Answer; but if any of them be altered, or any other material difference be intended, which may lay a necessity upon us of sending them to the parliament of Scotland, to be there considered and returned hither with their sense; and so the winter, the fittest season for a Treaty, spent in debates upon new Propositions, the present opportunity lost, occasion given to our enemies to use the more art and industry for bringing in foreign forces, when they apprehend, by our delays, their motion of Peace not to be entertained, (besides many other inconveniences well known to the honourable houses, and felt by all the three kingdoms, which accompany our present distractions) the continuance of increase of the common miseries, through not settling of a happy Peace, cannot be imputed to us; who have not ceased constantly to express the sending the Propositions agreed upon by both kingdoms ever since the 20th of June last; have used our best endeavours, upon all occasions, with the honourable houses, from time to time; and have left no good ways or means, in our power, unessayed, which might deliver these kingdoms out of their trouble and sufferings, and settle them in a blessed Peace: it is therefore our earnest desire, that the present opportunity of pacification be improved, unto which we are ready to join our uttermost endeavours, waiting for the success from the blessing of God.—By command of the Commissioners for the parliament of Scotland. JOHN CHIESLEY."

Another Letter from the King, Dec. 15, for Peace.] Dec. 17. The King having yet received no Answer to his last Message, thought fit to second it with another; which was delivered to the lords, this day, in hæc verba:

For the SPEAKER of the House of Peers pro Tempore.

"C. R. His majesty cannot but extremely wonder that, after so many expressions on your part, of a deep and seeming sense of the miseries of this afflicted kingdom, and of the dangers incident to his person during the continuance of this unnatural war; your many great and so oft repeated protestations, That the raising of these arms hath been only for the necessary defence of God's true religion, his majesty's honour, safety, and prosperity, the peace, comfort, and security of his people, you should delay a Safe-Conduct to the persons mentioned in his majesty's Message of the 5th instant, which are to be sent unto you with Propositions for a safe and well-grounded Peace: a thing so far from having been at any time denied by his majesty, whensoever you have desired the same, that he believes it hath been seldom, if ever, refused amongst the most avowed and professed enemies, much less by subjects to their king. But his majesty is resolved that no discouragements whatsoever shall make him fail on his part, of doing his utmost endeavours to put an end to these calamities, which, if not in time prevented, must prove the ruin of this unhappy nation; and therefore doth once again desire, That a Safe-Conduct may be forthwith sent for those persons expressed in his former Message: and doth therefore conjure you, as you will answer to Almighty God in that day when he shall make inquisition for all the blood that hath and may yet be spilt in this unnatural war, as you tender the preservation and establishment of the true religion, by all the bonds of duty and allegiance to your king, or compassion to your bleeding and unhappy country, and of charity to yourselves, that you dispose your hearts to a true sense, and employ all your faculties in a more serious endeavour, together with his majesty, to put a speedy end to these wasting divisions; and then he shall not doubt but that God will yet again give the blessing of Peace to this distracted kingdom. Given at our Court at Oxford the 15th Dec. 1645."

The lords ordered this Message to be communicated to the commons, and to the Scots commissioners, that an Answer might be speedily made to this and the last Message from the king. At the same time they received a Message from the commons, That they did adhere to the Letter, formerly passed both houses, in Answer to the king's; and desired that the members of both houses, who were of the committee for the two kingdoms, should confer with the Scots Commissioners, and offer them the reasons for adhering to this Answer, and learn from them any reasons they should urge to the contrary.—Soon after the commons sent up another Message, intimating, That upon reading the king's last Letter, this day, they perceived it to be so much in substance with the former, that to retard the sending of that Answer which the houses have agreed to, will be much to the disadvantage of the Parliament; that the commons had resolved to take the Propositions for Peace into consideration, de die in diem; and therefore desired the lords to expedite those which were already brought up, and they would dispatch the rest as soon as possible. All which the lords agreed to.

Dec. 22. The earl of Northumberland reported divers Papers from the committee of both kingdoms, being the result of their debates and conferences with the Scots Commissioners concerning the Answer to the King's Letter. The whole of these Papers are given at length in the Lords Journals. The Report being over, the lords ordered that the several Papers, therein contained, should be taken into consideration the next morning.

Taking of Hereford by the Parliament's Forces.] Dec. 23. A message was brought up from the commons, by sir Robert Harley and others, to communicate to their lordships divers Letters, importing the good success of some of the parliament's forces in the taking of the city of Hereford. Sir Robert Harley farther informed the lords, That the commons desired their concurrence in appointing a Thanksgiving to Almighty God, the next Sabbath-day, in London and within the line of communication, for the taking of Hereford; and also that colonel Birch might be governor of that city: to both these the lords agreed accordingly.

The Parliament's Answer to the King's Messages of Dec. 5th and 15th, for Peace.] Dec. 26. The commons sent up an Answer to the King's Letters; which the lords read, approved of, and ordered to be communicated to the Scots Commissioners; which they, after some deliberation, having consented to, it was ordered to be sent away that afternoon, by sir Peter Killegrew:

"May it please your majesty; The lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, at Westminster, have received your Letters of the 5th and 15th of this instant Dec. and having, together with the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland, taken the same into their serious consideration, do humbly return this Answer: They have, in all their actions, manifested to your majesty and the world, their sincere and earnest desires that a safe and well-grounded Peace might be settled in your three kingdoms; and for the obtaining so great a blessing, shall ever pray to God and use their utmost endeavours: and beseech your majesty to believe, that their not sending a more speedy Answer hath not proceeded from any intention to retard the means of putting an end to these present calamities by a happy Peace; but hath been occasioned by the considerations and debates necessary in a business of so great importance, wherein both kingdoms are so much concerned. As to your majesty's desire of a Safe-Conduct for the coming hither of the duke of Richmond, the earl of Southampton, John Ashburnham, and Jeffrey Palmer, esqrs. with Propositions to be the foundation of an happy and well-grounded Peace; they finding that former Treaties have been made use of for other ends, under pretence of Peace, and have proved dilatory and unsuccessful, cannot give way to a Safe-Conduct according to your majesty's desire: But both houses of the parliament of England having now under their consideration Propositions and Bills for the settling of a safe and well-grounded Peace, which are speedily to be communicated to the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, do resolve, after mutual agreement of both kingdoms, to present them with all speed to your majesty. GREY of Warke, Speaker of the House of Peers pro tempore. W. LENTHALL, Speaker of the house of Commons. Westminster, Dec. 26, 1645."

Another Message from the King of the 26th, for a Personal Treaty, sent before his Majesty's Receipt of the foregoing Answer.] But before this Answer was received by the King, another Message came from his majesty ushered in to the house of lords, in the usual manner;

For the SPEAKER of the house of PEERS pro Tempore, to be communicated to the two houses of parliament at Westminster, and the commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland.

"C. R. Notwithstanding the strange and unexpected delays (which can be preceded by no former times) to his majesty's two former Messages, his majesty will lay aside all expostulations, as rather serving to lose time than to contribute any remedy to the evils which, for the present, do afflict this distracted kingdom: Therefore, without further preamble, his majesty thinks it most necessary to send these Propositions this way, which he intended to do by the persons mentioned in his former Messages; though he well knows the great disadvantage which overtures of this kind have, by the want of being accompanied by well-instructed messengers.—His Majesty conceiving that the former Treaties have hitherto proved ineffectual, chiefly for want of power in those persons that treated, as likewise because those from whom their power was derived (not possibly having the particular informations of every several debate) could not give so clear a judgment as was requisite to so important a business: if therefore his majesty may have the engagement of the two houses at Westminster, the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, the mayor, aldermen, common-council, and militia of London; of the chief commanders in sir Tho. Fairfax's army, as also of those in the Scots army, for his majesty's free and safe coming to, and abode in, London, or Westminster, (with such of his servants now attending him, and their followers, not exceeding in all the number of 300) for the space of 40 days; and, after the said time, for his free and safe repair to any of his garrisons of Oxford, Worcester, or Newark, (which his majesty shall nominate at any time before his going from London or Westminster) his majesty propounds to have a Personal Treaty with the two houses of parliament at Westminster, and the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, upon all matters which may conduce to the restoring of peace and happiness to these miserably distracted kingdoms; and to begin with the three heads which were treated on at Uxbridge. And for the better clearing of his majesty's earnest and sincere intentions of putting an end to these unnatural distractions, (knowing that point of security may prove the greatest obstacle to this most blessed work) his majesty therefore declares, That he is willing to commit the greatest trust of the militia of this kingdom, for such time and with such powers as are expressed in the Paper delivered by his majesty's commissioners at Uxbridge, the 6th Feb. last, to these persons following, viz. the lord Privy-seal, duke of Richmond, marquis of Hertford, marquis of Dorchester, earl of Dorset, lord-chamberlain, earls of Northumberland, Essex, Southampton, Pembroke, Salisbury, Manchester, Warwick, Denbigh, Chichester, lords Say, Seymour, Lucas, Lexington, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Henry Belasis, Mr. Rd. Spenceer, sir Tho. Fairfax, Mr. John Ashburnham, sir Gervase Clifton, sir Henry Vane, jun. Mr. Robert Wallop, Mr. Tho. Chicheley, Mr. Oliver Cromwell, and Mr. Philip Skippon; supposing that these are persons against whom there can be no just exception. But if this doth not satisfy, then his majesty offers to name the one half, and leave the election of the other to the two houses of parliament at Westminster, with the powers and limitations before-mentioned.—Thus his majesty calls God and the world to be witness of his sincere intentions and real endeavours for the composing and settling of these miserable distractions; which he doubts not but, by the blessing of God, will soon be put to an happy conclusion, if this his majesty's offer be accepted; otherwise, he leaves all the world to judge who are the continuers of this unnatural war. And therefore he once more conjures you, by all the bonds of duty you owe to God and your king, to have so great a compassion on the bleeding and miserable estate of your country, that you join your most serious and hearty endeavours with his majesty, to put an happy and speedy end to these present miseries. Given at the Court at Oxford, 26th Dec. 1645."

A Message from the King, Dec. 29th, occasioned by that Answer.] Dec. 30. Sir Peter Killegrew, the Messenger sent with the parliament's Letter to the King, returned with this Answer:

"C. R. Although the Message, sent by sir Peter Killegrew, may justly require an expostulatory Answer, yet his majesty lays that aside, as not so proper for his present endeavours; leaving all the world to judge, whether his Proposition for a Personal Treaty, or the flat denial of a Safe-Conduct for persons to begin a Treaty, be greater signs of a real intention to Peace; and shall now only insist upon his former Message of the 26th of this Dec. That, upon his repair to Westminster, he doubts not but so to join his endeavours with his two houses of parliament, as to give just satisfaction not only concerning the business of Ireland, but also for the settling of a way for the payment of the public debts, as well to the Scots and the city of London, as others. And as already he hath shewn a fair way for the settling of the militia, so he shall carefully endeavour, in all other particulars, that none shall have cause to complain for want of security, whereby just jealousies may arise to hinder the continuance of the desired Peace. And certainly this Proposition of a Personal Treaty could never have entered into his majesty's thoughts, if he had not resolved to make apparent to all the world, That the public good and peace of this kingdom is far dearer to him than the respect of any particular interest: wherefore none can oppose this motion, without a manifest demonstration, that he particularly envies his majesty should be the chief author in so blessed a work, besides the declaring himself the direct opposer of the happy Peace of these nations. To conclude: Whosoever will not be ashamed that his fair and specious protestations should be brought to a true and public test, and those who have a real sense and do truly commiserate the miseries of their bleeding country, let them speedily and cheerfully embrace his majesty's Proposition for his Personal Treaty, at Westminster; which, by the blessing of God will undoubtedly, to these now distracted kingdoms, restore the happiness of a long-wished-for and lasting Peace. Given at the Court at Oxford 29th Dec. 1645."

The next day the commons sent a Message to the lords, importing, That upon reading of the King's Letters of the 26th and 29th Dec. they do find a greater necessity to continue in their former Resolution, 'That the Militia of this kingdom shall be put in the power of both houses of parliament, and not otherwise, according to the Proposition concerning the Militia already sent from their house to the lords; and that the lords concurrence be desired, both in the said Proposition and in the Vote; and that the lords be desired, if they shall agree in the said Proposition and in this Vote, that they will concur with this house, That the said Proposition concerning the Militia and this Vote may, by the members of both houses that are of the committee of both kingdoms, be communicated to the Scots Commissioners, and their concurrence desired to both." To all which the lords agreed.

The King's affairs now growing desperate, on all sides, many gentlemen of estates, who had served his majesty in his armies, sought to make the best of a bad bargain, and save some part, by compounding for the whole. A committee for such uses was settled, by parliament, at Goldsmith's-Hall; and time was allowed to the 25th of this month, for those who thought proper to come in to compound. Soldiers of fortune, as they were called, or those who had no estates, were suffered to transport themselves to any foreign country, never more to return to their own, without leave from the parliament: but, if they returned again, and took up arms against the parliament, then they were neither to have a pardon nor quarter.

Answer from the Parliament to the King's Messages of the 26th and 29th Dec.] Jan. 3. The form of a Letter, drawn up by the committee of both kingdoms, to be sent to the king as an Answer to his two last, was read to the lords, and ordered to be communicated, first to the Scots commissioners, and then sent away to his majesty by a trumpeter:

"May it please your majesty; We, your humble and loyal subjects of both kingdoms, have received your Letters of the 26th and 29th Dec. last, unto which we humbly return this Answer, That there hath been no delay on our parts but what hath been necessary in a business of so great consequence, as is expressed in our former Letter to your majesty.—Concerning the Personal Treaty desired by your majesty; there having been so much innocent blood of your good subjects shed in this war by your majesty's commands and commissions, Irish rebels brought over into both kingdoms, and endeavours to bring over more into both of them, as also forces from foreign parts; your majesty being in arms in these parts, and the prince at the head of an army in the West; divers towns made garrisons and kept in hostility against the parliament of England; there being also forces in Scotland against that parliament and kingdom by your majesty's commission; the war in Ireland fomented and prolonged by your majesty, whereby the three kingdoms are brought near to utter ruin and destruction; we conceive that until satisfaction and security be first given to both your kingdoms, your majesty's coming hither cannot be convenient, nor by us assented to; neither can we apprehend it a means conducing to Peace, that your majesty should come to your parliament for a few days, with any thoughts of leaving it, especially with intentions of returning to hostility against it.—And we do observe that your majesty desires a Safe-Conduct, not only from your parliament, but from the lord mayor, aldermen, common council, and militia of the city of London, the chief commanders of sir T. Fairfax's army, and those of the Scots army; which is against the privileges and honour of your parliament, those being joined with them who are subject and subordinate to their authority.—As to that which your majesty, against the freedom of parliament, enforces in both your Letters, with many earnest expressions, as if in no other way than that propounded by your majesty, the Peace of your kingdoms could be established, your majesty may please to remember, that, in our last Letter, we did declare that Propositions from both kingdoms were speedily to be sent unto your majesty; which being assented unto by your majesty, will be the only means whereby you can give satisfaction and security to your kingdoms, will assure a firm union between the two kingdoms (as much desired by each for other as for themselves) settle religion, and secure the peace of the kingdom of Scotland, whereof neither is so much as mentioned in your majesty's Letter. And in proceeding according to these just and necessary grounds, to the putting an end to the bleeding calamities of these nations, your majesty may have the glory to be a principal instrument in so happy a work; and we, however misinterpreted, shall approve ourselves to God and the world to be real and sincere in seeking a safe and well-grounded Peace."

The Scots Commissioners' Objections to it.
Jan. 5. The foregoing Letter having been communicated to the Scots Commissioners for their consent to it, they, this day, returned a Paper to the lords, which contained their thoughts on the said Letter, which was read in hæc verba:

"According to an Order of both houses your lordships did, upon Saturday at night, communicate unto us their Answer to the king's Letter, in reference to our concurrence; and, upon perusal thereof, we have thought fit to desire it may be considered, whether so full and express charging of his majesty, as is contained in the second paragraph, doth conduce to the intended pacification; and whether it may not, contrary to the intentions of both kingdoms, probably be interpreted to a further end than to decline a Personal Treaty. Some expressions, as we conceive, may, upon a second consideration, be made more distinct and clear, wherein we shall be very ready to concur with your lordships: but one thing there is very material to us, which we desire to have altered in the fourth paragraph, 'Your majesty may please to remember that, in our last Letter we did declare that Propositions for both kingdoms were speedily to be sent to

'your majesty, which being assented to by your majesty, will be the only means whereby you can give satisfaction and security unto your kingdoms:' because these words, as they now stand, do imply not only that the parliaments of the two kingdoms will receive no Propositions from his majesty to be the foundation of a safe and well-grounded Peace; but also, that there can be no satisfaction or security, unless his majesty assent unto every particular, of the smallest importance, contained in the Propositions to be sent from both kingdoms; and do further imply, that there shall be no Treaty upon those Propositions; which things we have no power to declare, as is well known to the honourable houses. By command of the Commissioners for the Parliament of Scotland.

"JOHN CHIESLEY."

Examination taken concerning a Plot, to be executed if the King should come to London.]

Jan. 7. The commons sent up a message to acquaint the lords with the following Examination taken by a committee of their house, concerning some Plots intended to have been executed upon the king's coming to London; in which it was resolved to secure the city, the tower, and the parliament before they meddled with any private business:

... , being examined saith, "That he heard prince Rupert, with many others, swear, That if his uncle could but get into London, though but with 300 men; before they had been there 3 hours he should have 3000, 3000, and 3000 to that; and that he himself would cut all the throats of the Round-Head rogues that sit in the parliament.—That prince Rupert said, his uncle had many friends in London which durst not shew themselves; but when his uncle came they would, and then he did not doubt but to make good all their losses; and prince Maurice confirmed and agreed to these speeches of his brother by many oaths. And this the examinant is ready to make good to be most true upon his oath. And this examinant farther saith, That all the reformadoes being about to guard his majesty's person on new year's eve, at night it was noised that his majesty would go to London the next morning, whether the Letters from the parliament came or no; upon this there was a bustle in Oxford to provide to go immediately; and that it was the general voice, that their party is so great here, as they have assurance from those who come from London daily without interruption, that, if his majesty come, they shall easily destroy the city and the parliament, and take all to themselves: and that upon the stop of his majesty's coming, the next day it was ordered, That all the troopers should quarter in and about Oxford upon free quarter for a fortnight, because they hoped to come away before that time."

It is observable, That the proof of this Plot rested upon the credit of one single witness without a name: and when it is also remembered, that about this time prince Rupert was in disgrace with the king, there seems some reason to apprehend, that this Plot was only a contrivance of the Independent party, whose views were inconsistent with any peace at all, and who were apprehensive that the king's Personal Treaty with the parliament might create too good an understanding between them.

Jan. 13. All this time the parliament's last Answer to the king was staid from sending away, for want of the Scots Commissioners consent to it. The passage they objected to, with their reasons for so doing, we have already given: however, it was at last agreed, that the members of both houses, who were of the committee of both kingdoms, should have power to settle this matter with the Scots, and alter the sentence objected to as they thought fit: but, not before this day, was the Letter agreed to and signed by all parties, in which the passage objected to was altered thus: 'That Propositions from both kingdoms were speedily to be sent to your majesty, which we conceive to be the only way for obtaining an happy and well-grounded Peace; and your majesty's assent unto those Propositions will be an effectual means for giving satisfaction and security to your kingdoms.'

The King's Fifth Message for Peace, Jan. 15.]

Jan. 16. Before the parliament's last Answer could reach the king, his majesty had dispatched another Letter to them, which was read in the house of lords this day as follows:

For the SPEAKER of the House of Peers pro tempore, to be communicated to the two Houses of Parliament at Westminster, and the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland.

"C. R. But that these are times wherein nothing is strange, it were a thing much to be marvelled at, what should cause this unparalleled long detention of his majesty's trumpet, sent with his gracious Message of the 26th Dec. last, Peace being the only subject of it, and his majesty's Personal Treaty the means proposed for it. And it were almost as great a wonder, that his majesty should be so long from enquiring after it, if that the hourly expectation thereof had not in some measure satisfied his impatience. But lest his majesty, by his long silence, should condemn himself of carelessness in that which so much concerns the good of all his people, he thinks it high time to enquire after his said trumpeter: for since all men, who pretend any goodness, must desire Peace, and that all men know Treaties to be the best and most Christian way to procure it; and there being as little question that his majesty's personal presence in it is the likeliest way to bring it to a happy issue, he judges there must be some strange variety of accidents which causeth this most tedious delay: wherefore his majesty earnestly desires to have a speedy account of his former Message, the subject whereof is Peace, and the means his personal presence at Westminster; where, the government of the Church being settled as it was in the times of the happy and glorious reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James, and full liberty for the ease of their consciences who will not communicate in that service established by law, and likewise for the free and public use of the Directory (prescribed, and, by command of the two houses of parliament, now practised in some parts of the city of London) to such as shall desire to use the same; and all forces being agreed to be disbanded, his majesty will then forthwith (as he hath in his Message of the 29th Dec. last already offered) join with his two houses of parliament in settling some way for the payment of the Public Debts to his Scotch subjects, the city of London, and others. And his majesty having proposed a fair way for the settling of the Militia, which now, by this long delay, seems not to be thought sufficient security, his majesty (to shew how really he will employ himself at his coming to Westminster for making this a lasting Peace, and taking away all jealousies, how groundless soever, will endeavour, upon debate with his two houses, so to dispose of it, as likewise of the business of Ireland, as may give to them and both kingdoms just satisfaction; not doubting also but to give good contentment to his two houses of parliament in the choice of the lord admiral, the officers of state, and others, if his two houses, by their ready inclinations to Peace, shall give him encouragement thereunto.—Thus his majesty having taken occasion, by his just impatience, so to explain his intentions that no man can doubt of a happy issue to this succeeding Treaty; if now there shall be so much as a delay to the same, he calls God and the world to witness who they are that not only hinder, but reject this kingdom's future happiness: it being so much the stranger, that his majesty's coming to Westminster (which was first the greatest pretence for taking up arms) should be so much as delayed, much less not accepted or refused. But his majesty hopes that God will no longer suffer the malice of wicked men to hinder the peace of this too-much afflicted kingdom. Given at the Court at Oxford, 15th Jan. 1645."

The City of London petition for a speedy Settlement of Church Government.] This day, the lord mayor, aldermen &c. of London, presented a Petition to the lords, importing, "That they desired a speedy Settlement of Church-Government might be ordained in the city, for the suppressing of all private meetings on the Lord's day, which were multiplied to such a height, that there were no less than 11 in one parish: that there were instances of women-preachers in these meetings, and of new and strange doctrines and blasphemies vented in them; whereby they said, the godly orthodox ministers were neglected and contemned as if they were antichristian, and acted as under the tyranny of a prelatical government, &c." The lords gave them strong assurances of their firm attachment to presbytery, according to their Covenant, and of their best endeavours to answer the desires of the petitioners.

Another Message from the King, Jan. 17 requiring an Answer to all his former.] Jan. 19. The Speaker presented another Letter to the lords, from the King, which was read in hæc verba:

For the SPEAKER of the House of Peers pro tempore. To be communicated to the two Houses of Parliament at Westminster, and the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland.

"C. R. His majesty thinks not fit now to answer those aspersions which are returned as arguments for his non-admittance to Westminster for a Personal Treaty, because it would inforce a style not suitable to his end, it being the Peace of these miserable kingdoms: yet thus much he cannot but say to those who have sent him this Answer, That if they had considered what they had done themselves in occasioning the shedding of so much innocent blood, by withdrawing themselves from their duty to him in a time when he had granted so much to his subjects, and in violating the known laws of the kingdom to draw an exorbitant power to themselves over their fellow-subjects, (to say no more, to do as they have done) they could not have given such a false character of his majesty's actions: wherefore his majesty must now remember them, that having, some hours before his receiving of their Paper of the 13th Jan. sent another Message to them of the 15th; wherein, by divers particulars, he enlargeth himself to shew the reality of his endeavours for Peace by his desired Personal Treaty, which he still conceives to be the likeliest way to attain to that blessed end, he thinks fit, by this Message, to call for an Answer to that, and indeed to all the former; for certainly no rational man can think their last Paper can be any Answer to his former demands, the scope of it being, that because there is a war, therefore there should be no treaty for Peace. And is it possible to expect that the Propositions mentioned should be the grounds of a lasting Peace, when the persons that send them will not endure to bear their own king speak? But whatever the success hath been of his majesty's former Messages, or how small soever his hopes are of a better, considering the high strain of those who deal with his majesty, yet he will neither want fatherly bowels to his subjects in general, nor will he forget that God hath appointed him for their king, with whom he treats: wherefore he now demands a speedy Answer to his last and former Messages. Given at our Court at Oxon, this 17th Jan. 1645."

Mr. Rushworth's Letter concerning the taking of Dartmouth.] Jan. 22. A message was brought from the commons by Mr. Nichols and others, who presented to their lordships the following Letter relating to the taking of Dartmouth:

For the hon. Wm. Lenthall, esq. Speaker of the Hon. House of Commons.

"Sir; If I write confusedly, I shall humbly crave your pardon; for we have been up all night, and things are not yet in a settled condition. In my former Letters I acquainted you how the Army was engaged before Dartmouth, a place of as great, if not greater, concernment than Exeter. It required some few days time to be thoroughly informed of the state of the town, after which it was unanimously resolved to storm the same; for we find more loss of men by lingering sieges than by sudden storms. Every commander was allotted to his post, and they as faithfully and valiantly performed their duties; every man gaining the command of every foot or place that fell to his lot, with all the ordinance, arms, and ammunition.—The storm began about one o'clock this morning. After the enemy had discharged their cannon once, our men got under the shot, possessed the cannon, and turned them against the enemy; for we had no pieces at all of our own, the weather not admitting any to be brought. After the line was cleared, and some works taken, we became masters of the whole town, and then of Tonstall-Church, Mount-Flagon, Paradise Fort, and the Old Castle, in which Castle are five great Iron Guns which commanded the river. In the storm our men possessed themselves of about 60 pieces of ordinance.—The two great forts are not yet taken, being a mile from the town, but if they accept not of quarter while they may have it, in the opinion of the general, lieutenant general, and commanders, we may reduce them by force in 48 hours; and batter them in pieces with their own great guns, which we have taken in the town, one whereof is a brass demy cannon.—Truly, I never saw men fall on more chearfully and merrily. Mr. Dell and Mr. Peters preached unto them, and put much life into them; and God was wonderfully merciful to us, for we had but one man slain and but few wounded, though the forts played most fiercely on the soldiers. The commanders and forces that were engaged in the storm were col. Hammond and his regiment; col. Lambert and his regiment; col. Fortescue and his regiment; lieutenant col. Pride with col. Harley's regiment; and a good party out of the general's and col. Ingoldby's regiments, and, lastly, 200 seamen and some dragoons; and though the town was entered thus by storm, yet very little prejudice was done to the townsmen, the soldiers being fair-conditioned beyond expectation. They grumbled a little they had not the reward promised at Bristol to save that town from plundering, which city deserves to feel the smart of plunder for their unthankfulness for the great favours they found from the army. The messenger is in haste to be gone, and for further particulars the house will suddenly receive an account. It hath pleased God wonderfully to bless the army in this expedition so far West; not only to scatter the enemy's horse, but to hinder the relief intended for Exeter; and interrupted, nay quite broke, the young generalissimo is his^{*} newlevies; relieved Plymouth, and inforced the enemy into Cornwall; leaving a force sufficient to besiege Exeter. If the army had formerly advanced, leaving that city unbesieged, as it was much desired, I think that service would not have been of so much advantage as the taking it this season. Whilst you have commanders that are faithful, if you will let them put their designs in execution when their own convenience and judgment lead them to it, I hope you will have no cause to repent it; but it is hard to please all.—Just now the enemy beats a parley in the two great forts, so you may be assured we may have them on any terms. The general sent the comptroller to summon the two men of war in the river, who yielded immediately; the one was capt. Johnson's ship of Newcastle, of ten pieces of ordinance; the other of 14, belonging to the governor of Barnstaple. In Tonstall-Church we took 120 prisoners, about 400 more in the town and other works. I humbly take my leave, and remain, your, &c. Jo. RUSHWORTH. Dartmouth, Jan. 19, 1645, 4 in the morning."

A day of Thanksgiving was ordered by both houses for this welcome intelligence.

Jan 23. A Letter from general Fairfax was presented to the lords and read, containing some farther particulars relating to the storming of Dartmouth. This Letter from the general was sent up by the famous Hugh Peters, one of the general's chaplains; who acquainted their lordships with the several providences of God to the army; as likewise with the present condition of the enemy, and what prisoners they had taken at Dartmouth: and that there were endeavours to carry the prince beyond the sea; as also of the activity and unity of the army under sir T. Fairfax. He likewise presented to the house divers colours of horse taken at Bovy-Tracy, and others taken in Dartmouth: a Popish Altar-Stone and a Mass-Book, and several Papers and Letters taken in the governor's study: that two of the prisoners, viz. the earl of Newport and Mr. Denham, son to the late baron Denham, who had been serviceable to the general in gaining of the forts which held out at Dartmouth, after the town was taken, were sent up, upon their parole to render themselves prisoners within ten days: and further, that, by command of the general and council of war, he was commanded to request, that the army might be forthwith recruited, and the cloaths that are provided speeded to them, they having yet received none of them. Hereupon both houses ordered a Letter to be sent to sir T. Fairfax, to take notice of his great services, and of his expressions and affections; and to acquaint him what esteem the houses had of them; and what they had done in consideration of them. The commons referred it to the committee of the army, to consider how the 5000*l.* per annum, land of inheritance, by former Vote ordered to be bestowed upon sir T. Fairfax, general, may be speedily settled upon him and his heirs for ever, and he be put into the present possession of it: and that the committee do bring in an Ordinance to this purpose with all convenient speed.—It was also referred to the committee of the West, to take consideration of Mr. Peters, for his present charge and necessities, and for a certain future subsistence, in some convenient proportion considerable to his services and affections.

Jan. 24. The committee of both kingdoms acquainted the lords, that one from Oxford informed them, That he heard there the king should tell the Junto that he would come to London, if he was sure to be shot to death as soon as he came there. But no further notice is taken of this extraordinary piece of intelligence.

The King's Reply, Jan. 24, to the Parliament's last Answer of Jan. 13.] Jan. 26. Another Letter from the king was presented to the house, and read. It was a further Reply to the parliament, and was as follows:

For the SPEAKER of the House of Peers pro tempore. To be communicated to the two Houses of Parliament at Westminster, and to the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland.

"C. R. The procuring Peace to these kingdoms by Treaty is so much desired by his majesty, that no unjust aspersions whatsoever, or any other discouragements, shall make him desist from doing his endeavour therein, until he shall see it altogether impossible: and therefore he hath thought fitting so far only to make Reply to that Paper or Answer which he hath received of the 13th instant, as may take away those objections which are made against his majesty's coming to Westminster, expecting still an Answer to his Messages of the 15th and 17th, which he hopes by this time have begotten better thoughts and resolutions in the members of both houses. And first, therefore, whereas in the said last Paper it is objected as an impediment to his majesty's personal Treaty, That much innocent blood hath been shed in this war by his majesty's commissions, &c. this he will not now dispute, (it being apparent to all the world by whom that blood hath been spilt) but rather presseth that there should be no more; and, to that end only he hath desired this Personal Treaty, as judging it the most immediate means to abolish so many horrid confusions in all his kingdoms. And it is no argument to say, That there shall be no such Personal Treaty because there have been wars, it being a strong inducement to have such a Treaty to put an end to the war. Secondly, That there should be no such Personal Treaty, because some of his Irish subjects have repaired to his assistance in it, seems an argument altogether as strange as the other ; as always urging that there should be no physick because the party is sick : and in this particular it hath been often observed unto them, That those whom they call Irish, who have so expressed their loyalty to their sovereign, were indeed, for the most part, English protestants that had been formerly sent into Ireland by the two houses ; impossibilitated to stay there any longer by the neglect of those that sent them thither, who should there have better provided for them. And for any foreign forces ; it is too apparent that their armies have swarmed with them, when his majesty hath had few or none.—And whereas, for a third impediment, it is alledged, That the prince is in the head of an army in the West, and that there are divers garrisons still kept in his majesty's obedience, and that there are forces in Scotland ; it must be as much confessed as that as yet there is no Peace ; and therefore it is desired that, by such a Personal Treaty, all these impediments may be removed. And it is not here amiss to put them in mind, how, long since, his majesty did press a disbanding of all forces on both sides, the refusing whereof hath been the cause of this objection. And whereas exception is taken, That there is a time limited in the Proposition for his majesty's Personal Treaty, thereupon inferring that he should again return to hostility ; his majesty protesteth, That he seeks this Treaty to avoid future hostility, and to procure a lasting Peace ; and if he can meet with like inclinations to Peace in those he desires to treat with, he will bring such affections and resolutions in himself as shall end all these unhappy bloody differences.—As for those engagements which his majesty hath desired for his security ; whosoever shall call to mind the particular occasions that inforced his majesty to leave his city of London and Westminster, will judge his demand very reasonable and necessary for his safety. But he no way conceiveth how the lord mayor, aldermen, common council, and militia of London, were either subject or subordinate to that authority which is alledged, as knowing neither law nor practice for it ; and if the two armies be, he believes it is more than can be paralleled by any former times in this kingdom. Nor can his majesty understand how his majesty's seeking of a Personal security can be any breach of privilege ; it being more likely to be infringed by hindering his majesty from coming freely to his two houses.—As for the objection, That his majesty omitted to mention the settling Religion, and securing the peace of his native kingdom, his majesty declares, That he conceives it was included in his former, and hath been particularly mentioned in his latter Message of the 15th present : but, for their better satisfaction, he again expresseth that it was, and ever shall be, both his meaning and endeavour in this Treaty desired ; and it seems to him very clear that there is no way for a final ending of such distractions as afflict this kingdom, but either by treaty or conquest ;

the latter of which his majesty hopes none will have the impudence or impiety to wish for : and for the former, if his personal assistance in it be not the most likely way, let any reasonable man judge ; when, by that means, not only all unnecessary delays will be removed, but even the greatest difficulties made easy : and therefore he doth now again earnestly insist upon that Proposition, expecting to have a better Answer upon mature consideration. And can it be imagined that any Propositions will be so effectual, being formed before a Personal Treaty, as such as are framed and propounded upon a full debate on both sides ? Wherefore his majesty, who is most concerned in the good of his people, and is most desirous to restore peace and happiness to his three kingdoms, doth again instantly desire an Answer to his said former Messages, to which he hath hitherto received none. Given at our Court at Oxon 24th Jan. 1645."

Cromwell's Command in the Army further continued.] Jan. 27. Cromwell's command in the army, as lieutenant-general of the horse under sir T. Fairfax, having been prolonged from time to time, this day an Ordinance was made for adding six months more to his commission, at the expiration of the present ; from which time we do not find that he ever gave himself the trouble to apply for any farther lease of his power.

Intercepted Letters, relating to the Earl of Glamorgan's Negotiations in Ireland, laid before the Parliament] The lords Journals inform us, That several Papers relating to the Affairs of Ireland, had been lately transmitted to parliament ; from whence it appeared to both houses, That the king, by the means of lord Herbert, had entered into a Negotiation with the Rebels in that kingdom, for bringing over 10,000 of them to his assistance, in reducing the parliament of England. This nobleman was the eldest son and heir apparent of the marquis of Worcester ; and though he is stiled in the Journals only lord Herbert, yet the king addressed his letters to him, in the lifetime of his father, as earl of Glamorgan ; which title he usually bore. In order to account how the houses got possession of Papers of such consequence, it will be necessary to remember, that in July the town of Sligo was taken by the English, and a garrison placed there. In October following the Irish endeavoured to retake it, but were defeated in that attempt, and drove back with great execution. Amongst the slain was the archbishop of Tuam, the rebels' president of Connaught, and one of their supreme council of Kilkenny, who attended their army at this time to visit his diocese, and to execute an order for the arrears of his Bishoprick. Amongst his baggage were found a bull of the Pope's, and several Letters between him and his agents from Rome, Paris, &c. with a copy of certain Articles of Agreement between the earl of Glamorgan and some of the chief rebels touching clergy-livings, together with the earl's Oath relating to it. These Papers were printed by order of parliament, and demand our notice; as the discovery and seizure of them gave occasion to many very remarkable Votes, Orders, and Messages. They were published under this title, 'The earl of Glamorgan's Negotiations and colourable Commitment in Ireland demonstrated; or the Irish Plot, &c.'

When the forementioned Negotiation came to be known, the earl of Glamorgan was committed to prison by the lord Digby, one of the principal secretaries of state, then in Ireland, who wrote the following account of it to secretary Nicholas:

"My good brother; You will receive by this dispatch a particular account, from my lord-lieutenant, of the state of the Treaty here, and of those conditions upon which he was hopeful suddenly to have concluded such a Peace as would have afforded his majesty powerful and timely aids from this kingdom, had not the unfortunate madness (for I can give it no other name) of my lord of Glamorgan, and the necessary proceedings thereupon, cast all things back into a posture as uncertain and more dangerous than ever. You will receive from my lord-lieutenant and the council here, a punctual relation of the matter of fact; and it is referred to me to convey unto you, and by you to his majesty, the circumstances and reasons of the whole proceedings against his lordship. About ten days since, matters of the Treaty growing near to a conclusion, and in confidence thereof preparations being made by my lord of Glamorgan and the Irish, as they assured us, for the speedy sending over of 3000 men for the relief of Chester, which were to be made up 10,000 before the beginning of March, it was thought necessary that we should confer with the said earl of Glamorgan and some of the Irish commissioners; to the end that, before my lord-lieutenant's final consent to the articles of the Treaty, the business of the king's supply might be reduced from discourse to a certainty, and directed in the most advantageous way for his service: to which end (we little suspecting then what was since discovered) the said earl of Glamorgan, and some of the Irish commissioners then at Kilkenny, were earnestly invited hither both by my lord-lieutenant and myself. Upon Monday last, the day before the said earl of Glamorgan was expected in town, my lord-lieutenant received out of the North, from an honest and well-affected person, the copy which is sent you of my lord of Glamorgan's Articles and Oath with the confederate Catholics, assured to have been found in the titular bishop of Tuam's pocket, killed in October last at Sligo. At first the thing appeared so impossible, that we were apt to think it a forgery and plot of the parliamentary rebels against the king; 'till considering the circumstances, formalities, and punctualities thereof, we grew to apprehend somewhat more in the matter; and, soon after, a second and third copy of the same coming to other persons, all with Letters to the effect of this inclosed, it was then thought high time to take the business into most serious consideration: which being done by my lord-lieutenant and myself, assisted by some of the wisest and best affected persons here, we soon concluded, That if these things were once published, and that they could be believed to be done by his majesty's authority, they could have no less fatal an effect than to make all men, so believing, conclude all the former scandals cast upon his majesty, of the inciting this Irish Rebellion, true: that he was a papist and designed to introduce popery, even by ways the most unkingly and perfidious; and consequently, that there would be a general revolt from him of all good Protestants with whom this opinion could take place. Now when we consider the circumstances convincing the truth of this transaction on my lord of Glamorgan's part, and how impossible almost it was for any man to be so mad as to enter into such an agreement, without powers from his majesty; and there being some kind of a formal authority vouched in the Articles themselves, we did also conclude, That probably the greatest part of the world, who had no other knowledge of his majesty than by outward appearances, would believe this to be true; and do according to that belief, unless his majesty were suddenly and eminently vindicated by those who might justly pretend to know him best. Upon this ground it was also concluded by us, That less than an arrest of the earl of Glamorgan, upon suspicion of high treason, could not be a vindication of his majesty eminent or loud enough; and that this part could not properly, nor effectually, be performed by any other person than myself, both in regard of my place and trusts near his majesty: That the business of Ireland had passed, for the most part, through my hands: That I attend his majesty about the time of the date of his majesty's pretended commission: That since that time I had, by his majesty's command, written to the Irish Commissioners a Letter, whereof I send you a copy, so diametrically opposite to the said earl's transactions: and, lastly, in regard that my lord-lieutenant, to whom otherwise his majesty's vindication in this kind might properly have belonged, was generally thought to be unworthily cozened and abused in the matter, in case there were any such secret authority given by his majesty to the earl of Glamorgan.—This being our unanimous judgment of what was fit to be done, and by whom, the only question then remaining was to the point of time; in which we were also of opinion, That if it were deferred till the business, growing publick otherwise, should begin to work its mischief, his majesty's vindication would lose much of its force, and be thought rather applied to the notoriety than the impiety of the thing; and rather to the pernicious effects, than to the detestable cause itself: notwithstanding, I must confess unto you, that the consideration of frustrating the supplies of 3000 men which were so confidently affirmed to be in readiness for the relief of Chester, in case the condition of that place could not bear the delay which this might occasion, wrought in us a very great suspension of judgment, whether the proceedings against my lord of Glamorgan should not be forborne till that so necessary supply were sent away. But the case being more strictly examined, we found, first, That, by the lord of Glamorgan's Oath, the forces were not to be hazarded till his majesty's performance of the said earl's conditions. And, 2dly, That the said Supply was never intended by my lord of Glamorgan and the Irish, till the Articles of Peace were consented to; which the lord-lieutenant durst in no wise do, without a preceding vindication of the king's honour, since this transaction of my lord of Glamorgan's was known unto him, and known to be known unto him, by those who wanted neither art nor malice to make use of it. So that, the necessary forbearance to conclude the Treaty frustrating as much the relief of Chester as the sudden and vigorous proceedings against my lord of Glamorgan could do, our resolutions did, in the end, determine upon that course; when, at the instant, to remove all objections, information was brought us, That the thing was already public throughout the town, and began to work such dangerous effects as, in truth, I do not believe that my lord-lieutenant, or one of the king's faithful servants, could have been many hours safe in the delay of this his majesty's and their vindication: which has now been so seasonably applied, as that it hath wrought here not only a general satisfaction in all moderate men, but even such a conversion in many less well-inclined, that whereas, before, a Peace with the Irish, even upon those unavoidable conditions upon which my lord-lieutenant must needs within few days have concluded it, would hardly have been published in this place without very much danger, men's minds are so secured and settled by this proceeding, as that I believe the Peace now would be embraced upon those, and perhaps upon harder terms, without much mutiny or repining. This being so, our chief remaining fear is, lest what has been done against my lord of Glamorgan should so far incense the Irish, as to drive them to sudden extremes; things here, on his majesty's part, being in so ill a condition to enter again upon a war. Unto this danger the best preventives we could think of are applied; this inclosed Letter, written to my lord of Muskerry by my lord-lieutenant; apt persons employed to Kilkenny, to acquaint them with the reasons, and necessities of this proceeding; and lastly, the Articles of Peace sent unto them, with my lord-lieutenant's assent, in the very terms proposed and acquiesced in by themselves in the last results of this long Treaty; which, in all probability, will have one of these two effects, either to make them conclude a Peace, notwithstanding this intervening accident, whereby Chester may be speedily relieved, and his majesty further supplied this spring; or make it break so foully on their side, as to divide from them the most considerable of their party. Whatever the event be, my lord-lieutenant and I shall comfort ourselves with this satisfaction, that we have done what belonged to men of honour, faithful to their king and to their religion, and as wisely as ours and our best friends understanding could direct us; leaving the rest to God Almighty, whom we beseech to direct his majesty to that course herein on his part, which may be correspondent to our faithful endeavours; and that he will bless them with as good effects upon the minds of all honest men towards his majesty's vindication in that kingdom, as I make no doubt but what we have done will have in this, when seconded and pursued by those further directions from his majesty, which I am sure his own wisdom and princely indignation to find his honour, conscience, and piety, thus infamously traduced, will dictate unto him, without further advice from Yours, GEORGE DIGBY. Dublin, Jan. 4, 1645. P. S. I believe you will be as much startled as I was, to find the Signet mentioned in my lord of Glamorgan's transactions; but it seems that was mistaken, and that he now pretends to some kind of authority under the king's pocket seal, which I certainly believe to be as false as I know the other."

"My dearest heart; I hope these will prevent any news which shall come unto you of me, since my commitment to the castle of Dublin; to which, I assure thee, I went as cheerfully and as willingly as they could wish, whosoever they were by whose means it was procured; and should as unwillingly go forth, were the gates both of the castle and town open unto me, until I were cleared, as they are willing to make me unserviceable to the king, and lay me aside, who have procured for me this restraint. When I consider thee a woman, as I think I know you are, I fear lest you should be apprehensive; but when I reflect that you are of the house of Thomond, and that you were once pleased to say these words unto me, 'That I should never, in tenderness of you, desist from doing what in honour I was obliged to do,' I grow confident that in this you will now shew your magnanimity; and, by it, the greatest testimony of affection that you can possibly afford me: and am also confident that you know me so well, that I need not to tell you how clear I am, and void of fear, the only effect of a good conscience; and that I am guilty of nothing that may testify one thought of disloyalty to his majesty, or what may stain the honour of the family I come of, or set a brand upon my future posterity. Courage, my heart! were I amongst the king's enemies you might fear; but being only a prisoner amongst his friends and faithful subjects, you need doubt nothing but that this cloud will be soon dissipated by the sunshine of the king my master; and did you but know how well and merry I am, you would be as little troubled as myself, who have nothing that can afflict me, but lest your apprehension might hurt you; especially since all this while I could get no opportunity of sending, nor yet by any certain probable means, but by my cousin Bruerton, Mr. Manning's our cousin Constable of the Castle, and my lord-lieutenant's leave: and I hope you and I shall live to acknowledge our obligation to them, there being nothing in this world that I desire more, than you should at least hear from me: and believe it sweet-heart, were I before the parliament in London, I could justify both the king and myself in what I have done: and so I pray acquaint my father, who, I know, is so cautious that he would hardly accept a Letter from me; but yet I presume humbly to ask his blessing, and as heartily I send mine to pretty Mall; and I hope this day or to-morrow will set a period to my business, to the shame of those who have been the occasioners of it. But I must needs say, from my lord-lieutenant and the privy-council here, I have received as much justice, nobleness, and favour, as I could possibly expect. The circumstances of these proceedings are too long to write unto you; but I am confident all will prove to my greater honour; and my right honourable accuser, my lord Digby, will be at last rectified, and confirmed in the good opinion which he is pleased to say he ever had of me hitherto, and as the greatest affliction he ever had, to do what his conscience enforced him to; and indeed did wrap up the bitter pill of the impeachment of suspicion of high treason in so good words, as that I swallowed it with the greatest ease in the world; and it hath hitherto had no other operation, than that it hath purged melancholy; for as I was not at the present any way dismayed, so have I not since been any way at all disheartened; so I pray let not any of my friends, that is there, believe any thing until ye have the perfect relation of it from myself. And this request I chiefly make unto you, to whom I remain a most faithful and most passionately devoted husband and servant, GLAMORGAN. Remember my service to my brother, my cousin Brown, and the rest of my good friends."

Many expressions in the foregoing Letters are of too much consequence to be abridged without injury; but, for brevity's sake, we have contented ourselves with an abstract of the other Papers, as being more matter of form; and this the rather because they are all printed at large in the Collections of the times.

"In the beginning of the earl of Glamorgan's Treaty he sets forth the authority granted him by the king, under his signature royal, to treat with the confederate Roman Catholics in Ireland, on such matters as the lord-lieutenant cannot at present be seen in, as not fit for his majesty at present to own publicly; wherefore he was to act with all possible secrecy: but whatever he engages for, the king promises, on the word of a king and a Christian, to ratify, Dated from Oxford, March 12, 1644."

VOL. III.

The following Articles were agreed upon, August 25, 1645, between the earl of Glamorgan, in behalf of his majesty and his successors, and the viscount Mountgarrer, lord president of the supreme council of the Confederate Catholics, and the other commissioners: "1. That the Roman Religion should be publicly exercised in Ireland. 2. That the Roman Catholics enjoy all the Churches they have possessed at any time since Oct. 23, 1641. 3. That they be exempt from the jurisdiction of the Protestant clergy, and not molested for the exercise of their jurisdiction over their Catholic flocks. 4. That an act be passed in Ireland to repeal all laws, and take off all incapacities and penalties, made against Roman Catholics; so that they not only enjoy the free exercise of their religion, but be capable of all public trusts. 5. That neither the marquis of Ormond, or any future lord-lieutenant, give them any disturbance. 6. The earl engages the king's royal word to confirm all these Articles. 7. The commissioners shall engage the public faith of the kingdom to send 10,000 men, under the earl, to serve his majesty."

Other Articles were also signed, wherein the earl of Glamorgan covenants, "That the Roman Catholic Clergy shall for ever hold all such lands, tenements, tythes, and hereditaments, by them respectively enjoyed within Ireland since Oct. 23, 1641; and all other lands and emoluments belonging to the clergy in that kingdom, other than such as are actually enjoyed by the Protestant clergy: and the lords Mountgarret and Muskerry, and the rest of the council, grant, on behalf of the confederate Catholics, that two parts in three of these emoluments granted to the clergy, be applied for 3 years to the use of the army in his majesty's service, and only one third part reserved for the use of the clergy. The like disposition to be renewed by the clergy, from 3 years to 3 years, during the war."

About the time also of the before-mentioned Battle of Sligo, John Baptist Rinuccini, the Pope's nuncio, and archbishop of Fermo, arrived in the river of Kilmare, in a frigate of 21 guns, with 26 Italians of his retinue, besides regular and secular priests; bringing, as was said, besides apostolical benedictions, some arms, ammunition, and Spanish gold. In acknowledgment whereof, the supreme Catholic Council made an address to the Pope, Jan. 7; rendering him "their humble thanks for sending them so illustrious a nuncio, whom they receive with the highest joy, especially informing them of his holiness's affection to them and their cause; hoping that, by the support of his benediction, counsel and assistance, the Catholic Religion may be restored in Ireland."

The King's Message in Vindication of himself; with farther Proposals of Peace.] Jan. 31. The King, in order to vindicate himself from so high a charge as seemed to arise against him from the foregoing Papers, sent another Message to the parliament, which was read in the house of lords this day; and in which were contained other Proposals for Peace, as follows :

For the SPEAKER of the House of Peers, pro tempore. To be communicated to the two Houses of Parliament at Westminster, and the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland.

" C. R. His majesty having received information, from the lord-lieutenant and council in Ireland, That the earl of Glamorgan hath, without his or their directions or privy, entered into a Treaty with some commissioners of the Roman Catholick party there, and also drawn up and agreed unto certain Articles with the said commissioners, highly derogatory to his majesty's honour and royal dignity, and most prejudicial unto the Protestant Religion and Church there in Ireland : whereupon the said earl of Glamorgan is arrested, upon suspicion of high treason, and imprisoned by the said lord-lieutenant and council, at the instance and by the impeachment of the lord Digby, who (by reason of his place and former employment in these affairs) doth best know how contrary that proceeding of the said earl hath been to his majesty's intentions and directions, and what great prejudice it might bring to his affairs, if those proceedings of the earl of Glamorgan should be any ways understood to have been done by the directions, liking, or approbation of his majesty : his majesty having, in his former Messages for a Personal Treaty, offered to give contentment to his two houses in the business of Ireland, hath now thought fitting, the better to shew his clear intentions, and to give satisfaction to his said houses of parliament and the rest of his subjects in all his kingdoms, to send this Declaration to his said houses, containing the whole truth of the business ; which is, That the earl of Glamorgan having made offer unto him to raise forces in the kingdom of Ireland, and to conduct them into England for his majesty's service, had a commission to that purpose, and to that purpose only : That he had no commission at all to treat of any thing else, without the privy and directions of the lord-lieutenant ; much less to capitulate any thing concerning religion, or any property belonging either to Church or Laity : That it clearly appears by the lord-lieutenant's proceedings with the said earl, that he had no notice at all of what the said earl had treated and pretended to have capitulated with the Irish, until, by accident, it came to his knowledge. And his majesty doth protest, That, until such time as he had advertisement that the person of the said earl of Glamorgan was arrested and restrained, as is abovesaid, he never heard, nor had any kind of notice, that the said earl had entered into any kind of Treaty or Capitulation with those Irish commissioners ; much less that he had concluded or signed those Articles so destructive both to Church and State, and so repugnant to his majesty's public professions, and known resolutions. And for the further vindication of his majesty's honour and integrity herein, he doth declare, That he is so far from considering any thing contained in those Papers or Writings framed by the said earl and those commissioners with whom he treated, as he doth absolutely disavow him therein ; and hath given commandment to the lord-lieutenant and the council there, to proceed against the said earl, as one who, either out of falsehood, presumption, or folly, hath so hazarded the blemishing of his majesty's reputation with his good subjects, and so impertinently framed those Articles of his own head, without the consent, privy, or directions of his majesty or the lord-lieutenant, or any of his majesty's council there. But true it is that, for the necessary preservation of his majesty's Protestant Subjects in Ireland, whose case was daily represented unto him to be so desperate, his majesty had given commission to the lord-lieutenant to treat and conclude such a Peace there as might be for the safety of the crown, the preservation of the Protestant Religion, and no way derogatory to his own honour and public professions.—But to the end that his majesty's real intentions in this business of Ireland may be the more clearly understood, and to give more ample satisfaction to both houses of parliament and the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, especially concerning his majesty's not being engaged in any peace or agreement there ; he doth desire, if the two houses shall resolve to admit of his majesty's repair to London for a Personal Treaty, as was formerly proposed, that speedy notice thereof be given to his majesty, and a pass or safe-conduct with a blank sent, for a messenger to be immediately dispatched into Ireland, to prevent any accident that may happen to hinder his majesty's resolution of leaving the managing of the business of Ireland wholly to the two houses, and to make no Peace there but with their consent ; which, in case it shall please God to bless his endeavours in the treaty with success, his majesty doth hereby engage himself to do.—And for a further explanation of his majesty's intentions in his former Messages, he doth now declare, That if his personal repair to London, as aforesaid, shall be admitted, and a Peace thereon shall ensue, he will then leave the nomination of the persons to be intrusted with the militia, wholly to his two houses ; with such power and limitations as are expressed in the Paper delivered by his majesty's commissioners at Uxbridge, the 6th Feb. 1644, for the term of 7 years, as hath been desired, to begin immediately after the conclusion of the Peace, the disbanding of all forces on both sides, and the dismantling of the garrisons erected since these present troubles ; so as, at the expiration of the time before-mentioned, the power of the Militia shall intirely revert and remain as before.—And, for their further security, his majesty (the peace succeeding) will be content that, pro hac vice, the two houses shall nominate the admiral, officers of state, and judges, to hold their places during life; or, quamdiu se bene gesserint, which shall be best liked, to be accountable to none but the king and the two houses of parliament.—As for matter of Religion; his majesty doth further declare that, by the liberty offered in his Message of the 15th present, for the ease of their consciences who will not communicate in the service already established by act of parliament in this kingdom, he intends that all other protestants, behaving themselves peaceably in and towards the civil government, shall have the free exercise of their religion according to their own way. And, for the total removing of all Fears and Jealousies, his majesty is willing to agree, That, upon the conclusion of Peace, there shall be a general act of oblivion and free Pardon passed by acts of parliament in both his kingdoms respectively. And, lest it should be imagined that, in the making these Propositions, his majesty's kingdom of Scotland and his subjects there have been forgotten or neglected, his majesty declares, That what is here mentioned touching the Militia, and the naming of officers of state and judges, shall likewise extend to his kingdom of Scotland. And now, his majesty having so fully and clearly expressed his intentions and desires of making a happy and well-grounded Peace, if any person shall decline that happiness by opposing of so apparent a way of attaining it, he will sufficiently demonstrate to all the world his intention and design can be no other than the total subversion and change of the antient and happy government of this kingdom, under which the English nation have so long flourished. Given at the Court at Oxon, 29th Jan. 1645."

There is a Memorandum entered in the Journals, of some Blots that were in the original Message of the king's, now read, and now particularly specified: however, it was ordered by the lords, as usual, to be communicated both to the commons and the Scots Commissioners; but with this declaration, That to prevent all misunderstanding, it was to be observed, 'That these Blots were in the King's Letter before it came to their lordships.'

This affair occasioned a Vote of both houses, for appointing the lord Lisle, eldest son of the earl of Leicester, and a member of the commons, to be lord lieutenant general of Ireland for one whole year; that all treaties with the rebels in that kingdom should be annulled; that the prosecution of the war against them should be managed by parliament; and that no governor be placed there but by their consent.

Complaints against the Scots Army.] This day, the lord Roberts reported the effect of a conference lately held with the house of commons, "That they, having received some Complaints out of the North concerning the Scots army, had thought fit to acquaint their lordships with the same. Accordingly, a Letter from the committee in Cumberland: another to major Cholmley, from the governor of Carlisle: a third from the committee at York: and a fourth from the committee residing with the army before Newark, were read. Which being done, the lord Roberts reported the following Votes made by the commons thereupon: 1. That in the Scots Army, in this kingdom, there shall not be above 2000 horse and 1000 dragoons, according to the Treaty. 2. That it be referred to the members of both houses, that are of the committee of both kingdoms, to communicate this Vote to the Scots Commissioners, and to take care that the same be observed accordingly." To both which the lords agreed.

Next the foregoing Order brought up from the commons was read: but it was resolved, upon the question, not to agree with them in that Order.

Resolutions of the Commons on the King's Letter, touching the Negotiations with the Irish Rebels, &c.] This day the commons took into consideration the King's Letter again, and came to the following Resolutions upon it: 1. "That the King's Letter hath given no satisfaction touching the lord Herbert's authority to negotiate with the rebels in Ireland. 2. That a copy of the privy-seal, and articles taken in the bishop of Tuam's carriages, shall be sent to the king; with the Answer to this last Letter. 3. That, to-morrow morning, the first business peremptorily, the king's last Letter shall be taken into further consideration; and that Mr. Speaker put the house in mind thereof." Accordingly,

Feb. 3. The commons made the following Orders and Resolutions thereupon: 1. "That it be left to the committee that shall be appointed to prepare an Answer to this Letter, to observe the contrarieties in this Letter to the King's former professions and proceedings, concerning Ireland; and to the Declaration he now holds forth, in this Letter, of leaving the war and peace of Ireland to the houses of parliament. 2. That the committee, in the Answer to this Letter, shall take notice of the king's avowing the granting a commission for raising and bringing over of rebels out of Ireland, to fight against the parliament of England. 3. That, in this Answer, the committee shall take notice both of the uncertainty of the clause concerning the Militia, and that it is conditional: and that, in Answer to it, the houses are sending a Proposition, which does fully express their own desires. 4. That, as to the clause of the General Officers and Judges, the Answer shall take notice, That, in due time, the houses will present such things unto his majesty as shall be convenient thereupon. 5. That this Letter of the King's gives no satisfaction in point of Religion. 6. That a committee be appointed to prepare a Declaration, upon this Letter and the other Letters of the King, for the undeceiving of the people."

Chester taken by the Parliament's Forces.]

Feb. 7. A day of Thanksgiving was appointed for the giving up the city of Chester to the forces of the parliament. All the ministers within the lines of communication, and ten miles round them, were ordered to have timely notice of this; to the end they might stir up the people to a due thankfulness both for the seas mableness and the greatness of the mercy.

£.2500 per Ann. settled on General Cromwell.] An Ordinance of parliament was this day read in the house of lords, and agreed to, for settling estates, to the value of 2500*l.* a year on Oliver Cromwell, esq. lieutenant-general of the horse, as an encouragement to him and others who shall discharge the like faithful services to the public.

State of the Navy.] Feb. 11. The earl of Warwick presented a List of Ships, belonging to the Navy of England, designed for the next Summer's expedition; which since it shews the great force the parliament were then masters of at sea, we subjoin as follows:

The Court of Wards abolished.] Feb. 24. A Vote of the house of commons was brought up to the lords for their concurrence, to take away the Court of Wards, an antient appendage of the crown; and this without asking the king's consent, although, in the reign of king James, the parliament had offered that monarch the sum of 100,000*l.* for it by way of purchase. This affair stands thus entered in the Lords Journals:

"A message was brought from the commons by sir H. Vane, jun. That, in this time of great distractions, wherein the lords and the commons, and the whole kingdom have ventured their lives and fortunes, for a recompence to the whole kingdom they have a right to take away a great burden; therefore have made a Vote, wherein the commons desire their lordships concurrence." The Vote was read as follows:

"That the Court of Wards and Liveries, and all wardships, liveries, primer-seisins and oustre les maines, and all other charges, incident or arising for or by reason of wardship, livery, primer-seisins, and oustre les maines, be from this day taken away: and that all tenures by homage, and all fines, licenses, seizures, and pardons for alienation, and all other charges incident thereunto, be likewise taken away: and that all tenures by knights service, either of his majesty or others, or by knights service or socage in capite of his majesty, be turned into free and common socage." Resolved, upon the question, nem. con. "That this house agrees to this Vote as it is now brought up from the house of commons."

Another Message from the King, Feb. 28, for Peace.] Another Message from the King was this day presented to the lords by their Speaker, which was read in these words:

For the SPEAKER of the House of PEERS pro tempore. To be communicated to the two Houses of Parliament at Westminster, and the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland.

"C. R. His majesty needs to make no excuse, though he sent no more Messages unto you; for he very well knows he ought not to do it, if he either stood upon punctilios of honour or his own private interest; the one being already called in question by his often sending; and the other assuredly prejudged if a Peace be concluded from that he hath already offered, he having therein departed from many of his undoubted rights: but nothing being equally dear unto him as the preservation of his people, his majesty passeth by many scruples, neglects and delays, and once more desires you to give him a speedy Answer to his last Message; for his majesty believes it doth very well become him, after this very long delay, at last to utter his impatience, since that the goods and blood of his subjects cry so much for Peace. Given at the Court at Oxford, the 26th Feb. 1645."

The Scots complain of some scandalous Aspersions on their Nation.] March 2. The Speaker acquainted the lords that a Letter was delivered him from the lord Warriston, one of the Scots Commissioners, which came from the parliament of Scotland, and was read as follows:

"St. Andrews, Feb. 10, 1645-6.

"Right Honourable, Being appointed by the parliament of this kingdom, now adjourned, to keep correspondence with the honourable houses of parliament of England; and being intrusted with the pursuance of their desires for the furtherance of the common cause, and the public and mutual good of both kingdoms; we do, in the name of the parliament, and by their authority, certify, That this kingdom, notwithstanding all their sufferings and discouragements, are not moved or shaken from their former resolutions and vows, but will live and die with their brethren of England, in the prosecution of the ends expressed in the Solemn League and Covenant: being confident of the like inclination and resolution of the parliament and kingdom of England against all such groundless suspicions and needless jealousies to the contrary, as bad instruments from the beginning to this day have been, from their envy of our common happiness, and for their own private ends, inventing; and suggesting that all the common troubles which both kingdoms have endured, may end in a public tragedy, to the scandal and grief of the reformed churches, the hardening and strengthening of our common enemies, the making of ourselves the instruments of our own mutual ruin and destruction; and, which is most of all, the dishonour of the great name of our God, with whom we have entered into covenant for the propagation of the gospel, and the advancement of the kingdom of his son. For the present, according to the trust committed unto us, we make our address to both houses in the particulars following, and do not doubt but we shall receive such satisfaction as may be a real testimony of their justice and brotherly kindness. Upon information from our commissioners there, the parliament, before their adjourning, did understand what was written by one calling himself Robert Wright, and informed by another whose name was kept in the dark, and confirmed by a Letter of Mr. Jermin's to the lord Digby, against this kingdom, their army in England, and their commissioners there. The accusations are of so high a nature, and so sophistically insinuated, that the parliament (who during their sitting were, upon all occasions, endeavouring the best ways of the preserving the happy conjunction of the two kingdoms) were much affected therewith, as a matter wherein they were much concerned, both for their own vindication and the satisfaction of their brethren. If there shall be any matter or ground of such accusation found against any person of this kingdom, or our army, or any of our commissioners, we are no less willing that it be examined and punished to the full, than we desire and expect that the like be done against any in England that transgress in that kind; which is conform to our Covenant, wherein we all swear, 'With all faithfulness to endeavour the discovery of all such as have been, or shall be, incendiaries, malignants, or evil instruments, by hindering the reformation of religion, dividing the king from his people, or any of the kingdoms from the other, that they may be brought to public trial and receive condign punishment as the degree of their offences shall require or deserve.' But let us desire and expect, from our brethren, all charity, tenderness, and respect, to this kingdom, our army and commissioners; of whose faithfulness they have had so large and manifold experience, and in their several Letters to this kingdom did give them so ample testimonies, that no aspersion or suspicions lie upon them by concealing the names of any persons who can be discovered. And therefore, according to the trust committed unto us, we do desire, in the name of the parliament and kingdom of Scotland, (if that Robert Wright be not yet found out who he is, and that hidden knight, after so long a time, be not yet unsecreted, and made known by name,) all means may be used for discovering the one, whose letters have been so frequently produced before the committee of both kingdoms; and revealing the other to our commissioners, which is in the power of some of the members of the house of commons to do; that both kingdoms may be satisfied when the truth is brought to light, and all such jealousies and misunderstandings prevented for the future. We do also represent to the honourable houses of parliament, that this kirk and kingdom is more scandalized and grieved in the matter of religion, which immediately concerneth God and his honour, than in any thing on earth touching themselves and their own name. A Directory for the worship of God is agreed upon in the Assembly, and authorized by both kingdoms and practised carefully by this church; but the Service-Book still retained in some places of England under the parliament's power, and the Directory very much slighted, and by some avowedly written against. Instead of the intended unity in religion, blasphemous errors, heresies, sects and schisms are increased and multiplied through the want of church-government. The National Assembly of this Kirk, in their Answer to the Declaration of the parliament of England, of the date July, 1642, profess, 'That themselves, and all the well-affected within the kingdom, are exceedingly grieved and made heavy, because the Reformation of Religion had moved so slowly, and suffered so great interruption.' And the lords and commons in parliament assembled, in their Reply, did profess, That the miserable estate of the church and kingdom was not able to endure any longer delay.' Like as, in their Declaration sent to the General Assembly, they profess, 'That they do not doubt but to settle such a Reformation of the Church, as should be most agreeable to God's word.' And, in the aforesaid Reply, they declare, 'That their purpose is to consult with godly and learned Divines, that they may settle such a government as may be most agreeable to God's most holy Word.' Some commissioners from this Kirk have attended the Assembly of Divines there, for the space of two years and a half; and, long ago, the Assembly have offered their advice to both houses, yet can we hear nothing of the settling of any government: but upon the contrary, of a real growth of all sects and errors, and of great endeavours for toleration thereof, which maketh us and this church and kingdom, who cannot understand where the difficulty and obstruction lieth, to wonder at so long a delay; wherein we are very much interested, not only in relation to the glory of God, our mutual League and Covenant, and the peace and happiness of that church and kingdom; but also in regard of the unity of religion amongst ourselves, and of the peace of this kingdom, which cannot be long preserved from so dangerous contagion; which would be more grievous and intolerable unto us, than all our troubles and sufferings have been: and therefore, from all these considerations, in the name of this kingdom and parliament, we do in all earnestness desire, That Church-Government may now at last without further delay, be settled according to the Covenant. We do in like manner press what hath been solicited by our commissioners for the space of 8 months past, That the Propositions for Peace, after so much debate and deliberation agreed upon unanimously by both kingdoms, the most material whereof have been fully treated upon at Uxbridge, may be forthwith sent to his majesty; wherein this kingdom is the more earnest, that they know not the cause why the sending of these Propositions is so long suspended: they long for the end of this unhappy war, by the happy settling of Religion and Peace; and so much the more, that they do perceive some would make use of the continuance of these wars, to raise and foment jealousies and differences betwixt these kingdoms, and to separate those whom God hath so strictly tied for so good ends, by so many bonds and relations; and we are confident will never suffer to be divided, but still continue them in a firm and blessed conjunction against all machinations of Satan and his instruments; which shall ever be the settled resolution and constant endeavour of Your lordships affectionate friend and humble servant, LONDON, Cancellarius, J. P. D. Com."

As soon as the lords had heard this Letter read, they resolved to send it to the commons, with this sense upon it; that the lords thought fit, for the keeping a good correspondency and union between the two kingdoms, that all possible means may be used for the discovery of Robert Wright and the unknown Knight, mentioned in the Letter; the other particulars the house would consider of in due time.

Ordinance for settling of Church Government.] March 14. The lords having agreed to the Ordinance for settling of Presbyterial Church-Government, the same was ordered to be forthwith printed. It is thus entered in the Journals:

AN ORDINANCE for keeping of scandalous Persons from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; the enabling of Congregations for the Choice of Elders; and supplying of Defects in former Ordinances and Directions of Parliament concerning Church-Government.

"The lords and commons, assembled in parliament, being very sensible of the great duty which lieth upon them to settle matters concerning Religion and the Worship of Almighty God; and having continually before their eyes the Covenant which they have so solemnly taken for the performance thereof, and the manifold motives and encouragements thereto which are given them from God himself, by a special hand of providence pouring forth daily mercies upon them; in discharge of their duty, and in pursuance of the said Covenant, and in thankfulness to God for all his mercies, having diligently applied themselves to that work of his house; by his grace and assistance they have made some progress therein, notwithstanding the exigency of other affairs, accompanied oftentimes with great and imminent dangers; and notwithstanding the great difficulty of the work itself, in divers respects, and particularly in the right jointing of what was to be settled with the laws and government of the kingdom; the want whereof hath caused much trouble in this and other states: yet, by the merciful assistance of God, having removed the Book of Common-Prayer, with all its unnecessary and burdensome ceremonies, and established the Directory in the room thereof; and having abolished the prelatical hierarchy by archbishops, bishops, and their dependants; and, instead thereof, laid the foundation of a presbyterial government in every congregation, with subordination to classical, provincial, and national assemblies, and of them all to the parliament; although it cannot be expected, that a present rule, in every particular, should be settled all at once; but that there will be need of supplements and additions, and haply also of alterations in some things, as experience shall bring to light the necessity thereof; yet were the fundamentals, and substantial parts of that government long since settled in persons by and over whom it was to be exercised; and the nature, extent, and respective subordination of their power was limited and defined: only, concerning the Administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, how all such persons as were guilty of notorious and scandalous offences might be suspended from it, some difficulty arising, not so much in the matter itself, as in the manner, how it should be done, and who should be the judges of the offence; the lords and commons having it always in their purpose and intention, and it being accordingly declared and resolved by them, That all sorts of notorious scandalous offenders should be suspended from the Sacrament; for the preventing of an indefinite and unlimited power in the elderships, they held it fit, for the present, that the particular cases of such scandalous offences should be specified and enumerated; with express declaration, That further provision should be made, by authority of parliament, for such cases as were left out of the said enumeration: which accordingly having since taken into their serious consideration, and having had several debates thereupon, as the difficulty of the matter required, which hath taken up much time; for the avoiding, as far as possible may be, all arbitrary power; and that all such cases wherein persons should be suspended from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper might be brought to the cognizance, and pass the judgment of the parliament, who were bound in justice, as well to take care that none be injuriously detained from that Ordinance, as to give power, whereby such may be kept away who are unfit to partake therein; and to the intent also that a full and speedy course may be settled to enable the several elderships to suspend all such offenders from the Lord's Supper, without having recourse to the parliament itself from all parts of the kingdom upon every such emergent case, which might prove troublesome and tedious, and give liberty to such notorious and scandalous offenders to communicate a long space in the said ordinance; and to the intent likewise, that all such cases coming first from the particular elderships may, after they have passed the judgment of parliament, return again to all the several elderships within the kingdom, to proceed upon them, from time to time, in like manner as in the cases enumerated: for the ends and purposes aforesaid, and also for supply of some defects in the former Ordinance and Directions of parliament, concerning the Choice of Elders and some other matters: I. Be it ordained, That there be forthwith a choice made of Elders throughout the kingdom of England, and dominion of Wales, in the respective parish-churches and chapels, according to such directions as have already passed both houses, bearing date Aug. 19th 1645, and since that time: and all classes, and parochial congregations, are respectively hereby authorized and required, forthwith effectually to proceed therein accordingly. II. That notice of the election of parochial and Congregational Elders, and of the time when it shall be, be given by the minister, in the public assembly, the next Lord's day but one before: and that, on that said Lord's day, a sermon be preached, preparatory to that weighty business. III. That such elections shall be made by the congregation, or the major part of them, then assembled, being such as have taken the National Covenant, and are not persons under age, nor servants that have no families. IV. That the tryers of Elections of Elders shall have power to receive, hear, and determine all exceptions brought in to them concerning undue elections; and, to that end, to call before them all such persons so elected, and accepting such election; and to send for such witnesses as shall be nominated unto them, by such persons as shall bring in such exceptions: and shall have power to examine, upon oath, both the persons bringing in such exceptions, and the said witnesses, concerning any undue proceedings in the manner of the said election, and concerning all matters of ignorance or scandal objected against the party elected, and expressed in any Ordinance of parliament to be a sufficient cause of suspension from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and of which any eldership, by any Ordinance of parliament, hath cognizance and jurisdiction, and that shall be proved to have been committed within one whole year before the exceptions exhibited: and that the persons, against whom the exceptions are taken, shall have like liberty to produce witnesses, to be examined in like manner on their behalf. V. That the treasurers shall have power to examine, Whether the Elders that are to be chosen, be so qualified, as is expressed in the Ordinance, or directions, which hath passed both houses. VI. That in case the election of any Elder of a congregation, upon just proof and examination, be found by the tryers appointed for that purpose to be unduly made; the said tryers may order such elder to be removed, and another to be chosen in his place. VII. That the chapels or places in the houses of the king, and his children, shall continue free for the exercise of divine duties, to be performed according to the Directory, and not otherwise. VIII. That the chapels or places in the house of peers of this realm shall have the like freedom. IX. That the Savoy parish shall be reckoned within the 11th classis of London. X. That the Chapel of the Rolls, the two Serjeants-Inns, and the four Inns of Court, shall be a province of themselves. That the Presbytery of the Chapel of the Rolls, the two

Serjeants-Inns, and the four Inns of Court, shall be divided into two classes. That Lincoln's-Inn, Grey's-Inn, Serjeants-Inn in Chancery-Lane, and the Rolls, shall be one classis: that the two Temples, and Serjeants-Inn in Fleet-Street, shall be the other classis. XI. That the Classical Assemblies in each province shall assemble themselves within one month after they shall be constituted, and this Ordinance published; and shall thenceforth hold their meetings monthly by adjournment, or oftener, if need be, in such a certain place, as shall be most convenient for the ease of the people. XII. That, out of every Congregational Eldership, there shall be two elders, or more, not exceeding the number of four, and one minister, sent to every Classis. XIII. That all persons, guilty of notorious and scandalous offences, and more particularly all renouncers of the true Protestant Religion, professed in the church of England; and all persons that shall, by preaching or writing, maintain any such errors as do subvert any of those articles, the ignorance whereof do render any person excluded from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and all persons that shall make any images or pictures of the Trinity, or of any person thereof; and all persons in whom malice appears, and they refuse to be reconciled; and the same appearing upon just proof; all such persons may be suspended from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. XIV. That, in every province, persons shall be chosen by the houses of parliament, that shall be commissioners to judge of scandalous offences (not enumerated in any Ordinance of parliament) to them presented: and that the Eldership of that Congregation, where the said offence was committed, shall, upon examination and proof of such scandalous offence (in like manner as is to be done in the offences enumerated) certify the same to the commissioners, together with the proof taken before them: and, before the said certificate, the party accused shall have liberty to make such defence as he shall think fit before the said Eldership, and also before the commissioners, before any certificate shall be made to the parliament; and if the said commissioners, after examination of all parties, shall determine the offence, so presented and proved, to be scandalous, and the same shall certify to the congregation; the eldership thereof may suspend such person from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, in like manner as in cases enumerated in any Ordinance of parliament. XV. That such persons as shall be chosen for commissioners to judge of notorious and scandalous offences as aforesaid, shall be men of good understanding in matters of religion, sound in the faith, prudent, discreet, grave, and of unblameable conversation, and such as do usually receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as members of a Presbyterian congregation. XVI. That if any person shall commit any scandalous offence (not enumerated in any Ordinance of parliament) upon the day of the administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, in the face of the congregation, after it is assembled, the minister of that congregation may forbear to administer the sacrament to such a person for that time, and he shall, within 8 days after, certify the said offence and forbearance unto the commissioners aforesaid: and, upon certificate so made, the said commissioners shall proceed thereupon, as in other cases not enumerated; and shall make certificate of the case or cases, with their opinions, to both houses of parliament, with all speed: and, thereupon, the parliament shall proceed to a final determination of the case; and send the same determination thereof to the parish where such offence shall have been committed: and, as often as the like case shall fall out in any congregation, the eldership thereof, having notice of such determination, shall proceed thereupon, as in case of offences enumerated in any Ordinance of parliament. XVII. That the said commissioners (upon notice given to them, or any two of them, of any case of scandal befallen, whereof they ought to have cognizance by virtue of any Ordinance of parliament) shall assemble themselves in such certain place, within that province, as may be most convenient for the ease of the people; and thereof shall give timely notice to the ministers of that province, whereof they are commissioners; and, being met, shall adjourn their meeting, from time to time, for such time as the case shall require. XVIII. That the Eldership of each congregation, or the major part of them, as also the classis of each province, or major part of them, and also the provincial commissioners, or major part of them, after they shall be assembled, shall have power, by warrant under their hands, in all cases whereof they have cognizance, by any Ordinance of parliament, to convent before them all persons, against whom any complaint shall be brought by virtue of any such Ordinance; and all such witnesses as shall be named, according to any such Ordinance, for the discovery of the truth of any such complaint: and, in case any such person shall refuse to appear, not being a peer of this realm, member of the house of commons, or assistant of the house of peers, or officer of the house of parliament, then, upon complaint made to the next justice of the peace, the party refusing shall be brought before him; and, in case of obstinate persisting, shall be committed by the said justice of peace, till he submit to order. XIX. That if any member of a congregation shall, by virtue of any Ordinance of parliament, for any Offence of Scandal, be suspended from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and, being so suspended, shall offer himself to any other congregation to receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper together with them; such congregation, having notice of such suspension, shall not, without certificate from the Congregation whereof he is a member, admit him unto the Sacrament. XX. That any minister of a congregation may be suspended from giving or receiving, and any Elder from receiving the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, for the same causes, and in the same manner, and have like benefits of appeal, as any other person may by any Ordinance of parliament: and, after such suspension of the Elder from the sacrament, the Elder, so suspended, shall not execute that office during his suspension, until the appeal be determined: and if, upon the appeal, the suspension appear to have been just, then another to be chosen in his place.

XXI. That, in all cases of appeal to the Classical, Provincial, or National Assembly, they shall have power respectively to proceed thereupon by examination of witnesses, and otherwise, in such manner as the Congregational Eldership, from which the appeal ariseth, are enabled to do by any Ordinance of parliament; and shall certify such their proceedings unto the said eldership. XXII. That, in case of such suspension of any minister, the classis whereunto the said congregation doth belong, shall appoint some fit person or persons for the supply of that place during such suspension; and shall have power to allow convenient Maintenance for that end, out of the Profits belonging to the Minister so suspended: and have hereby power to sequester and employ the same for that purpose. XXIII. That in all cases of suspension of any person from the Sacrament, the party suspended (upon manifestation of his or her repentance, before the Eldership by whom the party was suspended) shall be admitted again unto the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and the suspension thenceforth shall be void. Provided, That if the said commissioners, or any two of them, shall not determine the case so certified, as aforesaid, to them from the Eldership, within six weeks after the certificate to them made; the party is hereby enjoined to forbear coming to the sacrament, until the cause shall be determined, or until he give satisfaction to the eldership."

The Parliament resolve to invite the Prince of Wales into their Quarters.] About this time it was that the commons came to a resolution to invite the prince of Wales into the parliament's Quarters, and to reside in such place, with such council and attendance as both houses should think fit to appoint. The lords having agreed to this, a committee of both houses was appointed to prepare a Letter, to be sent to the general, and in it another of invitation to the Prince. It seems the commons had been informed, That his highness was got into the Isle of Scilly, and were in great pain lest he should transport himself from thence into foreign parts. This committee having presented a draught of a Letter to be sent to the Prince, the lords agreed to it, and ordered it to the commons for their concurrence. There is not a copy of this Letter entered in either of the Journals; but it seems it did not please the lower house; for, on the reading of it, the question was put, Whether to agree with the lords in the Letter to be sent to the Prince? the house divided, Yeas 52, Noes 84; The question thus passing in the negative, another committee of their own house alone was then appointed to meet that afternoon, and prepare a Letter to be sent to the Prince, according the Vote of both houses, to invite him into the parliament's quarters: but though the lords sent down a message to urge them to send this Letter away, because they said it might prevent great inconveniences, yet we hear no more of it for some days.

Defeat of the King's Army at Stow, in Gloucestershire.] March 23. A Letter was read in the house of lords, giving an account of the parliament's successes in different parts of the kingdom; particularly, from the West of England, where sir T. Fairfax had reduced the lord Hopton, and the forces under his command, to so low a state, that they were obliged to surrender themselves on the best terms they could get.—This day came Letters from others of the parliament's commanders, with an account of a signal Victory gained over the king's forces, near Stow on the Wold, in Gloucestershire, wherein sir Jacob Astley, the king's general, was taken prisoner. This last Victory produced the following Order; "Ordered by the lords and commons in parliament assembled, That on Thursday se'nnight and Thursday 3 weeks, being the days appointed to be set apart for days of publick Thanksgivings in the cities of London and Westminster, and in the other parts of the kingdom, for the success of the army in the West under the command of sir T. Fairfax, general, That the several ministers do, on the said days, take particular notice of the blessing of God upon the forces of the parliament in taking sir Jacob Astley prisoner, and totally routing and defeating the forces under his command, near Stow in the county of Gloucester."

Letter of Congratulation sent to sir T. Fairfax on his late Successes.] For the last mentioned defeat of the lord Hopton in the West, and all the other great services general Fairfax had done the parliament, the houses joined in the following Letter of Thanks to him; which was ordered to be entered in their Journals, in perpetuam rei memoriam:

To the Rt. Hon. Sir T. FAIRFAX, General of the Forces under the Command of the Parliament.

"Sir; We are commanded, by both houses of parliament, to express the great sense they have of your active, vigorous, and faithful discharge of that trust which they have reposed in you. They do observe how happily you have timed, and how prudently you have carried on, all your designs and actions; and do very much approve your judgment in the way of gaining the enemies army and the county of Cornwall under your power in so short a space, and with so little loss of English blood; which, added to your former endeavours and successes, hath put the affairs of the parliament, in this beginning of the year, into such a condition as was beyond their hopes and expectations, for which we are commanded to return you their hearty thanks: and as they are resolved to give ample testimony to the world of the high esteem they have of your person and merit, so they desire you to let all the officers and soldiers under your command to know they shall not forget their unwearied labours and sufferances in this great and glorious cause. We rest, &c. Your very loving friends, MANCHESTER, Speaker of the House of Peers pro tempore. W. LENTHALL, Speaker of the Commons House in Parliament."

Message from the King, March 23, offering to disband his Forces, and return to the Parliament.] March 24. Another Message from the King was presented this day to the lords, by their Speaker, and read, as follows:

For the SPEAKER of the House of PEERS pro tempore. To be communicated to the two Houses of Parliament at Westminster.

"C. R. Notwithstanding the unexpected silence instead of Answer to his majesty's many and gracious Messages to both houses, whereby it may appear that they desire to obtain their ends by force rather than treaty, which may justly discourage his majesty from any more overtures of that kind; yet his majesty conceives he shall be much wanting to his duty to God, and in what he oweth to the safety of his people, if he should not intend to prevent the great inconveniences that may otherwise hinder a safe and well-grounded Peace. His majesty therefore now proposeth that (so he may have the faith of both houses of parliament for the preservation of his honour, person, and estate, and that liberty be given to all those who do and have adhered to his majesty, to go to their own houses, and there to live peaceably, enjoying their estates, all sequestrations being taken off, without being compelled to take any oath not enjoined by the undoubted laws of the kingdom, or being put to any other molestation whatsoever) he will immediately disband all his forces and dismantle all his garrisons; and being accompanied with his royal, not his martial, attendance, return to his two houses of parliament, and there reside with them. And, for the better security of all his majesty's subjects, he proposeth that he, with his said two houses immediately upon his coming to Westminster, will pass an act of oblivion and free pardon; and where his majesty will further do whatsoever they will advise him for the good and peace of this kingdom. And as for the kingdom of Scotland, his majesty hath made no mention of it here, in regard of the great loss of time which must now be spent in expecting an Answer from thence; but declares that, immediately upon his coming to Westminster, he will apply himself to give them all satisfaction touching that kingdom. If his majesty could possibly doubt the success of this offer, he could use many arguments to persuade them to it; but shall only insist on that great one of giving an instant Peace to these afflicted kingdoms. Given at our court at Oxford, the 23d of March, 1645."

The lords sent this Letter down to the commons, with a desire that it might be communicated to the Scots commissioners; and, as there were divers particulars in it, whereof, they said, an happy use might be made, conducing to the peace of the three kingdoms, they desired that a committee of both houses might be appointed to consider of the Letter, to frame an Answer, and to send it, by the joint consent of all, both English and Scots, to his majesty.

Letter from both Houses to the Prince of Wales.] March 30. Both houses agreed on the form of a Letter to be sent to the Prince of Wales; which was in hæc verba:

"Sir, The lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, being informed that your highness is lately removed into the Isle of Scilly, have commanded us in their names, to invite you to come forthwith into their quarters; and to reside in such place, and with such council and attendants about you, as the two houses shall think fit to appoint. This being all we have in charge, we take leave to rest Your highness's humble servants, MANCHESTER, Speaker of the House of Peers pro tempore. Wm. LENTHALL, Speaker of the Commons House in Parliament."

Orders, in case of the King's coming to London.] March 31. The following Vote of the house of commons was sent up to the lords for their concurrence, "That in case the king, contrary to the advice of the houses of parliament already given him, should come, or attempt to come, within the lines of communication; that then the committee of the Militia of London shall have power, and are hereby enjoined, upon advice had with the committee of the lords and commons for the army, to raise such forces as they shall think necessary to prevent any tumult that may arise by his coming; to suppress any that shall happen; to apprehend and secure such as shall come with him; to prevent resort to him, and to secure his person." This the lords agreed to with the addition of the words 'from danger.'

The Parliament's Answer to the King's last Message.] April 1. The Answer to the King's last Message being at length agreed to by both houses and the Scots commissioners, it was ordered to be sent, under cover, to sir Thomas Glemham, governor of Oxford, where the king yet was, by a trumpeter. This Answer ran in these words:

"May it please your majesty; We your humble and loyal subjects of both kingdoms, having received your Letter of the 23d inst. do humbly return this Answer, That until satisfaction and security be given to both your kingdoms, and for the reasons mentioned in our Answer to your former Letters, your majesty's coming here cannot be for your own good nor your kingdoms, nor by us admitted: but your majesty's assent unto the Propositions, which we intend speedily to present, will be the effectual means to give the satisfaction and security we desire."

Ordinance for banishing all Papists, &c. from London.] April 3. An Ordinance was agreed to, by both houses, for banishing all Papists from the cities of London and Westminster, and all other places within the lines of communication; together with all officers, soldiers of fortune, and other persons, who have borne arms against the parliament, in 3 days time. If, after that, they were seen within the said limits, they were to be declared spies, and to suffer, by martial-law, accordingly. This precaution was taken to prevent any tumults which might happen, if the king came to London; for notwithstanding the parliament's positive refusal, in their last Letter to him, they were in great apprehensions of a visit from his majesty.

Further Orders, in expectation of the King's coming to London.] April 6. As a farther proof that the parliament expected a sudden visit from the king, the earl of Northumberland, this day, presented to the lords a copy of some Orders made by the Committee of the army, for the City Militia to act by, in case such an accident should happen. The principal of which were these, viz. "That if the king should come up to any of the guards, the commanding officer there should, with such force as might be procured, conduct his majesty to St. James's House; and place a guard there to secure his person from danger, and prevent any resort unto him, until both houses were made acquainted therewith. That the said officer on guard should apprehend and secure such persons as come along with the king, and put them into such prisons and places as the committee for the Militia should think fit, till the houses give further orders. That the said officer should take care to prevent any persons from resorting to the king; and in case any should endeavour, in a forcible manner, to have access to him, that then he shall apprehend and secure them till further orders. And, in case of resistance in any of the cases aforesaid, that the officers and soldiers should, by force of arms, according to the course of war, observe these directions, in pursuance of the Ordinance of parliament." Upon this occasion the Committee for the Militia were ordered to strengthen their guards both within and without the lines, and employ only such men as, for their fidelity and abilities, they could confide in.

A Conference on occasion of some Papers of the Scot's Commissioners being printed.] April 15. The Report of a Conference between the two houses was made to the lords, by their Speaker, to this purpose: "That the occasion of the Conference was concerning a printed Book, intitled, 'Some Papers of the Commissioners of Scotland, &c.' wherein were found some things both scandalous and false; and that the commons had made the following Vote upon it, in which they desired their lordships concurrence: Resolved, by the and commons assembled in parliament, That the Book intitled, 'Some Papers of the Commissioners of Scotland, given in lately to the Houses of Parliament, concerning the Propositions of Peace, printed for Robert Bostock, dwelling at the Sign of the King's Head, in Paul's Church-Yard, April 11, 1646,' doth contain in it matters scandalous and false; and they do thereupon order that it be forthwith burnt by the hands of the common hangman; and do declare, that the author and publisher thereof is an incendiary between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland.' This Vote being read, the Speaker said, "That the commons had already made some inquiry into the business, and had examined Bostock, the printer, who he had the copy of the Book from; who at first denied, but afterwards confessed that he had it from the clerk to the Scots Commissioners. The commons said he was not asked any thing concerning the Scots Commissioners, nor did they intend it; but that it was a free and voluntary confession of Bostock. That the commons said further at this conference, That there was, in the Preface to this Book, an endeavour, by intimation, to draw the people from the parliament. And because they would not settle the government of the Church in the way some desire, therefore they would settle none. And because the parliament would not settle the Militia of this kingdom also, as some desired, it therefore appeared that the houses of parliament would have no Peace, and did intend to alter the government of the kingdom. Lastly, the commons were of opinion, That unless some Declaration be speedily published to vindicate the parliament from these scandals, there may be much prejudice come to their proceedings: therefore the commons intended speedily to publish a Declaration, That it is the intent of parliament to settle Church-Government as near as they can to the Word of God; and that they do not intend to alter the government of the kingdom; but because this would require some time, they thought fit, for the present, to make this Vote, wherein they desired their lordships concurrence."

Then the Book was read to the lords, and it was ordered that this business should be taken into consideration the next morning. But, notwithstanding this Order, the affair was not entered into that day by the lords, though a message came up to them, from the commons, to desire their lordships to expedite their concurrence to the Vote about the Book; because nothing being yet done in it, the contriver and framer was run away, and they knew not how to proceed against him.

April 17. The lords resumed the affair, and, a long debate arising, several divisions, on questions, were made; as, Whether the Vote of the commons, on the book, should be put as it was brought up from them, or divided into parts? And it was carried for the former. Then the whole Vote of the Commons being read, another question was put, Whether to agree with the commons in this Vote? The numbers being equal, nothing was concluded on this day. But on the next day, some alterations and amendments were proposed to be made in the Vote; and they being read, the question was put, Whether to pass the Vote which came from the commons with these alterations, &c. it was carried in the affirmative, and this Resolution was ordered to be sent down to them.

The commons afterwards agreed to these Alterations of the lords; and then the substance of the Vote ran thus: "Be it ordained, &c. That the Epistles and the Tract intitled 'The State of the Question, &c.' in the Book intitled, 'Some Papers, &c.' do contain in them matters scandalous and false; and they do thereupon ordain, That only the said Epistle and Tract, being the Preface to the said Book, be forthwith burnt by the hands of the common hangman. And do further declare and ordain, That the author is a person highly disaffected to the parliament of England, and hath endeavoured to raise sedition against it and the kingdom; and that the matter be put into a way of examination to find out the author, and to enjoin all persons whatsoever to discover him."

Mr. Whitlocke writes, 'That it was not without some ground of suspicion that some of the Scots commissioners themselves encouraged, if not appointed, the printing of this book, which made others more sharp against it.'

Declaration of the Commons upon that Occasion.] This day the Commons agreed to the following Declaration in Answer to the said Papers: 4000 copies were ordered to be printed for the use of the parliament, and that the knights and burgesses of the several counties do take care they be forthwith sent down and published in the respective counties and places for which they serve; that fewer than 100 be not sent to one county, and as many more as shall be necessary; and that they be set up and fixed in every parish-church by the church-wardens.

A DECLARATION of the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, of their true Intentions concerning the antient and Fundamental Government of the Kingdom; the Government of the Church; the present Peace; securing the People against all arbitrary Government; and maintaining a right Understanding between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, according to the Covenant and Treaties.

"We the commons, in parliament assembled, well remembering that, in the beginning of this war, divers Protestations, Declarations, and Suggestions were spread abroad by the king, and those that did adhere unto him; whereby our sincere intentions for the public good were misrepresented, and the minds of many possessed with a belief that our resolutions and proceedings were grounded upon needless fears and jealousies; and that there was no necessary and just cause of the present war; the untruth and deceitfulness whereof, by the good hand of God, miraculously discovering the secrets of our enemies, disposing and blessing our affairs, time and experience have since fully manifested, to the undeceiving of those that were seduced thereby; which mistakes of the people, by this artifice and cunning of the enemy, for some time much blemished the justice of this cause, and not only prolonged the war, but hazarded the success thereof; and if the enemy, by these means, had prevailed, how dangerous the consequences would have been is most apparent: And now observing, that (when it hath pleased God so to bless our endeavours and the actions of our forces and armies, as that the enemy is in despair to accomplish his designs by war, and we are brought into good hopes of attaining and enjoying that which, with so much expence of blood and treasure, we have contended for) there are still the same spirits stirring, and humours working, as in the beginning, though under other disguises, and upon other grounds; putting false constructions as well upon what hath already passed the houses, us upon the things under present debate; and misrepresenting our intentions in the use we desire to make of this great success which God hath given us, and the happy opportunity to settle truth and peace in the three kingdoms; not ceasing, as well in print as otherwise, to beget a belief that we now desire to exceed or swerve from our first aims and principles in the undertaking this war, and to recede from the Solemn League and Covenant, and Treaties between the two kingdoms; and that we would prolong the uncomfortable troubles and bleeding distractions, in order to alter the fundamental constitution and frame of this kingdom; to leave all government in the church loose and unsettled, and ourselves to exercise the same arbitrary power over the persons and estates of the subjects, which this present parliament hath thought fit to abolish, by taking away the Star-Chamber, High Commission, and other arbitrary courts, and the exorbitant power of the Council-Table:—All which being seriously considered by us, although our actions and proceedings from time to time, since the beginning of this parliament, and particularly in the managing this great cause, are the best demonstrations of our sincerity and faithfulness to the public; yet foreseeing that, if credit be given to such dangerous insinuations and false surmises, the same will not only continue the present calamities, and involve us into new and unexpected imbroilments, but likewise inevitably endanger the happy issue and success of our endeavours, which, by God's blessing, we may otherwise hope for:—We do declare, That our true and real intentions are, and our endeavours shall be, to settle Religion in the purity thereof, according to the Covenant; to maintain the antient and fundamental government of this kingdom; to preserve the rights and liberties of the subject ; to lay hold on the first opportunity of procuring a safe and well-grounded Peace in the three kingdoms, and to keep a good understanding between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, according to the grounds expressed in the Solemn League and Covenant, and Treaties ; which we desire may be inviolably observed on both parts.—And, lest these generals should not give a sufficient satisfaction, we have thought fit, to the end men may be no longer abused into a misbelief of our intentions, or a misunderstanding of our actions, to make this further enlargement upon the particulars:—And, first, concerning Church-Government : We having so fully declared for a Presbyterial Government, having spent so much time, taken so much pains for the settlement of it, passed most of the particulars brought to us from the Assembly of Divines, (called only to advise of such things as shall be required of them by both or either of the houses of parliament) without any material alteration, saving in the point of commissioners ; and having published several Ordinances for putting the same in execution, because we cannot consent to the granting of an arbitrary and unlimited power and jurisdiction to near ten thousand judicatories to be erected within this kingdom ; and this demanded in such a way as is not consistent with the fundamental laws and government of the same ; and, by necessary consequence, excluding the power of the parliament of England in the exercise of that jurisdiction, and whereof we have received no satisfaction in point of conscience or prudence ; nor have we yet resolved how a due regard may be had, that tender consciences, which differ not in fundamentals of religion, may be so provided for, as may stand with the Word of God, and the Peace of the kingdom.—It must therefore seem very strange to us, if any sober and modest man should entertain a thought that we should settle no government in the church, when our unwillingness to subject ourselves and the people of this land to this vast power, hath been a great cause that the government hath not been so long since established : and we desire it may be observed, That we have had the more reason, by no means to part with this power out of the hands of the civil magistrate, since the experience of all ages will manifest, That the reformation and purity of religion, and the preservation and protection of the people of God in this kingdom, hath, under God, been by the parliament, and their exercise of this power : and our full resolutions still are, sincerely, really, and constantly, through the grace of God, to endeavour the reformation of Religion in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government according to the Word of God, and the example of the best Reformed Churches, and according to our Covenant. Whence it may appear to all men, what those rumours and aspersions, whereby the minds of men are so disturbed for want of the present settling of Church-Government, are to be applied to those who (having a sufficient power and direction from the houses on that behalf) have not as yet put the same in execution. And whereas a safe and good Peace is the right end of a just War ; there is nothing we have more earnestly desired, nor more constantly laboured after ; and to that purpose, both houses have framed several Propositions to be sent to the king, such as they hold necessary for the present and future safety and good of this kingdom ; some of which are transmitted from both houses to our brethren of Scotland, where they now remain ; whose consent, that they may speedily be sent to the king, we shall not doubt to obtain, since the parliament of England is and ought to be sole and proper judge of what may be for the good of this kingdom ; the same liberty having been always by us admitted to the kingdom of Scotland in all things that concern that kingdom ; wherein we are so far from altering the fundamental constitution and government of this kingdom, by king, lords, and commons, that we have only desired That with the consent of the king, such powers may be settled in the two houses, without which we can have no assurance but that the like, or greater, mischiefs than these which God hath hitherto delivered us from, may break out again, and engage us in a second and more destructive war. Whereby it plainly appears our intentions are not to change the antient frame of government within this kingdom, but to obtain the end of the primitive institution of all government, the safety and weal of the people ; not judging it wise or safe, after so bitter experience of the bloody consequences of a pretended power of the Militia in the king, to leave any colourable authority in the same for the future attempts of introducing an arbitrary government over this nation, and protecting delinquents, enemies of our religion and liberties, by force, from the justice of the parliament ; the first and chiefest grounds of the parliament's taking up arms in this cause. And although the necessity of war hath given some disturbance to legal proceedings ; stopped the usual course of justice ; enforced the parliament, for the preservation of this state, to impose and require many great and unusual payments from the good subjects of this kingdom ; and to take extraordinary ways for procuring of monies for their many pressing occasions : it having pleased God to reduce our affairs into a more hopeful condition than heretofore, we do declare, That we will not, nor any one, by colour of authority derived from us, shall interrupt the ordinary course of justice in the several courts and judicatories of this kingdom, nor intermeddle in cases of private interest otherwise determinable ; unless it be of male-administration of justice, wherein we shall see and provide, that right be done, and punishment inflicted as there shall be occasion, according to the laws of the kingdom, and the trust reposed in us. And as both houses have already, for the ease and benefit of the people, taken away the Court of Wards and Liveries, with all Tenures in Capite, and by Knight's Service, so we will take especial care, that as speedy and as great ease may be had in future levies of money, by reducing of garrisons, and otherwise, as the pressing occasions of the kingdom can possibly admit; and will provide, by bringing delinquents to due punishment, who have unnaturally fomented and maintained this present war against the parliament and kingdom; that there may be a fair possibility of satisfying the disbursements, clearing the engagements, and repairing the losses of those who have faithfully and chearfully laid out themselves, and suffered for the public service; unless, by too great credulity given to false suggestions, we be disabled from effecting what we desire. Lastly, Whereas both nations have entered into a Solemn League and Covenant, and Treaties have been made and concluded between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, we have had an especial regard of the Treaties; and have not, to our best judgments, failed of the performance of any thing which was on our part to be performed. And for the Covenant, we have been, and ever shall be, very careful duly to observe the same; that as nothing hath been done, so nothing shall be done, by us, repugnant to the true meaning and intention thereof; and do presume that no interpretation of it (so far as it concerns the kingdom of England) shall, by any, be endeavoured to be imposed on us than we ourselves do know to be suitable to the first just ends for which it was agreed; and we do expect, That the people of England should not receive impressions of any forced constructions of that Covenant: which, in case of any doubt arising, is only to be expounded by them by whose authority it was established in this kingdom, who will not depart from those grounds and principles upon which it was framed and founded."

The foregoing Declaration was not passed without great opposition, every clause being resolved by question. On one division the numbers for it were 67 against 41; on another, 71 against 43. And the commons were in so great haste to communicate it to the nation, that it was printed and published the very next day after it had passed their house, without so much as asking the concurrence of the lords.

A Petition to the Commons from the Assembly of Divines, declared a Breach of Privilege. April 21. In the commons Journals of this day we meet with an affair, which must have given great disgust to the Presbyterian party. But before we enter into farther particulars, it is necessary to observe, That, on 23d of March last, the Assembly of Divines, then sitting at Westminster, had presented a Petition to the Commons, in relation to some clauses of an Ordinance lately passed, which they apprehended to be an encroachment of the laity upon their spiritual jurisdiction. But general Ludlow* speaking of this kind of Petitions, calls it 'An attempt to sacrifice all our civil liberties to the ambition of the Presbyterian clergy; and to vest them with a power as great or greater than that which had been declared intolerable in the bishops before.' However, on the 11th of April, this affair was taken into farther consideration by the commons; when the majority were so far from being of the same opinion with the petitioners, that they voted the Petition to be a Breach of the Privilege of Parliament: but upon this there were two divisions. On the previous question, 106 against 85; and, on the main question, 88 against 76. The tellers for the majority, sir John Evelyn of Wilts, and sir Arthur Haslerig; for the minority, Mr. Hollis and sir Philip Stapylton. The Petition is not entered in the Journals; but, this day, the business was resumed and the following Paper was voted, clause by clause;

A NARRATIVE of the Matter of Fact concerning the Breach of the Privilege of Parliament by the PETITION of the Assembly of Divines.

"The parliament, by the fundamental laws and constitutions of this kingdom, hath this great privilege, to be the supreme judicatory; and hath jurisdiction in all causes, spiritual and temporal, and to delegate so much of this power as they think fit: and, when they have declared their judgments, and given their directions in a law, the same is binding to all persons of this kingdom, of what quality soever. The Assembly of Divines, called by Ordinance of parliament, are authorized and enjoined by the said Ordinance, from time to time, during this present parliament, or until further order be taken by both the said houses, to treat of such matters therein mentioned, as shall be proposed unto them, from time to time, by both or either of the houses of parliament, and no other; and to deliver their opinions and advices, of or touching the matters aforesaid, as shall be most agreeable to the Word of God, to both or either of the said houses of parliament, from time to time, in such manner and sort as by both or either of the said houses shall be required; with a prohibition, that they do not assume to exercise any jurisdiction, power, or authority, ecclesiastical whatsoever, or any other power, than what in the said Ordinance is particularly expressed.—The Assembly are further authorized, by Ordinance of parliament, 12th Oct. 1643, to treat among themselves of such a Discipline and Government as may be most agreeable to God's holy Word, and most apt to procure and preserve the peace of the church at home, and nearer agreement with the church of Scotland, and other Reformed churches abroad: and to deliver their opinions and advice therein, with all convenient speed, to the houses: whereupon they gave their advice before the houses declared their judgment, in the Ordinance for Commissioners.—The parliament having received the advice of the Assembly concerning Presbyterian Government; and particularly, That Jesus Christ hath placed in the ministers, and elders of his churches, the power of keeping away scandalous and unworthy persons from the Lord's Table; Both houses, after mature deliberation had thereupon, did, notwithstanding, ordain, by a law, That, in cases not enumerated, the commissioners, by them to be appointed according to the said law, should exercise so much of the said power as in that law is provided.—The Assembly are not authorized, as an assembly, by any Ordinance or Order of parliament, to interpret the Covenant, especially in relation to any law made or to be made; nor, since the law passed both houses concerning the commissioners, have been required by both or either of the houses of parliament, or had any authority before by parliament, to deliver their opinions to the houses, in matters already judged and determined by them: neither have they power, either to debate or vote, whether what is passed as a law by both houses, be agreeing or disagreeing to the Word of God, until they be thereunto required."

Matter of Fact arising from the Petition itself.

"The Assembly of Divines, under the name of a Petition, dated March 23, 1645, attested by the prolocutor and the two scribes; 1. Do oppose their judgment, as an assembly, in relation to a law passed both houses, unto the judgment of parliament, being not thereunto authorized nor required; affirming, That the provision of commissioners to judge of Scandals, not enumerated, appears to their consciences to be so contrary to that way of government which Christ hath appointed in his church, (in that it giveth a power to judge of Persons to come to the Sacrament, unto such as Christ hath not given that power,) and to be, in many respects in the said Petition mentioned, so disagreeable to the Covenant, that they dare not practise according to that provision. 2. The Assembly, in their Petition, do declare, That the power of judging in cases not enumerated, (placed, in part by the said laws in commissioners) and to keep back from the Sacrament all such as are notoriously scandalous, doth belong to the several elderships by divine right, and by the will and appointment of Christ; excluding thereby the said commissioners, and in them the parliament, from the power and right to judge in cases of scandal not enumerated."

A committee was appointed to communicate, in a fair manner, unto the Assembly of Divines, the Vote of the house upon this Breach of Privilege in their Petition; and to enlarge themselves upon the several heads of the foregoing Narrative.

Questions ordered to be proposed to the Assembly of Divines.] April 22. The commons took into consideration divers Questions to be propounded to the Assembly of Divines, concerning the Jus Divinum of Church-Government; which were read one by one, and,

"Whereas it is resolved by the house of commons, that all persons guilty of notorious and scandalous offences, shall be suspended from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper: the commons desire to be satisfied, by the Assembly of Divines, in these Questions following: 1. Whether the parochial and congregational or presbyterial elderships, are Jure divino, and by the will and appointment of Jesus Christ; and whether any particular Church-Government be Jure divino; and what that government is? 2. Whether all the members of the said elderships, as members thereof, or which of them, are Jure divino, and by the will and appointment of Jesus Christ? 3. Whether the superior Assemblies or Elderships, viz. the Classical, Provincial, and National, whether all, or any of them, and which of them, are Jure divino, and by the will and appointment of Jesus Christ? 4. Whether Appeals from Congregational Elderships to the Classical, Provincial, and National Assemblies, or to any of them, and to which of them, are Jure divino, and by the will and appointment of Jesus Christ; and are their powers, upon such appeals, Jure divino, and by the will and appointment of Jesus Christ? 5. Whether Oecumenical Assemblies are Jure divino; and whether there be appeals from any of the former assemblies to the said Oecumenical Jure divino, and by the will and appointment of Jesus Christ? 6. Whether, by the Word of God, the power of judging and declaring what are such notorious and scandalous Offences, for which persons guilty thereof are to be kept from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and of convening before them, trying, and actual suspending from the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, such offenders accordingly, is either in the Congregational Eldership or Presbytery, or in any other Eldership, Congregation, or persons; and whether such powers are in them only, or in any of them, and in which of them, Jure divino, and by the will and appointment of Jesus Christ? 7. Whether there be any certain and particular rules expressed in the Word of God to direct the Elderships or Presbyteries, Congregations or Persons, or any of them, in the exercise and execution of the powers aforesaid; and what are those rules? 8. Is there any thing contained in the Word of God, that the supreme magistracy, in a Christian State, may not judge and determine what are the aforesaid notorious and scandalous Offences, and the manner of suspension for the same; and in what particulars, concerning the premises, is the said Supreme Magistracy by the Word of God excluded? 9. Whether the provision of Commissioners to judge of Scandals not enumerated, as they are authorized by the Ordinance of parliament, be contrary to that way of government which Christ hath appointed in his church; and wherein are they so contrary?"—In answer to these particulars the commons desired the Assembly of Divines to give their proofs from Scripture ; and to set down the several texts thereof in the express words of the same. And ordered, " That every minister, present at the debate of any of these Questions, do, upon every resolution which shall be presented to the house concerning the same, subscribe his name, either with the affirmative or negative, as he gives his vote ; and that those that dissent from the major part, shall set down their positive opinions, with the express texts of Scripture upon which they are grounded. Also that the committee, that is appointed to acquaint the Assembly of Divines with the Breach of Privilege in their last Petition, to deliver unto them the foregoing Questions."

April 23. This day lieut. general Cromwell making his appearance in the house after several months absence, the commons ordered the Speaker to return him their hearty thanks for his great and faithful services, done to this kingdom and to this parliament.

Further Papers from the Scots Commissioners.] April 27. The commons took into consideration four Papers from the Commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, which were read. The 1st contained their Answer to the whole Propositions of Peace. The 2nd, the Reasons of their Differences about the Proposition concerning the Militia. The 3rd, Citations of Passages out of several Declarations of the houses, concerning the Militia and Uniformity in Religion. The 4th, Reasons why the Treaty made at Edinburgh, Nov. 23, 1643, is a Treaty. Although the commons took these last Papers, presented by the Scots Commissioners, into consideration from time to time, and there were long debates and frequent divisions upon them, yet we find no Answer thereto in the Journals. It is very probable none was given ; for Mr. Hollis, who appears to have been one of the tellers in almost every question that was moved in favour of the Scots, writes thus : * " Malice against the Scots carried them (the Independents) to discover a manifest slighting and neglecting, and (that not sufficiently provoking) a violent injuring and affronting of them. First, they vouchsafe not to answer the Papers they put into the house, some not at all, none presently (as formerly they were wont to do) nor in any convenient time ; but make them wait days, and weeks, and months, for a return to what the commissioners present from the kingdom of Scotland, or from themselves in the name of that kingdom."

The King leaves Oxford in Disguise.] May 2. Colonel Rainsborough informed the lords, That four days ago there came into his quarters, near Oxford, the duke of Richmond and the earl of Lindsey, with some other gentlemen, who were then at Woodstock. Also that, by several informations, he had heard the king went out of Oxford, disguised, on Monday the 27th ult. and only Mr. Ashburn-ham and Dr. Hudson, a minister, with him : and that it was likely he would come to some place in or near London, and lie concealed until he saw occasion to discover himself. The two last mentioned lords were ordered to be taken into custody of the black rod, and conducted, under colonel Rainsborough's guard, to Windsor-Castle, there to remain till the further pleasure of the house was known.

The Prince of Wales's Answer to the Parliament's Invitation.] May 4. The commons sent up to the lords the following Letter from the Prince of Wales :

To the LORDS and COMMONS assembled in the Parliament of England.

" We have received your Message of the 30th of March, the 11th of this present, by which you, being informed of our late remove into this Island of Scilly, do invite us to come forthwith into your quarters, and to reside in such place, and with such council and such attendants about us, as you, the two houses, shall think fit to appoint.—We have a great and earnest desire to be amongst you, if we might have any assurance that it would prove an expedient towards a blessed Peace and the composure of these miserable distractions ; and therefore, when we were compelled to depart from Cornwall, we chose this poor Island to reside in, where we hoped we might have securely attended God's pleasure, till we might have been made an instrument towards a happy Peace ; but the scarcity of provisions being such in this place, that we have not since our coming hither, which is now about six weeks, received one day's victual, though we left servants of our own in our Duchy of Cornwall to take care for our necessary supply, we are again compelled to remove to the Island of Jersey, whither we hope God Almighty will direct us ; which place we chose the rather, as well being part of the dominions of our royal father, (which as yet is evident to you we have no purpose to quit) as being much nearer to you, and so fitter for correspondency ; and, therefore, that we may the better receive advice from you, with which we shall always comply as far as with our duty and piety we may, we desire you to send to us a Safe-Conduct for the lord Capel to come to you, and to receive from you such particular propositions for our welfare and subsistence as you think fit to make ; and that he may then attend our royal father and return to us at Jersey ; and thereupon we hope, by the blessing of God, you will receive such satisfaction as shall testify the great desire we have, and shall always have, to follow the counsel and advice you shall give : which will be an unspeakable comfort to us. Given at our Court in the Isle of Scilly, the 15th of April, 1646. CHARLES P."

After the reading of this Letter, the lords appointed a committee of five of that house to draw up an Answer to it.

Orders occasioned by the King's leaving Oxford.] The last proceeding of this day, worth notice, was the lords concurrence in a Vote sent up by the commons, "That it be hereby declared by the lords and commons in parliament assembled, That what person soever, who shall harbour or conceal, or know of the harbouring or concealing, the King's person, and shall not reveal it immediately to the Speakers of both houses, shall be proceeded against as a traitor to the commonwealth, forfeit his whole estate, and die without mercy."—Ordered also, "That the committee of the Militia of London be desired to publish this Order by beat of drum, or sound of trumpet, in the cities of London and Westminster, and the lines of communication."

Letters to the Parliament, advising that his Majesty was gone to the Scots Army.] May 7. A Letter was read in the house of lords, from the lord Montague, with some others inclosed: viz.

For the Right Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Peers, pro tempore.

"May it please your lordship; We were this morning, about 10 of the clock, credibly informed that the king, with 3 others, came in great speed this morning, about 7, to Southwell, and went to the house of M. Montreville, the French agent. About 12 this day two of the Scots commissioners brought us a Letter, a copy whereof is here inclosed. The two commissioners presently returned, and, in this surprize, we could not, at the present, think further than to desire of them that his majesty might not remove, which they approved of; and that we might speedily meet the rest of them at Faringdon, which was consented unto. We are now going thither accordingly, and shall immediately advertise your lordships of our further proceedings; and we beseech to know the pleasure of the houses, with all possible speed, how we shall direct and guide ourselves herein. Your, &c. E. MONTAGUE. WILL. PIERPOINT. From Col. Rositer's Tent, at the Leaguer before Newark, 8th May, 1646."

The Letter referred to in the foregoing was as follows:

For the Right Hon. the COMMISSIONERS of the Parliament of England.

"Right Honourable; The discharging ourselves of the duty we owe to the kingdom of England, and unto you as commissioners from the same, moves us to acquaint you of the king's coming into our army this morning; which has overtaken us unexpectedly, filled us with amazement, and made us like men that dream. We cannot think that he should be so ill advised in his resolutions, as to have cast himself upon us without a real intention to give full satisfaction to both kingdoms in all their just and reasonable demands, in all those things that concern religion and righteousness. Whatsoever be his disposition and resolutions, you may be sure that we shall never entertain any thought, or correspond with any person, nor countenance any endeavours, that may, in any circumstance, entrench upon the League and Covenant, or weaken the union or confidence betwixt the two nations: that union was unto our kingdom the matter of many prayers; and as nothing was more joyful to us than to have it set on foot, so hitherto we have thought nothing too dear to maintain it; and we trust to walk with such faithfulness and truth in this particular, that as we have the testimony of a good conscience within ourselves, so you, and all the world, shall see we mind your interest with as much integrity and care as our own, being confident you will entertain no other thoughts of us. Signed by warrant and command of the Commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, by LOTHIAN. Southwell, May 5."

The Commons resolve to send the King to Warwick Castle.] This day, at a conference, the commons acquainted the lords, that, upon serious debate of the foregoing Letters, they had passed two Votes, viz.

1. "Ordered, by the and commons in parliament, That it be desired of the Scots Commissioners that were resident with their army before Newark, and also of their general there, that the person of the king might be disposed of to such a place, within this kingdom, as the two houses of parliament should appoint. 2. That the place to which the person of the king shall be disposed of, shall be Warwick castle." But it being late, the lords deferred the consideration of these Votes till next day. Accordingly,

May 8. These two Votes were warmly debated in the lords, and the question being put, Whether this house agrees with the commons in the first Vote? it passed in the negative. The same question being after put on the second Vote, this also passed in the negative.

Protest thereupon.] The following lords entered a Protest, with their reasons, against this and the former Vote: a custom rarely practised at this time. After reciting both the Votes, as before, they added,

"We, whose names are underwritten, having, before the putting of the aforesaid question, demanded our right of protestation, if the question was carried in the negative, as it was; and finding, by Letters of the 6th inst. from the commissioners of the parliament of England, near Newark, this day read in the house of peers, That strict guards were kept by the Scots army about the house where the king then was, and none suffered access to his person without their permission, we conceive this to be a matter of so high concern, both to the parliament and kingdom, (That in such a case the houses of parliament should not desire that the person of the king of England may be disposed of to such a place, within this kingdom, as the houses should appoint) That, to clear ourselves from the ill consequences that may ensue thereupon, we have thought fit to enter this our Dissent and Protestation against it, which we do accordingly. Middlesex, Denbigh, Northumberland, Pembroke and Montgomery, Nottingham, Kent, Salisbury, Say and Sele."

Newark surrendered to the Parliament, by the King's Orders.] The Letters referred to in the foregoing Protest were read this day in the house of lords, before the debate and putting the question about the Votes. They contain an account of the Surrender of Newark, and the Articles on which it was yielded up.

The Scots Commissioners Account of the King's coming into their Army.] After this the earl of Manchester reported a Letter which had come from the Committee of Scotland, residing with the Army before Newark; the purport of which was to assure the houses that the king, when he came into their army, offered the town and garrison of Newark to be surrendered into the hands of the Scots and English Commissioners; but that they made it their desire to the king, that it might be surrendered into the hands of the parliament of England only, for the better preserving the good correspondence between the two kingdoms, and preventing of jealousies. The Letter itself runs thus:

"Right Honourable; The earnest desire which we have to keep a right understanding between the two kingdoms, moves us to acquaint you with that strange providence wherewith we are now surprized, together with our carriage and desires thereupon. The king came into our army yesterday in so private a way, that after we had made search for him, upon the surmises of some persons who pretended to know his face, yet we could not find him out in sundry houses.* And we believe

your lordships will think it was matter of much astonishment to us, seeing we did not expect he would have come into any place under our power. We conceived it not fit to enquire into the causes that persuaded him to come hither, but to endeavour that his being here might be improved to the best advantage, for promoting the work of uniformity, for settling of religion and righteousness, and attaining of Peace according to the League and Covenant, and Treaty, by the advice of the parliaments of both kingdoms, or their commissioners authorized for that effect. Trusting to our integrity, we do persuade ourselves that none will so far misconstrue us, as that we intend to make use of this seeming advantage for promoting mity; and the orders were instantly obeyed. And hearing that the parliament laid claim to the entire disposal of the king's person, and that the English army was making some motions towards them; they thought proper to retire northwards, and to fix their camp at Newcastle. This measure was very grateful to the king; and he began to entertain hopes of protection from the Scots. He was particularly attentive to the behaviour of their preachers, on whom all depended. It was the mode of that age to make the pulpit the scene of news; and on every great event, the whole scripture was ransacked by the clergy for passages applicable to the present occasion. The first minister who preached before the king, chose these words for his text: 'And behold all the men of Israel came to the king, and said unto him, Why have our brethren, the men of Judah, stolen thee away, and have brought the king and his household, and all David's men with him, over Jordan? And all the men of Judah answered the men of Israel, Because the king is near of kin to us; wherefore then be ye angry for this matter? Have we eaten at all of the king's cost? or hath he given us any gift? And the men of Israel answered the men of Judah, and said, We have ten parts in the king, and we have also more right in David than ye: Why then did ye despise us, that our advice should not be first had in bringing back our king? And the words of the men of Judah were fiercer than the words of the men of Israel.' But the king soon found, that the happiness chiefly of the allusion had tempted the preacher to employ this text, and that the covenanting zealots were no-wise pacified towards him. Another preacher, after reproaching him to his face with his misgovernment, ordered this psalm to be sung;

Why dost thou, tyrant, boast thyself

Thy wicked deeds to praise:

The king stood up, and called for that psalm which begins with these words,

Have mercy, Lord, on me, I pray;

For men would me devour:

The good-natured audience, in pity to fallen majesty, showed, for once, greater deference to the king than to the minister, and sung the psalm which the former had called for."

any other ends than are expressed in the Covenant, and have been hitherto pursued by us with no less conscience than care. And yet, for further satisfaction, we do ingenuously declare, that there hath been no treaty or capitulation betwixt his majesty and us, nor any in our names; and that we leave the ways and means of Peace unto the power and wisdom of the parliaments of both kingdoms: and so far as concerns us, as we have a witness in heaven, we are confident to make it appear to the world, that there is nothing more in our desires than, in all our resolutions and proceedings, to adhere to the Covenant and Treaty. Our gravest thoughts shall be taken up in studying, and our utmost abilities employed in acting, those things that may best advance the public good and common happiness of both kingdoms; wherein, by the help of the most high, we shall labour to use so much tenderness and care, that we hope it shall soon appear that our actions have been the issue and result of honest and single intentions.—And, further, we cannot, in a matter of so deep consequence and common interest, but seek your lordship's advice; for which effect we have also written to the Committee of Estates of Scotland, with intentions to move, by your joint counsels and resolutions, that we at last, after a seed time of many afflictions, may reap the sweet fruits of truth and peace: and, in this confidence, we remain, your, &c. Leven, Balcarras, Dumfermline, Hume, Lothian, R. Freebairn, W. Glendinning, Tho. Carr, J. Johnston, Southwell, May 6, 1646."

Next was read a Paper, to back the former, from the Scots Commissioners residing in London. The lords, taking these Papers into consideration, resolved, That the present Letters from the Commissioners of the Parliament, and from the Commissioners of the Estates of Scotland residing with the Army before Newark, and the Paper delivered in this day by the Scots Commissioners, be made known to sir T. Fairfax; and that it be signified unto him, that this house thinks fit that he should not send any forces to Newark.—It was also ordered, that these lords following, viz. the earls of Northumberland, Deaigh, Manchester, and Lincoln, viscount Say and Sele, with the lords, Roberts, Wharton, and Willoughby of Parham, should consider of the drawing up of a Letter to be sent to the king from both houses, to propose that all Garrisons may be slighted and dismantled, and all armies and forces, both in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and all other forces whatsoever that have any commission from the king, may be speedily disbanded; and that the consent of the Scots commissioners be desired therein.

Complaint from the Scots Commissioners, of their Messenger being stopped by the Guards. May 9. The Scots Commissioners in London sent a Letter to the house of lords this day, complaining, "That a gentleman, employed by the other commissioners for Scotland, and having their pass to them in London, was ordered to go back into Scotland with their letters and pass; but was stopped the night before by the guards, or some other persons, in or about London, their letters opened and taken from him, and himself kept up; which was an injury they could not have expected, but left it to the wisdom of the houses to consider how important it was; and to take such course for delivering their letters, and repairing of this unjust action, as might be a testimony of affection and justice to their servants, Loudon, Lauderdale, A. Johnston, Char. Erskine, H. Kennedy, Robert Barclay."

The lords ordered that a strict examination should be made what officers were upon guard the last night, and who stopped and took the Letters, and make a report of it to that house.

Captain Massey's Reasons for so doing. May 11. A further account was given to the lords of this business, under the hand of one captain Massey, in these words:

"I, Francis Massey, one of the captains of col. Bradley's regiment, having the command of the guard at Shoreditch, on Thursday night last, a Scots gentleman was staid at the passage about 9 o'clock; who being, as he said, going to the Scots Army, and shewing no pass under any hand known to me, I caused him to be staid and searched; and finding divers Letters about him, which he told me he knew not from whom he had them, upon which two of them were opened, one by myself, and the other by one of the guard, whom I know not; and conceiving the matter of that Letter, which was not writ in characters, to be prejudicial to the parliament and kingdom, as being a means of having the private debates of the house of commons published, my conscience told me that I ought not to let pass any such Letters without the consent and knowledge of the parliament, which caused me to stay the person and Letters until the morning; at which time I presented them to the house of commons, where the Letters are now remaining, but the person discharged, which was done upon Friday last. F. Massey."

The lords ordered a copy of this Answer to be sent to the Scots Commissioners, and that captain Massey have notice to attend their house on the Tuesday morning next.

Capt. Massey committed to the Fleet by the Lords; but discharged by the Commons. May 16. On a further examination into this affair, capt. Massey was committed, by the lords, prisoner to the Fleet, during pleasure, for opening the Letters of the Scots Commissioners, and not observing his orders and directions. The lords also appointed a committee to inquire further into this business; but captain Massey was, some few days after, released by order of the commons without payment of fees. Lord Hollis writes, "The reason they alledged for discharging the captain was, That the lords had broke their privileges in imprisoning one who was under examination of their committee (for they had also referred the business to a committee): but, in truth, not to do the kingdom of Scotland any right in punishing the offender, but to affront it the more in protecting him."

The Scots Commissioners Vindication of their Proceedings, upon the King's coming into their Army.] May 21. About this time it was that the Scots Army marched from Newark homewards, and carried the king with them. They had brought his majesty as far as Newcastle, before any public intelligence was given to the parliament where he was conveyed. However, this day, the lords received a Letter from the earl of Lauderdale, one of the Scots Commissioners, to this effect:

"That, for the preventing of all false informations, they thought fit to acquaint the honourable houses with a Proclamation published by his excellency the earl of Leven at Durham: that his majesty came into Newcastle without any solemnity; and that none of the Scots nation are admitted to come into that garrison, without a warrant from the Committee of Estates of that kingdom; nor none of this nation, unless they have a warrant from both houses of parliament, their commissioners, or the magistrates of Newcastle: that the Committee of Estates of Scotland, residing at Edinburgh, upon notice of his majesty's coming to their army, forthwith emitted a Proclamation, inhibiting all his subjects, of whatsoever quality or degree, to go out of the kingdom without their warrant, under the pain of being pursued as public enemies. They had also sent some of their number to assist the committee of their army with directions, that they proceed with the joint advice and consent of the commissioners of both houses, according to the Covenant and Treaty. But that they now earnestly entreat his majesty to grant the joint desires of both kingdoms, when they shall be presented unto him; and, in the mean time, that he grant no titles of honour, pensions, or places, to any of the subjects of Scotland; and, in every thing else, to study a fair correspondency between the two kingdoms. Dated from Worcester-house, May 20, and signed LAUDERDALE."

The King's Letter to the Parliament of England, with Proposals for Peace.] May 25. A Letter was read in the house of Lords, which came from the King himself, dated the 18th from Newcastle, where he then was; the Scots having, by a quick march, conveyed him thither: from thence therefore his majesty addressed himself to the parliament as follows:

"C. R. His majesty having understood from both his houses of parliament, That it was not safe for him to come to London (whither he had purposed to repair, if so he might, by their advice, to do whatsoever may be best for the good and peace of both kingdoms) until he shall first give his consent to such Propositions as were to be presented to him from them; and being certainly informed that the armies were marching so fast up to Oxford, as made that no fit place for treating, did resolve to withdraw himself hither, only to secure his own person, and with no intention to continue this war any longer, or for to make any division between his two kingdoms; but to give such contentment to both, (and so to preserve himself for the good of both) as, by the blessing of God, he might see a happy and well-grounded Peace, thereby to bring prosperity to these kingdoms, answerable to the best times of his progenitors. And since the settling of Religion ought to be the chiefest care of all councils, his majesty most earnestly and heartily recommends to his two houses of parliament all the ways and means possible for speedy finishing this pious and necessary work; and particularly that they take the advice of the Divines of both kingdoms, assembled at Westminster. Likewise concerning the Militia of England; for securing his people against all pretensions of danger his majesty is pleased to have it settled as was offered at the Treaty of Uxbridge; all the persons being to be named for that trust by the two houses of the parliament of England for the space of 7 years; and, after the expiration of that term, that it be regulated as shall be agreed upon by his majesty and his two houses of parliament. And the like for the kingdom of Scotland. Concerning the Wars in Ireland; his majesty will do whatsoever is possible for him to give full satisfaction therein. And if these be not satisfactory, his majesty then desires that all such of the Propositions as are already agreed upon by both kingdoms, may be speedily sent unto him; his majesty being resolved to comply with his parliament in every thing that shall be for the happiness of his subjects, and for the removing of all unhappy differences, which have produced so many sad effects. His majesty having made these offers, he will neither question the thankful acceptance of them; nor doth he doubt but that his two kingdoms will be careful to maintain him in his honour, and in his just and lawful rights; which is the only way to make a happy composition of these unnatural divisions: and likewise will think upon a solid way of conserving the peace between the two kingdoms for time to come; and will take a speedy course for easing and quieting his afflicted people, by satisfying the public debts, by disbanding of all armies, and whatsoever shall be judged conducive to that end; that so all hinderances being removed, he may return to his parliament with mutual comfort. P. S. His majesty being desirous to shun the further effusion of blood, and to evidence his real intentions to Peace, is willing that his forces in and about Oxford be disbanded, and the fortifications of the city dismantled, they receiving honourable conditions; which being granted to the Town and Forces there, his majesty will give the like order to the rest of the Garrisons." Newcastle May 18, 1646."

The following Letter, of the same date as the former, from the king, directed to sir T. Glemham, governor of Oxford, was also read:

"C. R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well: Being desirous to stop the further effusion of blood of our subjects, and yet respecting the faithful services of all that are in our city of Oxford, which have full faithfully served and hazarded their lives for us, we have thought good to command you to quit that city, and to disband the forces under your command there, you receiving honourable conditions for you and them."

Letters from the Scots Commissioners in relation to their Army, and their Conduct towards the King.] A Letter from the Scots Commissioners residing in London, along with some other Letters from their Commissioners in the North were also read:

For the Right Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of PEERS pro tempore.

"Right Honourable, We are desired, by the Committee of estates of the Kingdom of Scotland residing with the Scots Army, to communicate to the hon. houses the Letters and Papers herewith presented; wherein it will appear how careful they have been in exhorting his majesty to give satisfaction to the joint desires of both kingdoms, without meddling in any Propositions of Peace. They have also renewed their desires for advice from hence, and do earnestly intreat that commissioners may be sent from both houses to join with them, and to be witnesses of all their actions; wherein they endeavour nothing more, than that they may be such as may give equal satisfaction to both the kingdoms. We are further desired to acquaint their lordships with the particulars of a Letter written by col. Poyntz, to lieutenant. gen. D. Lesley; wherein he doth require, That if he had any forces about Ripon, he retire them to some other place; and if he had appointed any more to come thither, that he recal his orders; all which he advised him speedily to perform, as he would evidence to the world, that the intention of the coming of the Scots Army into this kingdom was to pursue the common enemy, and not to be troublesome, or incroach upon their friends. To this lieutenant. gen. Lesley returned a civil Answer, shewing him, That his commands should be obeyed; and accordingly did forthwith withdraw his forces from those parts, being desirous, according to the directions given unto him, to avoid all occasions of difference and contest: upon consideration whereof, it is their earnest desire, That as directions are given by them to all the officers of the Scots army, so the hon. houses would be pleased to give order to the commanders of their forces in those parts to forbear all provoking expressions, speeches, or actions, which may give just cause of offence. And for preventing all disorders and inconveniences, they do earnestly intreat, That directions may be speedily sent to the committee at York, to appoint them quarters, that a considerable supply of money may be sent to them now, after so much want and so long suffering: which desires being so reasonable and so often renewed, we are persuaded the hon. houses will take them into their serious consideration, and return a speedy and satisfactory Answer. May 25, 1646."

Another Letter was read, addressed to the Speaker of the house of peers, from the Scots Commissioners at Newcastle; in which were closed copies of several Papers delivered by them to the king:

"Right honourable; By our last to you, of the 6th of May, we gave your lordships an account of the manner of his majesty's coming into our army, and did crave your advice what was to be done for the public good and mutual happiness of both kingdoms; and though as yet we have had no Answer returned, we esteem it incumbent upon us, in pursuance of the ends contained in the Solemn League and Covenant, which have been, and ever shall be, the scope of our intentions, to give your lordships a further account of what is passed betwixt his majesty and us, that you may know the true posture of affairs here. We did acquaint the Committee of estates at Edinburgh with the king's unexpected coming to us, who did send up some of their members to assist us in our desires to his majesty. All our labours and endeavours have been, that he would have been pleased to send such a satisfactory message to the parliament of England, and our commissioners at London, as might be a happy entrance to the settling of religion and a well-grounded Peace; and, for this effect, those who were intrusted by the committee of estates, by our advice, gave in several Papers to his majesty, representing the resolutions of the kingdom of Scotland; whereof we have sent to our commissioners just copies, who will shew the same to your lordships, and give you a further account of all that is passed. We earnestly desire that the parliament of England may be pleased to send some commissioners from them to be witnesses of our actions, and to give us concurrence and assistance of what may fall in our way here; and, in the mean time, that the parliament will cause to make timely provisions for our army, from London, and give orders for their quarters in such places as may be most convenient for their army. Signed by the Warrant and at the Command of the Commissioners for the Parliament of Scotland. LOTHIAN. May 19, 1646."

Petition from the City of London to the Lords, for suppressing the Independents, for a good Correspondence with the Scots, for relief from the heavy Taxes, &c.] May 26. A Remonstrance and Petition from the city of London was presented to the lords by alderman Foot, a famous orator of the city's at that time, and who had often appeared before them on the like occasion. He was accompanied now by divers other aldermen, and many common council men: this Remonstrance, which is an abstract of the history of these times, was as follows:

To the Right Hon. the Lords assembled in the High Court of Parliament: The Humble REMONSTRANCE and PETITION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons, of the City of London, in Common Council assembled.

"Our duty, in the first place, doth lead us to begin all our addresses, as we most heartily and humbly do these, with all due and humble acknowledgment of the great labours and endeavours which your lordships have, these many years, employed in reformation of the Church and Commonwealth, and in the preservation of both, with the humble tender of our constant devotion to serve the parliament, according to our Covenant made before Almighty God. In the next place, we do most humbly crave pardon, although we do presume again to return unto your lordships; and humbly, yet plainly, lay open the sorrows and fears of our hearts, even in this season when God hath blessed your armies with the greatest successes, and that man might persuade himself that the war is almost at an end: For, first, when we remember that it hath been long since declared to be far from any purpose or desire to let loose the golden reins of discipline and government in the Church, or to leave private persons or particular congregations to take up what form of divine service they please; when we look upon what both houses have resolved against Brownism and Anabaptism, properly so called; when we meditate upon our Protestation and Covenant; and, lastly, when we peruse the Directory, and other Ordinances for Presbyterial government; and yet find private and separate congregations daily erected in divers parts of the city and elsewhere, and commonly frequented; and Anabaptism, Brownism, and almost all manner of schisms, heresies, and blasphemies, boldly vented and maintained, by such as, to the point of Church-Government, profess themselves to be Independent, we cannot but be astonished at the swarms of sectaries which discover themselves every where; who if, by their endeavours, they should get into places of profit and trust in martial and civil affairs, it might tend much to the disturbance of the public peace, both of the church and commonwealth.—We also cannot but call to mind what vows we have made to God in the same Covenant, as well as our former Protestations to preserve the rights and privileges of the parliament, and the liberties of the kingdoms, and to preserve and defend the king's majesty's person and authority in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms; that the world may bear witness with our consciences of our loyalty, and that we have no thoughts or intentions to diminish his majesty's just power and greatness; and do rest in the assurance we have received in the many former Declarations of both houses concerning their intentions towards his majesty, his royal posterity, and the peace of this kingdom; which we doubt not but your lordships will pursue with all speedy dispatch of Propositions to his majesty, now whilst God doth so mercifully and miraculously go along with our armies in all the parts of the kingdom.—We may not, in the next place, forget our Brethren of Scotland; how, first, they were invited to engage with this kingdom in God's cause, when yet they were at peace at home; in what Covenant this nation is mutually linked with them; at what time, in relation both to the weak condition of our forces then, and the season of the year, they adventured upon an enemy warmly lodged, and well armed and prepared; what they have since suffered for this cause in their own kingdom; how successful ever since God hath made our forces in suppressing the common enemies of both nations; and what present hopes we have of a well settled Peace while we continue in this mutual amity; and then cannot but lament the many jealousies which the enemies of our peace, union, and good government do now strive to beget betwixt both nations; and we tremble at the sad effects thereof, if not timely prevented by the wisdom of the parliaments of both kingdoms.—We cannot also omit humbly to represent unto your lordships consideration, how many citizens have already suffered, and how many more will be undone, if your lordships shall still make use of that antient privilege to protect yourselves, the assistants of this honourable house, and the servants of both, and others, from being proceeded against in any course of law for Debt; which now, because this parliament hath already sat so long, and is likely, by reason of the unsettledness of affairs, to sit much longer, would especially require some expedient for relief of so many as, otherwise, must daily suffer under this privilege.—And now that the kingdom is almost reduced, by which means the Revenues of the kingdom will be unburthened, and the Customs and Excise increase, and the public charge of the kingdom decrease; now that delinquents do daily come in and compound; and now that the enemy have but few holds left, we hope that the great and extraordinary taxes and burthens on this city, and their trade, shall be, for the future, abated; that the Debts owing to the city and citizens of London, either by particular assurances of parliament, or upon the public faith of the kingdom, be taken care for and discharged, as well as those assigned upon the Excise; and may not be diverted from the uses appointed by former Acts and Ordinances.—And we humbly crave leave to present, to the consideration of this hon. house, the Committee of Haberdasher's hall, as being one of the greatest grievances of this city; and which, so long as it is continued, doth hinder the concourse of people thereunto, and tendeth much to the destruction of the trade and inhabitants thereof:—And now also we doubt not but God will give the parliament some better means and opportunities of relief of our bleeding Brethren in Ireland, and the suppressing of those horrid rebels, and reducing of that kingdom; wherein, besides the public and common interest, we are particularly concerned.—Lastly, we should have much to say for this city, if we could imagine that its fidelity, and constant services and devotion to the parliament, could either be questioned or forgotten; that little we shall express on the part of the city is, not to repeat how zealous we have been in the cause of God and this parliament; how we have spilt our blood, and spent and laid out ourselves and our estates in maintenance thereof; how many public acknowledgments we have by us of the favourable acceptances of them, and promises to leave testimonies thereof to all future ages; but only to beseech your lordships to consider how much our hearts may justly be dejected, now that God hath followed your endeavours and our prayers with so many successes, and brought the war to a probable period, as to the sense of man; that the enemies of our peace should strive now to sow jealousies between the parliament and this city, as hath been too evident of late; and, particularly, should so far prevail, as to be able to render the chief magistrate of this city, the lord mayor, (alderman Adams) suspected; unto whom we cannot but give this just testimony, that he, in his place, hath faithfully behaved himself, and carefully discharged his office.—We could add much more of the daily invectives against us from the pulpit, and other places, where the boufeus of these sectaries are admitted; the scurrilous and seditious Pamphlets daily broached in and against the city, and the great contempt of, and discouragement to, the ministers of the Gospel, who adhere to the Presbyterian government: but we shall conclude with this brief and humble Representation of our Petitions and desires to your lordships, in the name of the whole city: 1. That some speedy and strict course may be taken for the suppressing all private and separate Congregations. 2. That all Anabaptists, Brownists, Schismatics, Hereticks, Blasphemers, and all such Sectaries as conform not to the public-discipline established, or to be established, by parliament, may be fully declared against; and some effectual course settled for proceeding against such persons. 3. That as we are all subjects of one kingdom, so all may be equally required to yield obedience unto the government set forth, or to be set forth by the parliament. 4. That no person disaffected to the Presbyterian government, set forth, or to be set forth by parliament, may be employed in any place of public trust. 5. That your lordships would please to hasten Propositions to his majesty for settling a safe and well-grounded Peace amongst us, after so long and unnatural a war. 6. That your lordships, according to the Covenant and Treaties, will please to study all means to preserve the union betwixt the two nations of England and Scotland, and to remove all jealousies which may endanger our mutual agreement. 7. That your lordships would please to consider of some means, whereby the Privileges which the members of this hon. house and their assistants, and the servants of both, and others, enjoy, by being protected and exempted from being proceeded against for their Debts, may be so qualified, as that the subject may be able to recover his own in some due time. 8. That all public Revenues and Receipts may be employed for public uses, that so the Taxes of the city may be abated. 9. That the estates and compositions of delinquents may, according to the engagements by Ordinance of parliament, be applied to discharge the great sums owing to this city and citizens. 10. That the Plymouth Duty may be taken off the trade, especially now that the West is reduced. 11. That the committee at Haberdashers-hall may be presently dissolved, or at least so limited and regulated, as that the city may have no cause of complaint. 12. That the reducing the kingdom of Ireland may be taken into consideration, before the good Party there be too far wasted and discouraged. 13. That the lord mayor of this city may be fully vindicated. 14. And lastly, and above all, That your lordships will please not to look upon any expressions of this our Remonstrance and Petition, as charging any thing upon your lordships, or as intended to intrench upon any privilege of this hon. house; but favourably to accept thereof, and so to interpret the same as, from a single and humble heart, it is sincerely (without any bye ends, or to comply with any party whatsoever) intended and breathed forth from the sad hearts of the petitioners, who are overwhelmed with many fears on all sides; and who call God, the Searcher of all Hearts, to witness that, according to their Covenant and duty, their zeal, devotion, and obedience is as fervent and prostrate as ever to serve the parliament with their lives and estates, against all the enemies of our Peace, and to conjoin the city more and more to the parliament, and to maintain the union of both nations against all opposers whatsoever. All which we humbly submit unto the wisdom of this honourable house. MITCHELL."

After presenting the foregoing Petition, Mr. Foot said he was commanded by the lord Mayor, aldermen, and common council-men of London, to acquaint the house with a copy of a Letter that the king sent lately to the lord mayor; and it being opened only yesterday, they think it fit to present the same to the knowledge of their lordships; which Letter was read:

For our Right Trusty and Well-beloved the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council-Men of our City of London:
Newcastle, May 19, 1646.

"C. R. Right Trusty and Well-beloved, we greet you well; Having expressed our resolutions to the two houses of our parliament of England, and the committee of estates of our parliament of Scotland, to give all just satisfaction to the joint desires of both kingdoms, we have likewise now thought fit to assure the two chief cities of both our kingdoms, that nothing is more grievous to us than the troubles and distractions of our people; and that nothing on earth is more desired by us, than that, in Religion and Peace, with all the comfortable fruits of both, they may henceforth live under us in all godliness and honesty; and this profession we make for no other end, but that you may know immediately from ourselves our integrity and full resolution to comply with our parliaments in every thing for settling truth and peace, and our desire to have all things speedily concluded which shall be found requisite for that end; that our return to that our antient city may be to the satisfaction of our parliament, the good liking of you and all our good people, and to our own greater joy and comfort. We bid you heartily farewell."

Answer of Thanks from the Lords to the foregoing Petition.] To the foregoing Petition the lords returned the following Answer, by their Speaker:

"The lords are very sensible of the great fidelity and constant services of the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London to this present parliament, which they shall never forget. They acknowledge their zeal, expressed upon all occasions, in the cause of God and this parliament; and how readily they have spilt their blood, and spent and laid out themselves and their estates in the maintenance thereof: they are very well satisfied with your expressions and care to settle the true Reformed Protestant Religion according to the Covenant, and with your desires to have all heresy, schism, and blasphemies suppressed; as also with your respect to preserve the rights and privileges of parliament, the liberties of the kingdoms, and to preserve and defend his majesty's person and authority in the preservation of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms, his royal posterity and the peace of the kingdoms; as also for your desires for continuance of that union between us and our brethren of Scotland, of whose services and sufferings we shall not only hold a grateful memory, but, upon all occasions, give a retaliation: unto all which we hold ourselves, equally with you, obliged by our Solemn League and Covenant. As to the person of the lord mayor, the lords hold a high esteem of him, according to his merit, and have commanded me to let you know, that nothing hath passed this house, at any time, in prejudice of him; and when the particulars, wherein he finds himself aggrieved, shall be made known unto them, they shall be ready, in a parliamentary way, to do him right. The lords will take the other particulars of your Petition into serious and speedy consideration; and have commanded me to give you hearty thanks for the real testimonies of duty and good affections, which not only by your words but by your actions you have constantly manifested unto them."

Then it was resolved, That this Remonstrance and Petition shall be printed and published, and likewise the foregoing Answer to the same.—Although this Petition was so well received by the lords, yet, as Mr. Whitlocke observes,* many in the house of commons expressed great offence at it when it came before them, that the city should take upon them to prescribe to the parliament what they were to do: and as it was looked upon to be wholly a design of the Presbyterian party, it was not liked, and received but this cold Answer to it, 'That it would be taken into consideration when time shall be convenient.' And it appears from the Journals, that even this Answer was not obtained without great opposition; the numbers on the previous question being 148 against 113; and, on the main question, 151 against 108. General Ludlow† calls this Petition an insolent address from the mayor and common council of the city of London: and the Answer of the commons he stiles a positive Declaration, that they resolved to preserve their authority entire to themselves; for that there was a party in the house of the same temper with the addressers, who earnestly endeavoured to break the army as the principal obstacle to their designs.

The Scots Commissioners Vindication of their Conduct, on presenting to the Lords the King's Letter to the Marquis of Ormond.] June 8. The Scots Commissioners sent a Letter to the lords, with one inclosed from the king to the Marquis of Ormond, in Ireland; both which sufficiently explain themselves:

"Right Honourable; This inclosed Paper having very lately come to our hands; which, although it had not so much as colour enough to deceive, yet, nevertheless, as major-general Monro, in testimony of his integrity, did communicate the thing to the commissioners of parliament in Ulster; so we, for preventing mistakes, (many copies of the same thing being spread among the people) have thought good to communicate the same to the honourable houses, with our sense upon it; that, by their wisdom and reciprocal care, a right understanding in all things may still be preserved between the kingdoms. Whether any such Letter was signed by the king at Oxford, or whether it was invented of purpose to support a declining party, we do not know; what may concern the king in it we leave to himself, who as he hath, since the date of that Paper, expressed contrary intentions and resolutions in his Messages to both kingdoms, so he can best tell what he wrote at that time; we are only to speak the matter of the Paper which cometh from the hand of secretary Nicholas, unto whose informations what credit ought to be given, the houses very well know. It doth consist with our perfect knowledge, and we declare it with as much confidence as ever we did or can do any thing, that the matter of the Paper, so far as concerneth any assurance or capitulation for joining of forces, or for combining against the houses of parliament, or any other private or public agreement whatsoever, between the king on the one part, and the kingdom of Scotland, their army, or any in their name, and having power from them, upon the other part, is a most damnable untruth. We shall not need to express how improbable it is, if there had been any such agreement, that the king about the same time should have sent a Message to both houses, offering to come to London, and to follow their advice in all things, without offering any satisfaction to the kingdom of Scotland; and that, before he received the Answer of the houses, he should write such a Letter to Ireland, and give orders to make it known not only to his privy council, but to his other subjects of that kingdom: Nor will we insist how improbable it is that the king should make this known to the marquis of Ormond, and neglect to acquaint the late earl of Montrose, who had been much more concerned, and who would, no doubt, if he had known any such thing, have communicated the same to major-general Middleton; and prevented the defeating of himself, his associates and forces, about the middle of May, after the king was with the Scots army: Nor how unlikely it is that he who is, for the time, commander in chief for the Scots forces in Ireland, should be for the space of 7 or 8 weeks totally ignorant of any such agreement; or, if he had known of any such, that he should not have communicated it to the commissioners of the parliament, and immediately marched himself to the field against the enemy: Nor shall we need to call to mind the expressions in the lord Digby's intercepted Letters, which gave our nation the character of such as could not be gained to that side; no not after all applications used. There are other more sure and more public testimonies since the date of that lying Paper, which makes the falsehood of it more than palpable; as if divine providence had purposely ordered all the late actions of the kingdom of Scotland and of their forces, both before and since the 13th of April, to be so many real confutations of that groundless invention; we mean several late fights with the rebels under the late earl of Montrose, and Alaster Macdonald; the delivery of Newark; the restraining and debarring of delinquents and malignants from the king's person and from our army; the late public Declarations of the church and state of Scotland in the beginning of April; as likewise of the general and committee with the army, agreed upon about the end of April, and published the 15th of May, in Scotland, against a band of the earl of Seaforth and his associates; as for other reasons, so especially for this, that the said band did tend to the weakening of the confidence and union between the two kingdoms, firmly joined and mutually engaged for assistance to each other in this cause, as may appear more fully by the Declaration herewith presented: Nor can we pass over the Paper delivered to the king, by the committee of estates, the 15th of May last, That if his majesty should delay to go about the readiest ways and means to satisfy both his kingdoms they would be necessitated, for their own exoneration, to acquaint the committee of both kingdoms at London; that a course might be taken by joint advice of both kingdoms, for attaining the just ends expressed in the Solemn League and Covenant. We shall say no more of this particular. God hath his own time to make manifest who have dealt sincerely and who falsely; and as our nation did refuse to join with the enemy's forces when they were strongest, and did join with our brethren of England in their weakest and most necessitous condition; so we shall never look for a blessing from God upon either nation longer than they continue faithful to God and to each other, according to the Covenant and Treaty. And we do confidently expect, from the wisdom and justice of the honourable houses, that this and such like Papers shall find no more credit here than Papers and Declarations against themselves did formerly find in Scotland; and that Declarations and public Papers from the kingdom of Scotland, or their committees or commissioners, shall have such acceptation with both houses as they desire Declarations from themselves, or Papers from any in their name, may have with their brethren of Scotland. Nor do we doubt but God will dissipate all these clouds of calumnies, and misunderstandings endeavoured thereby, and will give such a frame of spirit to both nations, as may continue them in a brotherly accord and mutual confidence for the good of both this and of the succeeding generations; which hath been, is, and shall be, most earnestly wished and faithfully endeavoured by Your very affectionate friends &c. Lauderdale. A. Johnston. C. Erskine. H. Kennedy. R. Barclay. Worcester-House, June 8, 1646. P. S. We have sent your lordships here inclosed an Order of the committee of estates at the army, which will evidence their care to remove out of that army all such against whom any just complaints have been made by the country."

The King's Letter to the Marquis of Ormond, setting forth his Reasons for going into the Scots Army. The King's Letter to the Marquis of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, inclosed in the foregoing, was as follows:

"C. R. Right Trusty and intirely beloved cousin and counsellor, we greet you well; Having used all possible and honourable means by sending many gracious Messages to the two houses of parliament, wherein we have offered them all they have heretofore desired; and desire from them nothing but what they themselves, since these unhappy wars, have offered, to procure our personal Treaty with them, for a safe and well-grounded Peace; and having, instead of a dutiful and peaceful return to our said Messages, received either no Answer at all, or such as argues nothing will satisfy them but the ruin, not only of us, our posterity, and friends, but even of monarchy itself: And having lately received very good security that we, and all that do or shall adhere to us, shall be safe in our persons, honours, and consciences, in the Scots Army; and that they shall really and effectually join with us, and with such as will come in unto us, and join with them for our preservation, and shall employ their armies and forces to assist us to the procuring of an happy and well-grounded Peace, for the good of us and our kingdoms, in the recovery of our just rights: we have resolved to put ourselves to the hazard of passing into the Scots army, now lying before Newark; and if it shall please God that we come safe thither, we are resolved to use our best endeavours, with their assistance, and with the conjunction of the forces under the Marquis of Montrose, and such of our well-affected subjects of England as shall rise for us, to procure, if it may be, an honourable and speedy Peace with those who have hitherto refused to give ear to any means tending thereunto: of which our resolution we held it necessary to give you this advertisement, as well to satisfy you, our council, and all our loyal subjects with you, to whom we will that you communicate these our Letters, that failing in our earnest and sincere endeavours, by Treaty, to put an end to the miseries of these our kingdoms, we esteemed ourselves obliged to leave no probable expedient unattempted, to preserve our crown and friends from the usurpation and tyranny of those whose actions declare so manifestly their design to overthrow the laws and happy established government of this kingdom. And now we have made known unto you our resolution, we recommend to your special care the disposing and managing of our affairs on that side, as you shall conceive most for our honour and service; being confident the course we have taken, though with some hazard to our person, will have a good influence on that our kingdom, and defer, if not altogether prevent, the rebels transporting of forces from them into that kingdom. And we desire you to satisfy all our well-affected subjects on that side, of our princely care of them; whereof they shall receive the effect as soon as God shall enable us. We desire you to use some means to let us and our council at Oxon hear frequently from you, and of your actions and condition there. And so God prosper your loyal endeavours. Given at our Court at Oxon the 13th April, 1646. By his majesty's command, Ed. Nicholas."

This Letter from the king was sent, by the marquis of Ormond, to major-general Munro, under the following cover:

"Sir; Having this morning received a dispatch from his majesty, and command to impart it not only to his council, but to all his loyal subjects, I am confident you have so good title to a knowledge thereof, that I have held it my part instantly to dispatch it unto you by an express; and so, sir, wishing you all happiness, I rest, &c. ORMOND. Dublin-Castle, May 21, 1646."

After the reading of these Letters,* the lords ordered them to be printed, and their Speaker to draw up an Answer to that from the Scots commissioners, which being done and read, was agreed to in these words:

"My lords and gentlemen; The lords having received your lordships Letter this morning, mentioning a Letter dated at Oxford, April 13, 1646, have commanded me to let you know, that no such Paper, nor any thing else, gives them occasion to question the fidelity and constancy of the Scots nation unto this cause. And they rest well satisfied with your lordships respects, and care to prevent all jealousies that may arise; and shall likewise employ their endeavours to preserve a mutual correspondence and a good agreement between the two kingdoms."

But the commons were much more brisk and active on the reading of the foregoing Letters; for this day the question being put, 'Whether it appears by this Letter from the king to the marquis of Ormond, that the king went into the Scots Army with a design to set division between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, and to continue the war against the English parliament?' it passed in the affirmative.

Proceedings against Colonel Lilburne, for publishing a scandalous Pamphlet.] June 10. A Book was brought into the house of lords, which they adjudged to be a scandalous Pamphlet, written against the common law of England, and the practice thereof, by lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne; and he was ordered to appear before that house to answer the same.

June 11. Colonel Lilburne appeared at the bar of the house of lords, but, instead of answering any questions, he delivered a Paper, intitled, 'The Protestation, Plea, and Defence of lieutenant-col. John Lilburne, given to the lords at their bar, June 11, 1646; with his Appeal to his competent and proper judges the Commons of England, assembled in parliament.' Upon this the lords ordered, That Lilburne should stand committed to the prison of Newgate, during pleasure, for bringing into this house a scandalous and contemptuous Paper; and that the keeper of Newgate should keep him in safe custody.

The Commons require the Scots Commissioners to give in an Account of Arrears due to them.] This day the following Answer to the commissioners of Scotland, touching the state of the Accounts and Arrears of Money due to their armies and kingdom, was agreed to by the commons, who ordered it to be sent to the Scots committee residing in London, in a Letter from their Speaker, without asking the concurrence of the other house:

"We the commons of England, in parliament assembled, having declared to your lordships, that there is no farther use of continuing the Scots Army in the kingdom of England; and that we would provide 100,000*l.* for the Scots Army; 50,000*l.* thereof to be paid upon the delivery up of all the garrisons except Berwick, which is to be ordered and disposed of according to the Treaty; and the other 50,000*l.* when they shall be in the kingdom of Scotland; we have, in pursuance thereof, appointed a committee for the providing of the said sum, which we shall take care to see paid accordingly: But whereas by a letter from the parliament of Scotland, of the 3rd Feb. 1646, according to the style of that kingdom, they do demand of the houses of parliament of England to make payment, before the 3rd of May next, of the sums of money duly owing by them to that kingdom, and their armies in England and Ireland, according to the Treaties between the two kingdoms, the account whereof will be given in by their commissioners: this house (although the parliament of England was not engaged to pay all the money due to Scotland by a day) to the end they might apply themselves to such courses as might give the parliament of Scotland all possible satisfaction, did, upon the 26th of the said Feb. desire of your lordships, that the Account might be delivered in to them accordingly, which they have ever since expected: but although the money, by the parliament of Scotland, was positively demanded by the 3rd of May last, yet from that 3rd of Feb. until the 20th of May last this house never heard any word concerning the said Account, although again desired: And whereas in the last letter your lordships press, that both houses would appoint commissioners to join with the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, to clear and adjust the Accounts, and remove all differences concerning the same, as a way unto which they are obliged by the 9th Article of the Treaty between the kingdoms; this house conceiveth that 9th Article to refer only to matters of difference that shall happen to arise between the subjects of the two nations, which are to be determined by the mutual advice and consent of both kingdoms, or their committees; and cannot properly be applied to the matter of account, or at least cannot be made use of till an account be first made upon which differences do arise: for although the clearing and adjusting those accounts may possibly, in time, be thought necessary to be referred to committees of both nations, and that commissioners may be appointed, under the great seal, for the ends and purposes desired by our commissioners in October last; yet, until we may understand what is demanded of us by the kingdom of Scotland, both in relation to that kingdom and their armies, we hold it contrary to the course of all proceedings, to refer to committees what the house is not possessed of, or to go about to surcharge or discount until we see what will be demanded as due, and what acknowledged to have been received upon the State of your Account: wherefore we again most earnestly desire your lordships, that we may from you understand what the sums are that are demanded by the kingdom of Scotland as due, not only to their armies but to the kingdom, in all relations whatsoever; that we may take such speedy course for the satisfaction thereof, as your lordships and all the world may see the clearness and justness of our intentions towards you, and may remove all jealousies and misunderstandings between the two nations."

The King's Letter to the Parliament, desiring them to hasten the Propositions of Peace. June 15. A Letter from the king was presented to the lords by their Speaker, the earl of Manchester, to whom it was addressed, with a command from his majesty to communicate it to both houses, and to the Scots commissioners:

"C. R. Newcastle, June 10, 1646."

"His majesty looking with grief of heart upon the sad sufferings of his people in his three kingdoms for some years past, and being affected with their distresses and unquiet condition, through the distractions about Religion, the keeping of forces on foot in the field and garrisons, the not satisfying of public debts, and the fears of the further effusion of blood by the continuance of an unnatural war in any of these kingdoms, or by rending and dividing these kingdoms, so happily united; and having sent a gracious Message unto both houses of parliament, and the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, expressing the necessary causes of his coming from Oxford unto the Scots Army, (without any intention to make a division where he is in freedom and right capacity to settle a true Peace) and containing such offers as he conceived would have been accepted, with a general clause of complying with their desires: and being impatient of delays, and not acquainted with the particulars which may give contentment to them, his majesty doth earnestly desire that the Propositions of Peace so often promised, and so much expected, may be speedily sent unto him, that, upon consideration of them, he may apply himself to give such satisfaction as may be the foundation of a firm Peace. And for the better and more speedy attaining thereunto, his majesty doth further propound, That he may come to London with safety, freedom, and honour, where he resolves to comply with his houses of parliament in every thing which may be most for the good of his subjects, and perfect what remains for settling both kingdoms and people in an happy condition; being likewise most confident that they, according to their reiterated declarations and solemn protestations, will be zealous in the maintenance of his honour and just and lawful rights. And as his majesty desires the houses of parliament to disburthen the kingdom of all forces and garrisons in their power, except such as, before these unhappy times, have been maintained for the necessary defence and safety of this kingdom, so he is willing forthwith to disband all his forces and garrisons within the same, as the inclosed Order herewith sent will evidence: and if, upon these offers, his majesty shall have such satisfaction as he may be confident a firm Peace shall ensue thereon, his majesty will.

then give order for his son, the prince's present return.

The King's Order for surrendering all his Garrisons.] A Letter from the king to the governors of his Garrisons was also read :

To our trusty and well-beloved sir Tho. Glemham, sir Tho. Tildesley, col. H. Washington, col. T. Blagge, governors of our cities and towns of Oxford, Litchfield, Worcester, and Wallingford, and all other commanders of any towns, castles, and forts in our kingdom of England.

" C. R. Newcastle, June 10, 1646.

" Having resolved to comply with the desires of our parliament in every thing which may be for the good of our subjects, and leave no means unessayed for removing all differences amongst us; therefore we have thought fit, the more to evidence the reality of our intentions of settling an happy and firm Peace, to require you, upon honourable terms, to quit those towns, castles, and forts intrusted to you by us, and to disband all the forces under your several commands."

The King's Letter, forbidding the Marquis of Ormond to treat any further with the Irish Rebels.] And another to the Marquis of Ormond :

" C. R. Right Trusty and Entirely-beloved Cousin and Counsellor, we greet you well: Having long, with much grief, looked upon the sad condition our kingdom of Ireland hath been in these divers years through the wicked and desperate Rebellion there, and the bloody effects that have ensued thereupon; for the settling whereof we would have wholly applied ourselves, if the difference between us and our subjects here had not diverted and withdrawn us; and not having been able (for that respect) to reduce them by force, we were necessitated for the present safety of our protestant subjects there, to give you power and authority to treat with them upon such pious, honourable, and safe grounds, as the good of that our kingdom did then require: but for many reasons, too long for a letter, we think fit to require you to proceed no further in Treaty with the Rebels, nor to engage us upon any conditions with them after sight hereof. And having formerly found such real proofs of your ready obedience to our commands, we doubt not of your care in this, wherein our service and the good of our protestant subjects in Ireland is so much concerned. Newcastle, June 11, 1646."

Intercepted Letter from the King to the Prince of Wales.] June 17. The earl of Warwick acquainted the lords, That the Commissioners of the Admiralty had received an account that one of their ships had intercepted a Letter from the king to the prince of Wales, in the Isle of Jersey. It was taken from a master of a vessel going to that place, which the lords made no scruple to open and read, though it was all written and directed with the king's own hand;

" For my Son the PRINCE.

" Charles; This is rather to tell you where I am, and that I am well, than, at this time, to direct you any thing; having written fully to your mother what I would have you do, whom I command you to obey in every thing, except in religion, concerning which I am confident she will never trouble you; and see that you go no where without her's or my particular directions. Let me hear often from you, and so God bless you. Your loving Father, C. R. Newcastle, June 2, 1646. P. S. If Jack Ashburnham comes where you are, command him to wait upon you as he was wont, until I shall send for him, if your mother and you be together; if not, he must wait on her."

Further Proceedings in the Case of Colonel Lilburne.] June 23. Colonel Lilburne was, by order, brought to the bar of the house of lords; and being directed to kneel there as a delinquent, he refused it. After which the houses proceeded to read a Pamphlet, said to be wrote by the said Lilburne, called, 'The Freeman's Freedom vindicated.' It was then ordered, "that col. John Lilburne, for his contempt of the house, and being questioned for two scandalous, seditious, and most dangerous Pamphlets, tending to raise sedition, and to subvert the fundamental laws and government of this kingdom, and also containing scandalous matter against this house, and some members of the same, shall be remanded back to Newgate; and not permitted to have pen, ink, nor paper, nor any access to him in any kind, but only his keeper, until this house shall further order." But the commons seemed as if they intended to take the colonel's part, and justify his Appeal to them as his proper judges; for some days after this, on the petition of his wife presented to that house, in behalf of her husband, then close prisoner in the 'infamous prison of Newgate,' with his Appeal and all his other Papers, after two divisions on the question, it was carried and resolved, "That the Petition and Papers of lieut. colonel John Lilburne should be committed to the committee formerly appointed to consider of the privileges of the commoners of England." But we do not meet with any report made upon it.

The Marquis of Argyle's Speech at the Meeting between the Scots Commissioners and Committees of both Houses.] This day, the Scots commissioners sent a Paper to the lords to inform them, That the marquis of Argyle was lately arrived from Scotland, and had somewhat to communicate to both houses by command; they desired, therefore, that a time and place might be appointed for that purpose. On which message the lords ordered, That a committee of 20 of their house, and a proportionable number of the commons, should meet the marquis, in the Painted-Chamber, on the 25th inst. and that such other lords as pleased might be present.

June 26. The earl of Manchester made a report to the lords of what passed the day before in the Painted Chamber; where he said the marquis of Argyle delivered himself to the committee of lords and commons in the following speech:*

"My lords and gentleman; Though I have had the honour to be named by the kingdom of Scotland in all the commissions which had relation to this kingdom since the beginning of this war, yet I had never the happiness to be with your lordships till now; wherein I reverence God's providence, that he hath brought me hither at such an opportunity, when I may boldly say, it is in the power of the two kingdoms, yea, I may say in your lordships power, to make us both happy, if you make good use of this occasion, by settling of Religion, and the Peace and Union of these Kingdoms. The work of reformation in these kingdoms is so great a work, as no age nor history can parallel since Christ's days; for no one nation had ever such a reformation set forth unto them, much less three kingdoms: so that this generation may truly think themselves happy if they can be instrumental in it. And as the work is very great, so it cannot be expected but it must have great and powerful enemies, not only flesh and blood, which hate to be reformed, but 'principalities and powers, the rulers of the darkness of this world, and spiritual wickednesses in high places.' As the dangers are great, we must look the better to our duties; and the best way to perform these, is to keep us by the rules which are to be found in our National Covenant, principally the Word of God, and, in its own place, the example of the best Reformed Churches; and, in our way, we must beware of some rocks, which are temptations, both upon the right and left hand, so that we must hold the middle path. Upon the one part we should take heed not to settle lawless liberty in Religion, whereby, instead of uniformity, we should set up a thousand heresies and schisms, which is directly contrary and destructive to our Covenant. Upon the other part we are to look that we persecute not piety and peaceable men, who cannot, through scruple of conscience, come up in all things to the common rule: but that they may have such a forbearance as may be according to the Word of God, may consist with the Covenant, and not be destructive to the rule itself, nor to the peace of the church and kingdom; wherein I will insist no further, either to wrong your lordships patience or judgments, who, I doubt not, will be very careful to do every thing according to our Covenant. As to the other point, concerning the Peace and Union of these Kingdoms; I know it is that which all profess they desire; I hope it is what all do aim at: sure I am, it is that which all men ought to study and endeavour. And I think it not amiss to remember your lordships of some former experiences, as an argument to move us to be wise for the future. If the kingdom of England, in the year of God 1640, then sitting in parliament, had concurred, as they were desired, against the kingdom of Scotland, no question we had been brought to many difficulties, which, blessed be God, was, by the wisdom of the honourable houses, prevented: so, likewise, when this kingdom was in difficulties, if the kingdom of Scotland had not willingly, yea cheerfully sacrificed their peace to concur with this kingdom, your lordships all know what might have been the danger: therefore let us hold fast that union which is so happily established betwixt us; and let nothing make us again two, who are so many ways one; all of one language, in one island, all under one king, one in religion, yea one in Covenant; so that, in effect, we differ in nothing but in name, (as brethren do) which I wish were also removed, that we might be altogether one, if the two kingdoms shall think fit: for I dare say, not the greatest kingdom in the earth can prejudice both, so much as one of them may do the other.—I will forbear at this time to speak of the many Jealousies I hear are suggested, for as I do not love them, so I delight not to mention them: only one I cannot forbear to speak of, as if the kingdom of Scotland were too much affected with the king's interest. I will not deny but the kingdom of Scotland, by reason of the reign of many kings, his progenitors, over them, hath a natural affection to his majesty, whereby they wish he may be rather reformed than ruined: yet experience may tell their personal regard to him hath never made them forget that common rule, 'The Safety of the People is the supreme Law.' So likewise their love to monarchy makes them very desirous that it may be rather regulated than destroyed; which I hope I need not to mention further to your lordships, who, I trust, are of the same mind.—I know likewise there are many jealousies and unjust aspersions cast upon the Scots armies in England and Ireland: I can, if it were needful, presently produce heads of a Declaration intended by the Army in England for vindicating themselves from such injuries, and shewing the clearness of their resolutions and integrity, both in the cause and towards this kingdom; wherein their undertakings and coming in at such a season of the year, their hard sufferings and constant endeavours since, may be sufficient testimonies: therefore I am the more bold to desire your lordships, That so long as they stay in England, which I wish may be for a short time, they may be supplied with some monies, and their quarters enlarged; lest their lying in too narrow quarters make the burthen insupportable to that exhausted corner of the country where they now remain, and so beget outcries against them, when they are not enabled to discharge their quarters, as other armies within the kingdom.—As for the Army in Ireland; I have been an eye-witness to their sufferings, and so may speak of it likewise upon certain knowledge, that never men have suffered greater hardships, who might have been provided for; they have lived many times upon a few beans, measured out to them by number, and never had any other drink but water; and when they were in some better condition, they had but an Irish peck of rough oats for a whole week; and now, at their best condition, when they are quartered upon the country (which is able to entertain them only for a very short time) they have only an Irish peck of oatmeal, or a shilling in ten days both for meat and drink. Therefore, according to the many desires given in to the honourable houses for that end, I humbly intreat that your lordships will take care to provide for them, so long as it is thought fit that they remain in that kingdom.—For a renewed testimony of our earnest desires to comply with the honourable houses for settling the Peace of these kingdoms, so much longed for, we do return unto your lordships the Propositions of Peace (which we received on Tuesday last) with our consent thereunto, wishing they may be hasted to his majesty, who hath so often called for them. And I likewise offer to your lordships the copy of his majesty's Letter to my lord of Ormond, discharging him from any further meddling in any Treaty with the rebels in Ireland, (p. 437.) I hope in order to his majesty's further condescending to the settling of that Proposition concerning Ireland, and the rest of the Propositions now to be sent unto him.—Another Paper there is, which concerns the supplying of the Scots Armies in England and Ireland, and the perfecting of the accounts between the kingdoms, together with a letter from general-major Monroe, to the committee of estates of the kingdom of Scotland, concerning the State of Affairs in Ireland. All which, when your lordships have considered, I trust ye will take such course therein as may satisfy our just desires, may put an end to our present troubles, and settle these kingdoms in a happy peace."

Both Houses order a Maintenance for the Duke of York.] June 27. The lords were informed, by a letter from sir Tho. Fairfax, that the duke of York intended shortly to come to London, and desired that four coaches and six horses might be appointed to attend him; also that some course might be taken for money to maintain him, he being now in much want. The lords ordered this intelligence to be communicated to the commons, and that it should be referred to the committee of the revenue, to make some provision of money for his maintenance; which the commons agreed to.—The parliament, on the duke's arrival, had all the king's children, except the prince of Wales, in their custody. The princess Elizabeth and the duke of Gloucester had been at St. James's House ever since the king left it. And the youngest princess, Henrietta, of whom the queen was delivered at Exeter, was taken in that city at the last rendition of it. The countess of Dalkeith, whom the queen had left governess over this child when she went into France, had often applied to parliament for some allowance of Money for the support of it; or, at least, that she might be repaid the money she had laid out herself for that purpose. But though the lady's petitions on this score were always strongly recommended by the lords to the house of commons, no allowance was made: upon which the countess took an opportunity to slip away with her young charge, and conveyed it safe to its mother in France.

The Commons require the Princes Rupert and Maurice to leave the Kingdom.] June 29. About this time also the king's two nephews, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, who had served their uncle very gallantly and faithfully; and by the articles of the Surrender of Oxford, had leave given them, by sir Tho. Fairfax, to go where they pleased, went accordingly to Oatlands in Surrey, one of the king's palaces; which the House of Commons hearing of, they sent them word to depart from thence and out of the kingdom in ten days time.—On the 25th of this month the commons divided on the question, Whether the two Princes should have leave to reside at Oatlands? it was carried against them, 75 to 63. The next day the resolution for their Banishment was carried by 75 to 62. But, before their departure, they thought fit to address the following submissive Letter to the house of lords:

For the Speaker of the House of Peers, my Lord of MANCHESTER; Oatlands, June

"My lord; Our earnest desire to your lordship is, that you will be pleased to represent to the house of lords, that, upon the clear apprehension that we had of the sense of the articles concerning the Surrender of Oxford, and our pass from the general, we departed to Oatlands, as in our way, and for some time a convenient distance for our address to the parliament; that as soon as we had received the Votes of the house of commons, declaring that, by our coming hither, we had broken the articles, and commanding us, within ten days, to depart to the sea side, and forthwith to depart the kingdom, we did instantly resolve to move from this place, as soon as in any possibility we could, and to apply ourselves to give them satisfaction concerning our coming hither. We beseech your lordship to make it known to the lords in parliament, that, if we could have conceived it would have given any offence, we would not have come hither; and now, upon knowledge that it hath, we are removed: and though we do not know whether your lordships have taken into consideration our coming hither, yet have we ventured to offer you and their lordships this trouble, for prevention of any apprehensions they may have of any thought in us to do any thing that we could conceive might offend the houses of parliament, to hinder ourselves from the happiness of receiving benefit or favour from them, which we value too much to lose; and which we will not fail to keep by our utmost and best endeavours. My lord, we are your lordship's faithful friends to serve you, RUPERT. MAURICE."

We do not find that the lords took any notice of this Letter; all we meet with about them is, That, on the humble request of their brother the Prince Elector, who was then at London, and in the parliament's good graces, he was permitted to see them before their departure: a few days after this they both embarked at Dover, as did also the Prince of Wales from the Isle of Jersey, for France.

Order of Parliament against Papists, Irishmen, and Oxford Cavaliers.] July 2. An Order of both houses was made for all Papists and Irish to be put out of the lines of communication, (then drawn round the city and suburbs) and out of all corporations. That those also who came from Oxford, on the rendition of that place, or any of the king's garrisons, should be in their lodgings by nine o'clock; to make them shew their passes and disarm them; and that they engage never to bear arms against the parliament. This Order to be published by beat of drum and sound of trumpet.*

The Propositions of Peace sent to the King.] July 6. After many months canvassing the Propositions to be sent to the king for a safe and well-grounded Peace, and after many altercations, messages, conferences, divisions in and between the two houses, and consultations with the Scots commissioners about them, they were at last agreed to by all, and brought to a conclusion. They were read this day for the last time, and the lords ordered that they should immediately be sent to the king, and deputed the earls of Pembroke and Suffolk from their house, joined with a proportionable number of the commons, to carry them. A copy of which Propositions will fall in the sequel; for they were not sent away for some days.

Proceedings against Col. Lilburne before the House of Lords, for aspersing the Earl of Manchester, &c.] July 10. The lords having given orders for the prosecution of colonel John Lilburne in their house, and that the attorney-general and the king's counsel should prepare and exhibit Articles against him; this day the Charge was brought in and read as follows:

ARTICLES exhibited before the lords in parliament assembled, by sir Nathaniel Finch, knt. one of his majesty's serjeants at Law, against lieutenant colonel John Lilburne, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors done and committed by him.

"Whereas the right hon. Edward earl

* On this Order, Mr. Whitlocke makes this reflection: "Thus we may see, that, even after almost a conquest, yet they apprehended no safety; such are the issues and miseries of a Civil War, that the victors are full of fears from those they have subdued. No quiet, no security. Oh! let our prayers be to God never to have such calamitous times again."

of Manchester, by the space of divers years last past, hath been and yet is one of the peers of this realm; and whereas the said earl was, by ordinance of parliament, appointed general of divers forces raised by the parliament, the said John Lilburne, intending to scandalize and dishonour the said earl, and to raise discord between him and other subjects of this realm, hath, in a certain Book hereunto annexed, and by him contrived, and caused to be printed and published, intituled 'The just Man's Justification; or a Letter by way of Plea in bar,' falsely and scandalously affirmed and published certain passages concerning the said earl of Manchester, and his demeanors in his said office and employment; viz. I. Touching the complaint by the said Lilburne alledged to be made by him and others to the said earl, as follows, at page 2. 'I complained to the earl of Manchester against colonel King, being both his general and mine, and at the same time of divers gentlemen of the committee of Lincoln, as Mr. Archer, &c. and having Articles of a very high nature against him, pushed my lord to a trial of him at a council of war; and at the very same time the mayor, aldermen, and town clerk of Boston came to Lincoln to my lord, with Articles of a superlative nature against the said colonel King their governor, but could not get my lord to do them justice at a council of war, contrary to all our expectations, as of right we ought to have had; which at present saved his head upon his shoulders.' And, in page 8 and 9 of that Book, did affirm these words, viz. 'We could not at all prevail, the reason of which we are not able to render, unless it were that King's two chaplains, Lee and Garter, prevailed with the earl's two chaplains, Ash and Good, to cast a clergy mist over their lord's eyes, that he should not be able to see any deformity in colonel King.' II. The said Lilburne, within 3 months last past, in a certain Book by him contrived, and caused to be printed and published, hereunto annexed, intituled 'The Freeman's Freedom vindicated; or, A true Relation of the Cause and Manner of Lient. Colonel John Lilburne's present Imprisonment in Newgate, being thereunto arbitrarily and illegally committed by the house of peers, June 11, 1646, for his deliv'ering in at their open bar, under his hand and seal, his protestation against their encroaching upon the common liberties of all the commons of England; by endeavouring to try him, a commoner of England, in a criminal cause, contrary to the express tenor and form of the 29th chapter of the Great Charter of England; and for making his legal and just Appeal to his competent, proper, and legal tryers and judges, the commons of England, in parliament assembled,' did falsely and scandalously, in the 8th page of that book, publish and affirm, concerning the said earl of Manchester, these false and scandalous words, 'I clearly perceive the hand of Joab to be in this, namely, my old back-friend the earl of

‘Manchester, the fountain, as I conceive, of ‘all my present troubles; who would have ‘hanged me for taking a Castle from the cava‘liers in Yorkshire, and is so closely glued in ‘interest to that party, that he protected from ‘justice colonel King, one of his own officers, ‘for his good Service in traiterously delivering ‘or betraying Crowland to the Cavaliers; and ‘never called, nor that I could hear desired to ‘call, to account his officer or officers that ‘basely, cowardly, and treacherously betrayed
 ‘and delivered Lincoln up to the enemy, with‘out striking one stroke, or staying till so much ‘as a troop of horse or a trumpeter came to ‘demand it. His lordship’s head, it seems,
 ‘had stood too long upon his shoulders, that ‘makes him he cannot be quiet till lieut.
 ‘General Cromwell’s charge against him, fully ‘proved in the house of commons, be revived, ‘which is of as high a nature, I believe, as ‘ever any charge given in there; the epi-‘tome of which I have by me, and his lordship ‘may live to see it shortly in print by my means.’

—And the said Lilburne, in the Book and page last mentioned, in scandal and dishonour of Henry earl of Stamford, a peer of this kingdom, and a late commander of forces of the parliament, maketh this scandalous expression, viz. ‘And for my lord of Stamford, at present
 ‘I desire him but to remember one Article ‘made at the delivery of Exeter, which it may ‘be, in time, will cool his furious endeavours ‘to enslave the free people of England.’ III.
 Whereas the said Lilburne, upon the 11th of June last past, by virtue of the Order of the peers assembled in this present parliament, was brought to their bar, to answer concerning the said Book in the said first Article mentioned; the said Lilburne intending, falsely and maliciously, to scandalize and dishonour the peers assembled in parliament, and their just rights and authorities, did then and there, in contempt of the said house of peers, at the open bar, the peers then sitting, openly deliver a certain Paper hereunto annexed, under his hand and seal intitled ‘The Protestation, Plea, ‘and defence of lieutenant-colonel John Lil‘burne, given to the Lords at their Bar, the ‘11th June, 1646, with his Appeal to his com‘petent, proper, and legal tryers and judges, ‘the commons of England in parliament as‘sembled,’ which Paper is hereunto annexed, and since caused the same to be printed and published; in which Paper, amongst many other scandals therein contained, he published and affirmed, concerning the lords in parliament, these words following, viz. ‘Therefore,
 ‘my lords, you being, as you are called, peers, ‘merely made by prerogative, and never in‘trusted or impowered by the commons of ‘England, &c.’ And in another place thereof, concerning the lords and their proceedings in parliament, did protest and publish these words following, ‘I do here, at your open bar, pro‘test against all your present proceedings with ‘me, in this pretended criminal cause, as un‘just, and against the tenor and form of the ‘Great Charter, which all you have sworn ‘inviolably to observe, and caused the com‘mons of England to do the same; and there‘fore my lords, I do hereby declare, and am ‘resolved, as in duty bound to God, myself, ‘country, and posterity, to maintain my legal ‘liberties to the last drop of my blood, against ‘all opposers whatsoever; having so often in ‘the field adventured my life therefore; and ‘do from you, and your bar, as incroachers ‘and usurping judges, appeal to the bar and ‘tribunal of my competent, proper, and legal ‘tryers and judges, the commons of England ‘assembled in parliament.’ And, in pursuance of his said malicious and illegal practice, did afterwards contrive and publish a scandalous and libellous Letter, hereunto likewise annexed, directed to Mr. Walloston, keeper of Newgate, or his deputy; wherein, among other things, he hath caused to be inserted and published these words concerning the peers in parliament, viz. ‘Their lordships sitting by virtue ‘of their prerogative patents, and not by elec‘tion or consent of the people, have, as Magna ‘Charta, and other good laws of the land tell ‘me, nothing to do to try me, or any commoner ‘whatsoever, in any criminal cause, either for ‘life, limb, liberty, or estate: but contrary ‘hereunto, as encroachers and usurpers upon ‘my freedom and liberty, they have lately and ‘illegally endeavoured to try me, a commoner, ‘at their bar; for which I, under my hand and ‘seal, protested to their faces against them, as ‘violent and illegal encroachers upon the rights ‘and liberties of me and all the commons of ‘England, a copy of which I herewith in print

 ‘send you: and at their bar I openly appealed ‘to my competent, proper, and legal tryers and ‘judges, the commons of England assembled ‘in parliament; for which their lordships did ‘illegally, arbitrarily, and tyrannically, commit ‘me to prison into your custody;’ which Pro-testation and Papers, and matters therein contained, do falsely, scandalously, and maliciously charge the peers in parliament with tyranny, usurpation, perjury, injustice, and breach of the great trust in them reposed; and are an high breach of the privilege of parliament, and are high offences against the laws and statutes of this kingdom; and do tend to the great scandal of the peers, and the authority with which they are invested, and stir up difference between the said peers and others of the subjects of this realm. NATHANIEL FINCH.”

A printed Paper was also brought into the house, intitled

The Sum of the CHARGE given in by Lieutenant General Cromwell against the Earl of Manchester.*

 always indisposed and backwards to engagements, and against the ending of the war by the sword, and for such a peace to which a victory would be a disadvantage; and hath declared this by principles express to that purpose, and a continued series of carriage and actions answerable; and since the taking of York (as if the parliament had then advantage enough) he hath declined whatever tended to further advantage upon the enemy; neglected and studiously shifted off all opportunities to that purpose, as if he thought the king too low and the parliament too high; especially at Dennington-Castle, where he had drawn the army into and detained them in such a posture as to give the enemy fresh advantages, and this before his conjunction with the other armies, by his own absolute will, against or without his council of war, against many commands from the committee of both kingdoms, and with contempt and vilifying of those commands; and since the conjunction of the armies, sometimes against councils of war, and sometimes persuading and deluding the council to neglect one opportunity with pretence of another, and that again of a third; and at last, when none other pretence would serve, by persuading them that it was not fit to fight at all. That after this lieutenant general Cromwell expressed a larger account, yet nothing but truth, and what was sufficiently proved at a select committee of the house of commons, whereof Mr. Lisle had the chair; which charge, with proofs thereupon, was reported to the house and there debated; and a home vote thereupon passed above a year ago, before the house was recruited with new members; whereupon a potent Northern knight (Sir Philip Stapylton) one of Manchester's special friends, made a very earnest motion, That lieutenant general Cromwell might, with his horse, be sent immediately to relieve Taunton, as you may read in the 35th page of 'England's Birth-Right;' by means of which the charge hath lain dormant ever since, although it may be spoken upon very good grounds, that it is a charge of as high a nature as ever was given into that house; and therefore it is hoped, either the lieutenant general, or some of the new members, will discharge a good conscience by pressing the reviving of it, that so treachery may receive its due desert, and the kingdom have justice upon its enemies."

The lords having debated some time on this affair, ordered, 1. "That all the before-mentioned Papers should be burnt by the Hangman the next day at the New Palace in Westminster, and at the Old Exchange in London; and that the sheriffs of London and Middlesex do protect the hangman in the execution of this Order to prevent any affronts being offered him." 2. That col. Lilburne be brought to the house the next morning in safe custody by the sheriffs. 3. That the gentleman usher do search in Westminster for all printed copies of the Papers read this day, intituled, 'The Sum of the Charge given in by lieutenant colonel Cromwell against the earl of Manchester,' and bring them and the Letters before this house presently.

July 11. Colonel Lilburne was brought again to the bar of the house of lords to hear his Charge read, and make Answer to it. The whole proceeding on which we give from their Journals, as follows: "Being commanded by the house to kneel as a delinquent, he refused so to do, saying, 'He would not.' Then the lords commanding his Charge to be read to him, he said, 'He would not hear, he having appealed to the house of commons from their house, to which he would stand as long as he had life;' and, upon reading of the Charge, he stopped his ears with his fingers, and would not hear it read; whereupon it was moved by Mr. Serjeant Finch, one of the king's counsel, That this being as great an affront as could be offered to so great a court as this is, he might be made to hear his charge read; and the political enthusiast, young as he was, had gained a high esteem with the populace, who were enraged at what they called his hard usage; and many papers, and some pamphlets, were printed and dispersed about the city to incite an insurrection in his favour. One of these is in our collection, intituled, 'A Remonstrance of many thousand citizens, and other freeborn people of England, to their own house of commons, occasioned through the illegal and barbarous imprisonment of that famous and worthy sufferer for his country's freedom, lieutenant colonel John Lilburne: wherein their just demands, in behalf of themselves and the whole kingdom, concerning their public safety, peace, and freedom, is expressed; calling those their commissioners in parliament to an account, how they (since the beginning of their session to this present) have discharged their duties to the universality of the People, their sovereign lord, from whom their power and strength is derived, and by whom, ad bene placitum, it is continued.' In the frontispiece is a print of our hero, looking through the bars of a prison: over his head is inscribed, 'The Liberty of the Freeborn Englishman, conferred upon him by the house of lords, June 11, 1646,' with his coat of arms annexed: and underneath, these lines:

Gaze not upon this shadow that is vain,
But rather raise thy thoughts a higher strain:
To God, I mean, who set this young man free,
And, in like straits can eke deliver thee.
Yea, though the lords have him in bonds again,
The Lord of Lords will his just cause maintain."

* Colonel Lilburne was first imprisoned by a sentence of the Court of Star-Chamber, in the year 1637, being then only 19 years of age; but was discharged by parliament in 1640.

court upon this commanded him to withdraw. Then, after debate, it was ordered he should be called in and admonished; and told that, by stopping his ears and ill language and deportment, he hath deprived himself of what favour he might have had in this house; wherefore the lords commanded him to hear his Charge read without stopping his ears: he answered, 'He had appealed from this house to their lordships not being his competent judges, to the house of commons, which he will stand to as long as he hath any blood in his body.' Upon this the house commanded the Charge to be read to him; but he said he would not hear it read, and still stopped his ears whilst it was read. When it was read, the Speaker asked him what he said to his Charge? He answered, 'He heard nothing of it; he had nothing to do with it; but would stand to his protestation; and having appealed from their lordships, and protested against them as unrighteous judges, to those judges who are to judge both him and their lordships, the house of commons assembled in parliament, he did render up his body to their lordships fury.' Hereupon he was again commanded to withdraw; and the lords, upon consideration of the whole matter of the Charge, taking his refusal to answer, pro confesso; and also considering the high contempt of the honour and dignity of the house, shewed by his words and speeches this day at their bar, which were contained in his Charge, did adjudge, "1. That lieut. col. John Lilburne, for his high contempt to the honour of this house, be fined 4000*l.* to the king. 2. That he shall be imprisoned in the Tower of London during the space of 7 years. 3. That he shall be incapable to bear any office or place, military or civil, in church or commonwealth, during his life." It was also ordered, That the Pamphlet, intituled, 'The just Man's Justification; or, a Letter by way of Plea in Bar;' and the Pamphlet, intituled, 'The Freeman's Freedom vindicated,' mentioned in the Charge against lieut. colonel John Lilburne, shall be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, in the presence of the sheriffs or their officers, on Monday morning next at ten of the clock, at the Old Exchange in London, and at the New Palace Yard in Westminster."

The Propositions of Peace from the Parliament, presented to the King at Newcastle.]

Next was read, a copy of the Propositions for Peace, which were now ordered to be sent away to the king with all convenient speed, and to be printed and published:

The PROPOSITIONS of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, for a safe and well-grounded Peace.*

"May it please your majesty; We the lords and commons, assembled in the parliament of England, in the name, and on the behalf of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, in the name, and on the behalf of the kingdom of Scotland, do humbly present unto your majesty the humble desires and Propositions for a safe and well-grounded Peace, agreed upon by the parliaments of both kingdoms respectively, unto which we do pray your majesty's assent; and that they, and all such bills as shall be tendered to your majesty in pursuance of them, or any of them, may be established and enacted for statutes and acts of parliament, by your majesty's royal assent in the parliaments of both kingdoms respectively.—Whereas both houses of the parliament of England have been necessitated to undertake a war in their just and lawful defence; and afterwards both kingdoms of England and Scotland, joined in Solemn League and Covenant, were engaged to prosecute the same: I. That by act of parliament in each kingdom respectively, all Oaths, Declarations, and Proclamations heretofore had, or hereafter to be had, against both or either of the houses of parliament of England, the parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, and the late Convention of Estates in Scotland, or committees flowing from the parliament or convention in Scotland, or their Ordinances and Proceedings; or against any for adhering unto them; or for doing or executing any office, place, or charge, by any authority derived from them; and all judgments, indictments, outlawries, attainders, and inquisitions, in any the said causes; and all grants thereupon made or had, or to be made or had, be declared null, suppressed and forbidden: and that this be publicly intimated in all parish churches within his majesty's dominions, and all other places needful.—II. That his majesty, according to the laudable example of his royal father, of happy memory, may be pleased to swear and sign the late Solemn League and Covenant; and that an act of parliament be passed in both kingdoms respectively, for enjoining the taking thereof by all the subjects of the three kingdoms; and the Ordinances concerning the manner of taking the same in both kingdoms, be confirmed by acts of parliament respectively, with such penalties, as, by mutual advice of both kingdoms, shall be agreed upon.—III. That a Bill be passed for the utter abolishing and taking away of all archbishops, bishops, their chancellors and commissaries, deans and sub-deans, deans and chapters, arch-deacons, canons, and prebendaries; and all chanters, chancellors, treasurers, sub-treasurers, succentors, and sacrists; and all vicars choral and choristers, old vicars and new vicars, of any cathedral or collegiate church, and all other their under officers, out of the church of England, and dominion of Wales; and out of the church of Ireland, with such alterations concerning the estates of prelates, as shall agree with the Articles of the late Treaty, of the date at Edinburgh, Nov. 29, 1643, and joint Declaration of both kingdoms.—IV. That the Ordinances concerning the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines, be confirmed by act of parliament.—V. That reformation of Religion, according to the Covenant, be settled by act of parliament, in such manner as both houses have agreed, or shall agree upon, after consultation had with the Assembly of Divines.—VI. For as much as both kingdoms are mutually obliged by the same Covenant, to endeavour the nearest conjunction and uniformity in matters of Religion, That such unity and uniformity in religion according to the Covenant, as, after consultation had with the Divines of both kingdoms now assembled, is or shall be jointly agreed upon by both houses of parliament of England, and by the church and kingdom of Scotland, be confirmed by acts of parliament of both kingdoms respectively.—VII. That for the more effectual disabling Jesuits, Priests, Papists, and Popish Recusants from disturbing the state, and eluding the laws; and for the better discovering, and speedy conviction of recusants, an Oath be established by act of parliament, to be administered to them; wherein they shall abjure and renounce the Pope's supremacy, the doctrine of transubstantiation, purgatory, worshipping the Consecrated host, crucifixes and images, and all other popish superstitions and errors; and refusing the said Oath, being tendered in such manner as shall be appointed by the said act, to be a sufficient conviction of recusancy.—VIII. That an act of parliament be passed for Education of the children of Papists by protestants, in the protestant religion.—IX. That an act be passed for the true levy of the penalties against them; which penalties to be levied and disposed in such manner as both houses shall agree on; wherein to be provided that his majesty shall have no loss.—X. That an act be passed in parliament, whereby the practices of Papists against the state may be prevented, and the laws against them duly executed, and a stricter course taken to prevent the saying or hearing of Mass in the court, or any other part of this kingdom.—XI. The like for the kingdom of Scotland, concerning the 4 last preceding Propositions, in such manner as the Estates of the parliament there shall think fit.—XII. That the king do give his royal assent to an act for the due Observation of the Lord's day. To the bill for the Suppression of Innovations in Churches and Chapels, in and about the worship of God, &c. For the better advancement of the preaching of God's Holy Word in all parts of this kingdom: To the bill against the enjoying of Pluralities of Benefices by spiritual persons, and non-residency: To an act to be framed and agreed upon by both houses of parliament for the reforming and regulating of both Universities, of the Colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eaton. And to such act or acts for raising of Monies, for the payment and satisfying of the Public Debts and damages of the kingdom and other public uses, as shall hereafter be agreed on by both houses of parl.; and that if the king do not give his assent thereunto, then it being done by both houses of parliament, the same shall be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if the royal assent had been given thereunto. The like for the kingdom of Scotland. And that his majesty give assurance of his consenting, in the parliament of Scotland, to an act, acknowledging and ratifying the acts of the Convention of Estates of Scotland, called by the counsel and conservers of the peace, and the commissioners for the common burthens, and assembled the 22d day of June, 1643, and several times continued since, and of the parliament of that kingdom, since convened.—XIII. That the lords and commons in the parliament of England assembled, shall, during the space of 20 years, from the 1st of July, 1646, arm, train, and discipline, or cause to be armed, trained, and disciplined, all the forces of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales, the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, already raised, both for sea and land service; and shall, from time to time, during the said space of 20 years, raise, levy, arm, train, and discipline, or cause to be raised, levied, armed, trained, and disciplined, any other forces, for land and sea service, in the kingdoms, dominions, and places aforesaid, as in their judgments they shall, from time to time, during the said space of 20 years, think fit and appoint; and that neither the king, his heirs or successors, nor any other but such as shall act by the authority or approbation of the said lords and commons, shall, during the said space of 20 years, exercise any of the powers aforesaid. And the like for the kingdom of Scotland, if the Estates of the parliament there shall think fit. That Monies be raised and levied for the maintenance and use of the said forces for land service, and of the navy and forces for sea service, in such sort, and by such ways and means, as the said lords and commons shall, from time to time, during the said space of 20 years, think fit and appoint, and not otherwise; that all the said forces, both for land and sea service, so raised or levied, or to be raised or levied, and also the admiralty and navy, shall, from time to time, during the said space of 20 years, be employed, managed, ordered, and disposed by the said lords and commons in such sort, and by such ways and means, as they shall think fit and appoint, and not otherwise: and the said lords and commons, during the said space of 20 years, shall have power, 1. To suppress all forces raised, or to be raised, without authority and consent of the said lords and commons, to the disturbance of the public peace of the kingdoms of England, and Ireland, and dominion of Wales, the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, or any of them. 2. To suppress any foreign forces who shall invade, or endeavour to invade, the kingdoms of England and Ireland, dominion of Wales, the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, or any of them. 3. To conjoin such forces of the kingdom of England with the forces of the kingdom of Scotland, as the said lords and commons shall, from time to time during the said space of 20 years, judge fit and necessary: to resist all foreign invasions, and to suppress any forces raised, or to be raised, against, or within, either of the said kingdoms, to the disturbance of the public peace of the said kingdoms, or any of them, by any authority under the great seal, or other warrant whatsoever, without consent of the said lords and commons of the parliament of England, and the parliament or the estates of the parliament, of Scotland respectively: and that no forces of either kingdom shall go into, or continue in, the other kingdom, without the advice and desire of the said lords and commons of the parliament of England, and the parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, or such, as shall be by them appointed for that purpose: and that after the expiration of the said 20 years neither the king, his heirs or successors, or any person or persons, by colour or pretence of any commission, power, deputation, or authority to be derived from the king, his heirs or successors, or any of them, shall raise, arm, train, discipline, employ, order, manage, disband, or dispose any of the forces, by sea or land, of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, the dominion of Wales, the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed; nor exercise any of the said powers or authorities, in the precedent Articles, mentioned and expressed to be, during the said space of 20 years, in the said lords and commons; nor do any act or thing concerning the execution of the said powers or authorities, or any of them, without the consent of the said lords and commons first had and obtained: that after the expiration of the said 20 years, in all cases wherein the lords and commons shall declare the safety of the kingdom to be concerned, and shall thereupon pass any bill or bills for the raising, arming, training, disciplining, employing, managing, ordering, or disposing of the forces by sea or land, of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, the dominion of Wales, Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, or of any part of the said forces; or concerning the admiralty and navy; or concerning the levying of monies for the raising, maintenance, or use of the said forces for land service; or of the navy, and forces for sea service, or of any part of them; and if that the royal assent to such bill or bills shall not be given in the house of peers, within such time after the passing thereof by both houses of parliament, as the said houses shall judge fit and convenient, that then such bill or bills, so passed by the said lords and commons as aforesaid, and to which the royal assent shall not be given as is herein before expressed, shall, nevertheless, after declaration of the said lords and commons made in that behalf, have the force and strength of an act or acts of parliament; and shall be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if the royal assent had been given thereunto. Provided, that nothing herein before contained shall extend to the taking away of the ordinary legal power of sheriffs, justices of peace, mayors, bailiffs, coroners, constables, headboroughs or other officers of justice, not being military officers, concerning the administration of justice; so as neither the said sheriffs, justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, coroners, constables, headboroughs, and other officers, nor any of them, do levy, conduct, employ, or command any forces whatsoever, by colour or pretence of any commission of array, or extraordinary command from his majesty, his heirs or successors, without the consent of the said lords and commons. And if any persons shall be gathered and assembled together in warlike manner, or otherwise, to the number of 30 persons, and shall not forthwith disband themselves, being required thereto by the said lords and commons, or command from them, or any by them especially authorized for that purpose, then such person and persons not so disbanding themselves, shall be guilty and incur the pains of high treason, being first declared guilty of such offence by the said lords and commons; any commission under the great seal, or other warrant, to the contrary notwithstanding. And he or they that shall offend herein, to be incapable of any pardon from his majesty, his heirs or successors; and their estates shall be disposed as the said lords and commons shall think fit, and not otherwise. Provided, that the city of London shall have and enjoy all their rights, liberties and franchises, customs and usages, in the raising and employing the forces of that city for the defence thereof, in as full and ample manner, to all intents and purposes, as they have, or might have, used or enjoyed the same at any time before the making the said act or proposition; to the end that city may be fully assured it is not the intention of the parliament to take from them any privileges or immunities in raising or disposing of their forces, which they have, or might have, used or enjoyed heretofore. The like for the kingdom of Scotland, if the Estates of the parliament there shall think fit.—XIV. That, by act of parliament, all peers made since the day that Edward lord Littleton, then lord-keeper of the Great Seal, deserted the parliament, and that the said Great Seal was surreptitiously conveyed away from the parliament, (being the 21st of May, 1642,) and who shall hereafter be made, shall not sit or vote in the parliament of England, without consent of both houses of parliament: and that all honour and title conferred on any, without consent of both houses of parliament, since the 20th of May, 1642, (being the day that both houses declared, That the king, seduced by evil counsel, intended to raise war against the parliament) be declared null and void. The like for the kingdom of Scotland; those being excepted whose patents were passed the Great Seal before the 4th of June, 1644.—XV. That an act be passed in the parliaments of both kingdoms respectively, for confirmation of the Treaties passed betwixt the two kingdoms, viz. the Large Treaty, the late Treaty for the coming of the Scots Army into England, and the settling of the Garrison of Berwick, of the 29th Nov. 1643, and the Treaty concerning Ireland, of the 6th Aug. 1642, for the bringing of 10,000 Scots into the province of Ulster, in Ireland, with all other Ordinances and proceedings passed betwixt the two kingdoms, and whereunto they are obliged by the aforesaid Treaties. That Algernon earl of Northumberland, John earl of Rutland, Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Robert earl of Essex, Theophilus earl of Lincoln, James earl of Suffolk, Robert earl of Warwick, Edward earl of Manchester, Henry earl of Stamford, Francis lord Dacres, Philip lord Wharton, Francis lord Willoughby, Dudley lord North, John lord Hunsdon, Wm. lord Grey, Edw. lord Howard of Escrick, Thomas lord Bruce, Ferdinando, lord Fairfax, Mr. Nath. Waldegrave, sir Edw. Bishop, sir Robert Owseley, sir John Maney, lord Cholmondely, sir Thomas Aston, sir Lewis Dives, sir Peter

Osbourne, Samuel Thornton, esq. sir John Lucas, John Blaney, esq. sir Tho. Chedle, sir Nich. Kemys, Hugh Lloyd, esq. sir Nich. Crisp, and sir Peter Rycant,—And all such of the Scots nation as have concurred in the Votes at Oxford, against the kingdom of Scotland, and their proceedings; or have sworn or subscribed the Declaration against the Convention and Covenant; and all such as have assisted the rebellion in the North, or the invasion in the South of the said kingdom of Scotland, or the late invasion made there by the Irish and their adherents, be removed from his majesty's councils, and be restrained from coming within the verge of the court; and that they may not, without the advice and consent of both houses of the parliament of England, or the estates in the parliament of Scotland respectively, bear any office, or have any employment concerning the state or commonwealth: and in case any of them shall offend therein, to be guilty of high treason, and incapable of any pardon from his majesty, and their estates to be disposed of as both houses of the parliament of England, or the estates of the parliament in Scotland respectively, shall think fit: and that one full third part, upon full value, of the estates of the persons aforesaid, made incapable of employment as aforesaid, be employed for the payment of the public debts and damages, according to the Declaration.—First Branch. That the late members, or any who pretended themselves late members, of either house of parliament, who have not only deserted the parliament, but have also sat in the unlawful assembly at Oxford, called or pretended by some to be a parliament, and voted both kingdoms traitors, and have not voluntarily rendered themselves before the last of October, 1644, be removed from his majesty's councils, and be restrained from coming within the verge of the court; and that they may not, without advice and consent of both kingdoms, bear any office, or have any employment concerning the state or commonwealth: and in case any of them shall offend therein, to be guilty of high treason, and incapable of any pardon by his majesty; and their estates to be disposed as both houses of parliament in England, or the estates of the parliament of Scotland respectively, shall think fit.—Second Branch. That the late members, or any who pretended themselves members, of either house of parliament, who have sat in the unlawful Assembly at Oxford, called or pretended by some to be a parliament, and have not voluntarily rendered themselves before the last of October, 1644, be removed from his majesty's councils, and restrained from coming within the verge of the court; and that they may not, without the advice and consent of both houses of parliament, bear any office, or have any employment concerning the state or commonwealth; and in case any of them shall offend therein, to be guilty of high treason, and incapable of any pardon from his majesty, and their estates to be disposed as both houses of the parliament of England shall think fit.—Third Branch. That the late members, or any who pretended themselves members, of either house of parliament, who have deserted the parliament, and adhered to the enemies thereof, and have not rendered themselves before the last of October, 1644, be removed from his majesty's councils, and be restrained from coming within the verge of the court; and that they may not, without the advice and consent of both houses of parliament, bear any office, or have any employment concerning the state or commonwealth: and in case any of them shall offend therein, to be guilty of high treason, and incapable of any pardon from his majesty, and their estates to be disposed as both houses of parliament in England shall think fit.

Fifth Qualification.—That all Judges and Officers towards the law, common or Civil, who have deserted the parliament, and adhered to the enemies thereof, be incapable of any place of judicature or office towards the law, common or civil; and that all serjeants, counsellors, and attornies, doctors, advocates, and proctors of the law, common or civil, who have deserted the parliament, and adhered to the enemies thereof, be incapable of any practice in the law, common or civil, either in public or private; and shall not be capable of any preferment or employment in the commonwealth, without the advice and consent of both houses of parliament: and that no bishop or clergyman, no master or fellow of any college or hall, in either of the universities, or elsewhere, or any master of school or hospital, or any ecclesiastical person, who hath deserted the parliament, and adhered to the enemies thereof, shall hold or enjoy, or be capable of any preferment or employment in church or commonwealth; but all their said several preferments, places, and promotions, shall be utterly void, as if they were naturally dead; nor shall they otherwise use their function of the ministry, without advice and consent of both houses of parliament; provided, that no lapse shall incur by such vacancy until six months past, after notice thereof.

Sixth Qualification.—That all persons who have been actually in arms against the parliament, or have counselled, or voluntarily assisted the enemies thereof, are disabled to be sheriffs, justices of the peace, mayors, or other head officers of any city or corporation, commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, or to sit or serve as members, or assistants in either of the houses of parliament, or to have any military employment in this kingdom, without the consent of both houses of parliament.

Seventh Qualification.—The persons of all others to be free of all personal censure, notwithstanding any act or thing done in or concerning this war, they taking the Covenant.

Eighth Qualification.—The estates of those persons excepted in the first three precedent Qualifications; and the Estates of Edward lord Littleton, and of William Laud, late archbishop of Canterbury, to pay public debts and damages.

Ninth Qualification.—First Branch. That two full parts in three, to be divided, of all the estates of the members of either house of parliament, who have not only deserted the parliament, but have also voted both kingdoms traitors, and have not rendered themselves before the 1st of Dec. 1645, shall be taken and employed for the payment of the public debts and damages of the kingdom.—Second Branch. That two full parts in three, to be divided, of the estates of such late members of either house of parliament, as sat in the unlawful Assembly at Oxford, and shall not have rendered themselves before the 1st Dec. 1645, shall be taken and employed for the payment of the public debts and damages of the kingdom.—Third Branch. That one full moiety of the estates of such persons, late members of either of the houses of parliament, who have deserted the parliament, and adhered to the enemies thereof, and shall not have rendered themselves before the 1st Dec. 1645, shall be taken and employed for the payment of the public debts and damages of the kingdom.

Tenth Qualification.—That a full third part of the value of the estates of all Judges and Officers towards the law, common or civil; and of all serjeants, counsellors, and attornies, doctors, advocates, and proctors of the law, common or civil; and of all bishops, clergymen, masters and fellows of any college or hall in either of the universities, or elsewhere; and of all masters of schools or hospitals and of ecclesiastical persons who have deserted the parliament, and adhered to the enemies thereof, and have not rendered themselves before the 1st Dec. 1645, shall be taken and employed for the payment of the public debts and damages of the kingdom. That a full sixth part of the full value of the estates of the persons excepted in the 5th Qualification, concerning such as have been actually in arms against the parliament, or have counselled or voluntarily assisted the enemies thereof, and are disabled according to the said Qualification, be taken and employed for the payment of the public debts and damages of the kingdom.

Eleventh Qualification.—That the persons and estates of all common soldiers, and others of the kingdom of England, who, in lands or goods, be not worth 200*l.* sterling; and the persons and estates of all common soldiers and others of the kingdom of Scotland, who, in lands or goods, be not worth 100*l.* sterling, be at liberty and discharged.—First Branch. This proposition to stand as to the English; and as to the Scots likewise, if the parliament of Scotland, or their commissioners, shall so think fit.—Second Branch. That the 1st of May last is now the day limited for the persons to come in, that are comprised within the former Qualification. That an act be passed, whereby the debts of the kingdom, and the persons of delinquents, and the value of their estates may be known; and which act shall appoint in what manner the confiscation and proportions before-mentioned may be levied, and applied to the discharge of the said engagements. The like for the kingdom of Scotland, if the estates of parliament, or such as shall have power from them, shall think fit.

XVII. That an act of parliament be passed, to declare and make void the Cessation of Ireland, and all Treaties and conclusions of Peace, or any Articles thereupon, with the rebels, without consent of both houses of parliament; and to settle the prosecution of the war of Ireland in both houses of the parliament of England to be managed by them; and the king to assist, and to do no act to discountenance or molest them therein. That Reformation of Religion, according to the Covenant, be settled in the kingdom of Ireland by act of parliament, in such manner as both houses of the parliament of England have agreed, or shall agree upon, after consultation had with the Assembly of Divines here. That the deputy or chief governor, or other governors of Ireland, and the presidents of the several provinces of that kingdom, be nominated by both houses of the parliaments of England, or, in the intervals of parliament, by such committees of both houses of parl. as both houses of the parl. of England shall nominate and appoint for that purpose: and that the chancellor, or lord-keeper, lord-treasurer, commissioners of the great seal or treasury, lord-warden of the cinque ports, chancellor of the exchequer and duchy, secretaries of state, master of the rolls, judges of both benches, and barons of the exchequer of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and the vice-treasurer and treasurers at wars of the kingdom of Ireland, be nominated by both houses of the parliament of England, to continue quandiu se bene gesserint; and, in the intervals of parliament, by the aforementioned committees, to be approved or disallowed by both houses at their next sitting.—The like for the kingdom of Scotland, concerning the nomination of the lords of the privy-council, lords of session and exchequer, officers of state, and justice-general, in such manner as the estates of the parliament there shall think fit.

XVIII. That the Militia of the city of London, and liberties thereof, may be in the ordering and government of the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled, or such as they shall, from time to time, appoint, (whereof the lord mayor and sheriffs, for the time being, to be three) to be employed and directed, from time to time, in such manner as shall be agreed on, and appointed by both houses of parliament. That no citizen of the city of London, nor any of the forces of the said city, shall be drawn forth or compelled to go out of the said city, or liberties thereof, for military service, without their own free consent. That an act be passed for the granting and confirming of the charters, customs, liberties, and franchises of the city of London, notwithstanding any nonuser, misuser, or abuser. That the Tower of London may be in the government of the city of London; and the chief officer and governor thereof, from time to time, be nominated and removeable by the common council: and, for the prevention of inconveniences which may happen by the long intermission of common councils, it is desired that there may be an act, That all bye-laws and ordinances already made, or hereafter to be made, by the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons, in common council assembled, touching the calling, continuing, directing, and regulating the same common councils, shall be as effectual in law, to all intents and purposes, as if the same were particularly enacted by the authority of parliament: and that the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons, in common council may add to, or repeal the said ordinances from time to time, as they shall see cause. That such other propositions as shall be made for the city, for their further safety, welfare, and government, and shall be approved of by both houses of parliament, may be granted and confirmed by act of parliament.

XIX. That all grants, commissions, presentations, writs, process, proceedings, and other things passed under the great seal of England, in the custody of the lords and others, commissioners appointed by both houses of parliament for the custody thereof, be, and, by an act with the royal assent, shall be, declared and enacted to be of like full force and effect, to all intents and purposes, as the same or like grants, commissions, &c. and other things under any great seal of England, in any time heretofore were, or have been; and that, for the time to come, the said great seal, now remaining in custody of the said commissioners, continue, and be used for the great seal of England; and that all grants, commissions, &c. and other things whatsoever, passed under, or by authority of any other great seal, since the 22d of May, 1642, or hereafter to be passed, be invalid and of no effect, to all intents and purposes; except such writs, process and commissions, as being passed under any other great seal than the said great seal in the custody of the commissioners aforesaid, on or after the said 22d of May, and before the 28th of Nov. 1643, were afterward proceeded upon, returned into, or put in use in any of the king's courts at Westminster: and except the grant to Mr. Justice Bacon, to be one of the justices of the King's Bench: and except all acts and proceedings by virtue of any such commissions of goal delivery, assize, and Nisi prius, or Oyer and Terminer, passed under any other great seal than the seal aforesaid, in custody of the said commissioners before the 1st of Oct. 1642. And that all grants of offices, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, made or passed under the great seal of Ireland unto any person or persons, bodies politick or corporate, since the cessation made in Ireland, the 15th Sept. 1643, shall be null and void; and that all honours and titles conferred upon any person or persons in the said kingdom of Ireland, since the said Cessation, shall be null and void."

The King's Answer to the Parliament's Desire of surrendering up all his Garrisons in Ireland.] Whilst the commissioners were on their journey, the houses received the king's Answer to their Letter desiring an order from his majesty to the marquis of Ormond, for surrendering up the Castle of Dublin, and all other garrisons in Ireland, to their use.

"C. R. His majesty having considered the Letter of the 6th instant, sent to him from the lords and commons in parliament assembled, thinks fit to return this Answer, That as none can be more deeply affected than his majesty with the past and present calamities of his kingdom of Ireland, nor is so nearly concerned in the preservation of his majesty's Protestant subjects, so he will be most ready to apply all future remedies for their deliverance: and as to the particulars of delivering, forthwith, of the city and castle of Dublin, the town of Drogheda, and all other garrisons in that kingdom, which are held by his majesty's authority, into the hands of such as the parliament shall appoint; his majesty being most willing that all those places may be so disposed as they may be best secured from the rebels, and serve most for the safety of his good subjects, doth again earnestly press that the Propositions, so long expected for the Peace of that and his other kingdoms, may be hastened to him; expecting that they will contain the readiest means, not only of preserving those places which are already in his power, but likewise of reducing the rest of that kingdom, possessed by the rebels, to his obedience. And as his majesty knows not a more speedy and effectual way for attaining those ends, than by removing all differences betwixt his majesty and the two houses of parliament; so nothing will be more earnestly endeavoured by his majesty, than that a solid and lasting Peace be forthwith established. Newcastle, July 11, 1646."

July 23. On the Surrender of Oxford, the Great Seal, and several other seals for different courts and offices, fell into the parliament's hands. And this day the lords ordered that the Great Seal should be defaced and broken; as also the seal for the Court of Wards, the Exchequer Seal, and the seal of the King's Bench, with those of the admiralty and prerogative court; but the privy seal, signet seal, and other smaller seals, were ordered to be locked up.

The Parliament refuse the French King's Offer of Mediation.] The French Ambassador, in a speech he made at his audience, had signified to the parliament, That his master, the French king, had offered to be a mediator of peace between the king of England and his parliament. And this day the following Answer being drawn up, was read, agreed to, and ordered to be sent to the ambassador:

"My lord; July 22, 1646.
"We do thankfully acknowledge the expressions we have received from the French king, of his majesty's good affections to this kingdom; and shall heartily endeavour, on our parts, the continuance of it: but as to his majesty's desires of mediating a Peace, and interposing betwixt our king and us, and to what was said by your excellency on that particular, and of your being sent to invite us to take or propound some conditions that might effect the same, we do declare that we ourselves have been careful to improve all occasions to compose these unhappy troubles, yet we have not, neither can we admit of any mediation or interposing betwixt the king and us, by any foreign prince or state. And we desire that his majesty, the French king, will rest satisfied with this our resolution and answer."

The King's Great Seal, &c. broken.] Aug. 11. Mention has been made of the parliament's being in possession of the Great Seal, and several other private and public Seals belonging to the king, and of the Orders made for the breaking of them: accordingly, this day, the same was performed in a very solemn manner, before the two houses, the commons being come up to the house of lords for that purpose; where the Great Seal, and the others beforementioned, were broken and defaced, and the silver of them ordered to be divided between the Speakers of both houses; but the Signet Seal and the Privy Seal, with those for foreign letters, were ordered to be put into the custody of the commissioners of the Broad Seal belonging to the parliament.

Report of the Proceedings of the Commissioners sent to the King.] Aug. 12. The commissioners of both houses being now returned from Newcastle, sir Walter Erle made the following Report of their proceedings to the commons, viz. "That the time of their arrival at Newcastle being Thursday the 23rd of the last month, about 9 of the clock in the forenoon, immediately upon their coming thither (because they would lose no time) they desired the lord-chancellor of Scotland and the marquis of Argyll, who were joint commissioners with them, to move the king, that he would be pleased to appoint a time when they might attend him with the Propositions which they had brought from the parliament: and they going to the king brought them back word, that his pleasure was, they should attend him the next day, at two in the afternoon; which accordingly they did. On Friday the Earl of Pembroke, after a short declaration of what they had in command, desired the Propositions might be read; which, the king assenting unto, was accordingly done: that a little while after they were begun to be read, he demanded of them, Whether they had any power to treat or debate upon them, or that he might ask them any questions for the explaining of them: that they answered that they had no such power: that the king then said, 'Your business is but to bring them, and a good honest trumpeter might have done as much, but for the honour

' of it.' The Propositions being read through and delivered unto him, they again, as at the first, humbly demanded his positive Answer and consent unto them; the commissioners for Scotland seconding the same, on the behalf of that kingdom. The king answered, 'He was sure they could not expect a present Answer from him in a business of that consequence.' This being done upon the Friday, (and they having heard nothing from him Saturday or Sunday) the Monday following they made their address unto him the same ways as before; and being appointed to attend him on Tuesday, came unto him accordingly, and put him in mind of their former desires of a positive Answer and consent to the Propositions; alledging they had but little time to stay there. The king told them, 'He knew their time limited; and against that time would prepare his Answer:' but no Answer being given the next day or the day following, Thursday in the afternoon they desired those two lords to move the king again for their dispatch: which on Friday morning they did; and told them the king would have put it off till Saturday night, but they had prevailed with him to grant Saturday morning; yet if they thought fit (for the more surety) to go, they would go with them that evening: which being resolved, they went unto him, and humbly craved his Answer and consent, as before: then the king told them, He would give them his answer the next morning, betwixt 10 and 11 of the clock. Accordingly, on Saturday morning, they attended; and humbly craved his positive Answer and consent to the Propositions, as they had formerly done; the earl of Pembroke humbly beseeching him to consider with himself the dangerous consequence that would follow to himself, his kingdoms and posterity, if he should not now do it. Then the king told them, He had drawn up his Answer in writing; which, after he had caused it to be read, he offered to deliver unto them: but they conceiving it not to be satisfactory, after some private consultation amongst themselves, came unto him, and desired to be excused; pressing him to a positive Answer and consent, and telling him, they must take the boldness to continue so doing till the last period of their time; and therefore prayed him to give them admittance again before their departure. He asked, when? They answered, That afternoon, if he pleased. He said that could not be, for he had other business to do: so the next morning was appointed, and they accordingly came unto him on the Lord's Day, before prayers, and pressed him, as they had done before, with importunity; but he told them he could not give them any other Answer than what he had set down in writing, and tendered unto them before: which he caused again to be read, urging them with much importunity to receive it. They thereupon craving leave to withdraw, and considering with themselves that they had used all the means they could for the obtaining a positive Answer and consent; and that no other answer could be gotten, but that which he had now the second time offered to them in writing, they returned back and spake these words, viz. 'They receive this Paper, now offered by your majesty, with this humble protestation, That it is without their approbation or consent, as to the taking of it for an Answer; and that it shall be no engagement to them, the commissioners, in any kind whatsoever.'

After this the commons ordered the Thanks of their house to be given to the lords commissioners and to the commissioners for Scotland, as well as to those of their own body that attended the king with the Propositions. The earl of Pembroke made the same report to the lords.

The King's Answer to the Propositions.] Next follows the king's Answer to the Propositions, as put into writing by his majesty, and delivered to the commissioners:

"C. R. The Propositions tendered to his majesty by the commissioners from the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England at Westminster, and the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland, (to which the houses of parliament have taken twice so many months for deliberation as they have assigned days for his majesty's Answer) do import so great alterations in government, both in the church and kingdom, as it is very difficult to return a particular and positive Answer, before a full debate, wherein these Propositions and the necessary explanations, true sense and reasons thereof, be rightly weighed and understood; and that his majesty, upon a full view of the whole Propositions, may know what is left, as well as what is taken away and changed: in all which his majesty finds, upon discourse with the said commissioners, that they are so bound up from any capacity either to give reasons for the demands they bring, or to give ear to such desires as his majesty is to propound, as it is impossible for him to give such a present judgment of, and Answer to, these Propositions, whereby he can answer to God, that a safe and well-grounded Peace will ensue; which is evident to all the world can never be, unless the just power of the crown, as well as the freedom and property of the subject, with the just liberty and privileges of parliament, be likewise settled. To this end his majesty desires and proposeth to come to London, or any of his houses thereabouts, upon the public faith and security of the two houses of his parliament, and the Scots commissioners, that he shall be there with freedom, honour, and safety; where, by his personal presence, he may not only raise a mutual confidence betwixt him and his people, but also have those doubts cleared, and those difficulties explained unto him, which he now conceives to be destructive to his just regal power, if he should give a full consent to these Propositions as they now stand: as likewise that he might make known to them such his reasonable demands, as he is most assured will be very much conducive to that happy peace which all good men desire and pray for; by settling of religion, the just privileges of parliament, with the freedom and property of the subject. And his majesty assures them, that as he can never condescend unto what is absolutely destructive to that just power which, by the laws of God and the land, he is born unto; so he will cheerfully grant and give his assent unto all such bills at the desire of his two houses, or reasonable demands for Scotland, which shall be really for the good and peace of his people, not having a regard to his own particular, much less of any body's else, in respect to the happiness of these kingdoms: wherefore his majesty conjures them, as Christians, as subjects, and as men who desire to leave a good name behind them, that they will so receive and make use of this Answer, that all issues of blood may be stopped, and these unhappy distractions peaceably settled. At Newcastle the 1st of August, 1646." P. S. Upon assurance of a happy agreement, his majesty will immediately send for the Prince, his son, absolutely answering for his perfect obedience, to return to this kingdom."

This Answer, the Journal observes, was read by the reporter, but not admitted to be read by the clerk.

Remonstrance of the Scots Commissioners in Vindication of their Nation, and offering to withdraw their Army.] The Speaker of the house of Lords presented a Letter which he had received from the Scots Commissioners, which was read, and a Paper inclosed therein; as follows:

"The same principles of brotherly affection, which did induce both kingdoms to a conjunction of their councils and forces in this cause, move us at this time to apply ourselves to the most real and effectual ways which tend to a speedy conclusion and amicable parting, and to the preventing of misunderstandings between the kingdoms in any of these things, which, peradventure, our common enemies look upon with much joy, as occasions of differences; for this end we have not taken notice of the many base calumnies and execrable aspersions cast upon the kingdom of Scotland in printed pamphlets, and otherwise; expecting, from the justice and wisdom of the honourable houses, that they will of themselves take such course for the Vindication of our Nation and Army, as the estates of Scotland have shewed themselves ready to do for them in the like case.— Upon the invitation of both houses, the kingdom of Scotland did cheerfully undertake, and hath faithfully managed, their assistance to this kingdom, in pursuance of the ends expressed in the Covenant. And the forces of the common enemy being, by the blessing of God upon the joint endeavours of both kingdoms, now broken and subdued, a foundation being also laid and some good progress made in the reformation of religion, which we trust the honourable houses will, according to the Covenant, sincerely, really, and constantly prosecute until it be perfected; that we may manifest, to the consciences of our brethren and to all the world, how far it is, and ever was, from the thoughts or intentions of the kingdom of Scotland to make use of their army in this kingdom to any other ends besides those expressed in the Covenant; and how much they desire the preserving and perpetuating of peace and amity between the kingdoms, and the easing of the burthens and pressures of this nation; we do declare in their name, That they are willing, forthwith, to surrender the garrisons possessed by them in this kingdom, which they did keep for no other end but the safety and security of their forces; and, without delay, to recall their army, reasonable satisfaction being given for their pains, hazards, charges, and sufferings; whereof a competent proportion to be presently paid to the army before their disbanding, and security to be given for the remainder at such times hereafter as shall be mutually agreed on.—If any forces shall be kept on foot in either kingdom, we desire that they may be put under the command of such persons as are known to be zealous for reformation and uniformity in religion, and most tender of the peace of the kingdoms, and against whom neither of the kingdoms may have any just cause of jealousy. And whereas the kingdom of Scotland hath been invaded, and is still infested by forces from Ireland, it is expected that the honourable houses, according to the Large Treaty, will give such assistance and supply to the kingdom of Scotland, as may speedily reduce those rebels to obedience. And, to the end there may in all things be a good understanding between the kingdoms, we further propose, That whereas Propositions for a safe and well-grounded Peace have been lately sent to the king in the name of both kingdoms; and, for obtaining his majesty's consent thereunto, the utmost endeavours of the kingdom of Scotland have not been wanting, as may appear by the many addresses, petitions, and solicitations to that end from the army, the lords of his majesty's privy council, the committee of estates, and the general assembly of the church; the success whereof hath not answered our wishes and hopes, his majesty, to our unspeakable grief, not yet having agreed to the Propositions; we desire that the honourable houses may be pleased to take such course as, by joint advice of both kingdoms engaged in the same cause, labouring under the same dangers, and aiming at the same ends, we may consult and resolve what is next to be done for the peace and safety of these kingdoms, both in relation to his majesty, and each kingdom to the other; being confident that the result of our joint consultations will be such as shall provide for the present and future security of the kingdoms, and strengthen their union between themselves. By Command of the Commissioners for the Parliament of Scotland. John Chiesley."

£.100,000 voted to the Scots Army, on Account.] Aug. 13. A conference being held between both houses on this subject, the earl of Pembroke acquainted the commons, "That he was commanded to give an account of the carriage of the Scots commissioners that did attend his majesty with the Propositions, and of the rest of the Scots lords, and of the whole nation there: that they did express much zeal, and faithfulness, and affection, to the cause; very much love and respect to the commissioners; faith, honour, and honesty in all their carriage; earnestness and freedom towards the king; freeness and clearness towards our commissioners, and would do nothing without them, and were never from them when their presence could do them any service."

Aug. 14. This being reported to the commons, the foregoing Paper inclosed therein was read, and the opinion of the lords thereupon. Then an Ordinance for punishing the printers and contrivers of all scandalous pamphlets or papers against the kingdom of Scotland, or their army residing here, was read; and a motion being made for a second reading thereof, it was carried in the affirmative by 130 voices against 102. Then it was resolved, without division, 1. "That the sum of 100,000*l.* be forthwith provided for the Scots Army, and paid unto them, upon the marching of their armies and forces out of this kingdom. 2. That the members of this House that are of the committee of both kingdoms, or any four of them, do communicate this vote to the Scots commissioners, and receive their answer thereunto: and that they do acquaint them, That upon the adjusting of the Accounts of their Armies and Forces, whatsoever shall appear to be due to them shall be paid them, according to the treaty."

*But the Scots demand 500,000*l.] Aug. 18. The commons authorized such of their members as were of the committee of both kingdoms, to confer with the Scots Commissioners, and to know, what sum would satisfy them for all demands from the kingdom of England, expressed in the before-mentioned Paper; what sum they expected to be paid, in present, before their disbanding, and what for the future, and at what times. And the next day Mr. Crew reported, by the word of mouth, That, in discourse, the Scots Commissioners said, "That they expected 600,000*l.* of which 300,000*l.* to be paid presently, and the remaining 300,000*l.* at such time as shall be agreed upon; but that considering the necessities of this kingdom, and the state of Ireland, they are content to take 200,000*l.* presently, and 300,000*l.* within a year."

The Pensions formerly allowed to Members, discontinued.] Aug. 20. The commons resolved, That the several Allowances of 4*l.* per week, granted to their own members, and all Pensions appointed to those of either house, be from henceforth discharged.*—But to return to the affair of the Scots Army.

* This Vote is thus commented upon by a Journalist of the times: "These Pensions were £.100,000 more voted for the Scots Army.] Aug. 21. The commons, having taken Mr. Crew's Report, before-mentioned, into consideration, resolved, 1. "That 200,000*l.* be provided for the Scots Army; whereof the first 100,000*l.* to be paid unto them, upon the marching of their Armies and Forces out of this kingdom, at such time and place as hereafter shall be expressed. 2. That the time shall be the 18th of Sept. next. 3. That it be referred to such members as are of the committee of both kingdoms, to confer with the commissioners of Scotland concerning the place for the payment of the first 100,000*l.* 4. That the second 100,000*l.* shall be paid at two equal payments; the first 50,000*l.* at the end of 3 months, and the second 50,000*l.* at the end of 9 months; both accounting from the 18th Sept. next." And the committee of the North, with the committee for the Army, were ordered to prepare a general Estimate of the Accounts of the Scots Army; to consider of the Estimate sent in by the Scots commissioners; and what shall be thought fit to be brought in, by way of Estimate, to balance that, or defalk from it, or surcharge upon it.

*A third Sum of 100,000*l.* voted for the Scots Army.*] Aug. 27. Mr. Stockdale reported a General Estimate of the Accounts of the Scots Army since their coming into England, as sent in by their commissioners; and another Estimate thereof, as stated by a committee of the house of commons, with several Objections to that delivered in by the Scots. After reading the Estimates, both English and Scots, and the Objections to the latter, the question was proposed, That such members as are of the committee of both kingdoms shall have power to offer unto the commissioners of Scotland, 100,000*l.* more than the 200,000*l.* already voted; to be paid unto them at the end of 12 months, to be accounted from the end of the 9 months whereon the last 50,000*l.* part of the said 200,000*l.* is ordered to be paid; and for a discharge of all demands from this kingdom, expressed in their Paper of the 18th of August, if they shall be content therewith; or, other-allowed to many members whose lands were wholly sequestered by the king, and some others; but the king's forces being, by God's mercy, now broken, and the kingdom under the command of the parliament, the house voted, That they should be taken off; that allowance being intended but for the supply of their necessity, while they were deprived of their own estates. Such is the care of that house, as clearly appeareth, to ease the kingdom of payments, and to ratify the debts due to those that want: let the people express their true thankfulness by their loving submission and obedience to their orders and commands, for it is not the least evil to the kingdom's prejudice, that men murmur against and are jealous of their preservers, which is the work and design of the enemy to foment." The Dove, No. 148, p. 12.

wise, to offer them to come to an account upon the first 200,000*l.* But, a motion being made for granting 200,000*l.* additional instead of one, this passed in the negative, by a majority of 108 against 101; and the proposal for only 100,000*l.* more was agreed to. Then this Vote was ordered to be communicated to the Scots Commissioners, and their Answer demanded.

*A fourth Sum of 100,000*l.* voted for the Scots Army.*] Sept. 1. The Scots commissioners having presented their Answer to the English Estimate and Exceptions, as also to the commons offer of 300,000*l.* and the same being twice read, a motion was made for taking it into present consideration, which was agreed to by a majority of 129 against 106: and then the question which had been rejected a few days before, for adding a fourth 100,000*l.* was carried by 140, against 101; but the commons resolved to adhere to their former Votes, as to the time and manner of the payment of the 300,000*l.* already voted; and that the time for the payment of this last 100,000*l.* now voted, should be at the end of 12 months, to be accounted from the time assigned for the payment of the last 100,000*l.* of the 300,000*l.* formerly voted. And this resolution, as the former had been, was ordered to be communicated to the Scots Commissioners, and their immediate Answer required; which being the next day reported by sir Henry Vane, junior, the commons again resolved to adhere to their former votes, as to the time and manner of the payment of the 400,000*l.* to the kingdom of Scotland; that such members of their house as were of the committee of both kingdoms, or any four of them, do, that afternoon, communicate the said resolution to the Scots commissioners, and offer to them reasons why the house doth adhere to their former votes; to confer with them about the place for receiving of their money; and to declare unto them, that it is expected that, upon the payment of the first 100,000*l.* as aforesaid, their armies and forces do march out of this kingdom. But, on the 4th of this month, the Scots commissioners, not satisfied with these Resolutions, presented three Papers to the house of lords, offering reasons for the present payment of 200,000*l.* The lords ordered the said Papers to be communicated to the commons; and the next day, the same being read there, a motion was made for adhering to their former votes, as to the time and manner of the payment of the 400,000*l.* to the kingdom of Scotland; but it passed in the negative, by 112 against 102. Immediately after which a committee was appointed to go to, and to have power to treat with, the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London, or any other persons, for borrowing 200,000*l.* as soon as might be, for the service of the state; to consider of all ways and means for raising of the said sum, and to offer securities for the same.—It was also ordered, that such members as are of the committee of both kingdoms, do confer with the Scots commissioners, and receive satisfaction from them concerning the delivery up of the Garrisons, and the marching of their Armies and forces out of this kingdom; and to desire them, if they want any powers, that they would speedily procure the same from the kingdom of Scotland; to the end the delivery up of the garrisons, and the marching away of their armies and forces, may be ascertained between the two kingdoms; and likewise to declare, whether they have instructions to make any other demands, before the marching away of their forces; and, if they have, what those other demands are.

Death of the Earl of Essex.] Sept. 14. This day died the parliament's late General, the earl of Essex. The houses being informed thereof the next day, they immediately adjourned, 'In sense of the sad loss of the earl of Essex, a person of such eminent worth and service to the parliament;' as their Journals express it.

The Lords agree to two Votes concerning the Disposal of the King's Person.] Sept. 24. A message came up from the commons, to put the lords in mind of two Votes concerning the Disposal of the Person of the King, which had laid before them a long time. After a long debate, the house being resumed, the question was put, Whether the two Votes, as sent up from the commons, should now pass? the numbers stood 11 and 11. Then a second question was put, Whether the house should sit that afternoon, and debate this business again? and it passed in the affirmative. Accordingly, at the said time, it was again debated, and both Votes were agreed to. A committee of 14 lords was likewise appointed to confer, consult, and debate on the subject of the foregoing Votes, with the Scots commissioners; and a proportionable number of the commons were desired to join with them, which they agreed to.

October. The chief business of this month was debating and disputing about the Disposal of the King's Person, in consequence of the foregoing Votes; the commons positively asserting it as the sole and absolute right of the English nation, the king being in England; and the Scots commissioners as strongly insisting on their Joint Right therein. The arguments, on the Scots side, are entered in the Lords Journals, and were printed in a single pamphlet of this time; but they are too long and too tedious for our purpose. The substance of them will be sufficiently collected from the subsequent proceedings of both houses. The title of the said Pamphlet runs thus: "Some Papers given in, by the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland, to the Honourable Houses of the Parliament of England, in Answer to their Votes of the 24th of September, 1646, concerning the Disposing of his majesty's Person."

Oct. 21. On the reading of the said Papers of the Scots Commissioners in the house of lords, after debate thereupon, it was moved that this Vote should be put, "That a committee shall be appointed to join with a proportionable number of the house of commons, to consult and debate with the commissioners of Scotland, concerning such things that may settle the peace, prosperity, and brotherly amity of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland." But, on a second motion, "That these words, 'in relation to the king,' should be added," it was put to the question, and carried in the affirmative. Then the whole Vote, with this addition, being read, it also passed in the same manner.

Mr. Challoner's Speech upon the Scots Papers concerning the Disposal of the King's Person.] Oct. 26. The said Papers were read in the house of commons, when a debate arose; and afterwards it was ordered by that house, That they should be referred to the consideration of the same committee, who formerly managed the conference with the commissioners of Scotland about the Disposal of the King's Person, to prepare an Answer to them, and report it to the house. In this debate,

Mr. Thomas Challoner, member for Richmond, spoke as follows: "Mr. Speaker; You have just now heard two Papers read before you, from the Commissioners of Scotland; the first concerning the Disposal of the king's Person; the other touching the distractions of the North, by reason, as they say, of the non-payment of their army: I shall speak nothing to the latter, because it hath been so sufficiently answered by divers knowing members of this house. To the first I shall wholly apply myself, because little or nothing hath been said to that point. The question then before you is about the Disposal of the king's Person. You say, that he is to be disposed of as both houses of parliament shall think fitting; but your brethren of Scotland say, he is to be disposed of as both kingdoms shall think fitting; and they fortify their affirmation with these reasons: They say, That he is not only king of England, but also king of Scotland; and as you have an interest in him, he being king of England, so have they no less interest in him, he being king of Scotland. And as they have not the sole interest in him, he being king of Scotland, because they acknowledge withal that he is king of England; so have not you the sole interest in him, he being king of England, because they desire you to remember that he is also king of Scotland: so as neither nation having a sole, but a joint, interest in his person, they ought jointly to dispose of it for the weal and benefit of both kingdoms.—This I take to be the whole scope of their argument, which they have represented unto you under so many disguises, and as it were by multiplying glasses, insomuch as the bare relating of it takes up three large sheets of paper. But while they debate this great question with you, touching the Disposal of the king's Person; and while they positively affirm that he is to be disposed of by the joint consent of both nations, give me leave to remember you that, in the mean time, they dispose wholly of him themselves; and so have done for these six months, and may for six months longer, for any thing I can gather out of these Papers. Their argument runs thus: Wheresoever the kingdom of Scotland hath an interest in their king, there they may dispose of him: but the kingdom of Scotland hath an interest in their king, he being in England; therefore in England they may dispose of him.—Sir, this may seem at the first to some to be a fair and specious argument; but, let it be well considered, it will prove erroneous and fallacious: for, in the major proposition, they understand one thing by the word King; and, in the minor proposition, they understand another thing by the word King; and so here is a conclusion inferred which the premisses will not warrant. For the clearing whereof, I pray, Sir, remember that this word King is of a various signification; sometimes it is taken in abstracto, that is, for the royal power, function, and office of a king; sometimes it is taken in concreto, that is, for the man or person whom we call king. If their major proposition be taken in the first sense, we shall never deny it them; nay, we shall acknowledge that the king of Scotland, being taken in abstracto, we have nothing to do with him at all; he is solely and totally theirs. God forbid that a king of Scotland, going out of his kingdom, should either make Scotland cease to be a kingdom, or give any participation of interest to that country where he doth reside: let his person reside in the furthest parts of the earth, yet the royal office and capacity of the king resideth still in Scotland: they have his sword to do justice by; they have his sceptre to shew mercy by; they have his seal to confirm what they please by; and they have his laws to govern by: and in this sense it is only meant that the king is never under years, never dies, cannot be deceived, can neither do wrong or take wrong of any body; and, in this sense, we fight for king and parliament, though the person of the king be in opposition to both; and in this sense the returns and tests of the king's writs are, 'coram me-ipso apud Westmonasterium,' and 'teste me-ipso apud Westmonasterium,' let the person of the king at the same time be in France, or the remotest country in the world: but a king of Scotland, taken in this sense, is never out of Scotland; and, therefore, whereas they say in the minor proposition, 'That the kingdom of Scotland hath an interest in their king, he being in England,' this must needs be meant of a king in concreto; that is, only of the person of their king, and not of his royal capacity. And in this sense we must deny that they have any thing at all to do with him; for though the royal office of the king of Scotland is solely to be disposed of by the state of Scotland, yet it is not so with his person; for persona sequitur locum; and his person must be disposed of by the supreme power of that country where-soever he shall happen to abide. Suppose a king of Scotland should be in Spain, will they say they have as great an interest to dispose of his person there as in Scotland? I think they will not say so; and yet they did affirm last day at the conference, That they had as good right to dispose of his person at Westminster, as they had at Edinburgh: but, under their favour, England is as distinct a kingdom from Scotland as Spain: it is as distinct in laws, distinct in privileges, distinct in interest; it is neither subordinate to, nor dependant on, Scotland; and they can no more dispose of a king of Scotland's person, he being in England, than if he were in Spain.—I shall take this as granted for good law, That let the person of any nation under the sun, which is in amity with England, happen to come into England, that person is forthwith a subject of England; for he, being protected by the laws of England, becomes thereby subject to those laws; it being most certain that 'Protectio trahit subjectionem, et subjectionio protectionem;' they being relatives, the one cannot stand without the other; and as no man can be said to be a father that hath no son, nor no man a husband that hath no wife; so no man can be said to be protected that is not withal thereby subjected: and since, without such protection, every man may kill him and destroy him, it seems to stand with no proportion of justice, that a man should be protected in life, limb, or estate by any law, that will not subject himself to that law.—It cannot be denied but that there is a twofold subjection, legal and local; the legal subjection is due from a subject to his natural prince; the local from any foreigner to that prince or state where his person doth reside. And this, though it be only pro tempore, and the other during life, yet it doth, for the time, totally obstruct the operation of the other subjection: so that no king can command any subject of his, living out of his kingdom; but such subject of his is to be disposed of by the sole authority of that supreme power where he makes his residence: and since the question is only about the person of a king of Scotland, for I conceive they will not take upon them any authority to dispose of the person of a king of England, I do affirm, That if a king of Scotland should have come into England before the union of both these kingdoms, he had been instantly a subject of England, and his person to be disposed of by the sole authority of the laws of England; for either we must take him as a king or a subject, since betwixt them two there is no medium; as a king we cannot take him, unless we should commit treason against our natural prince, and subject ourselves to any but him; it being most certain that there is the same relation betwixt the king and his subjects, as betwixt the husband and his wife; and as no man can be said to be a husband but to his own wife, so no man can be said to be a king but to his own subjects; and therefore we cannot admit of any regality in the person of a king of Scotland coming into England, unless, at the same time, to the same person, we should confess subjection. For that it is most true, that as none can be said to be rex sine regno; so no man can be said to be rex but in regno: therefore, if a king of Scotland, coming as aforesaid into England, if against the laws of England he do offend, by those laws of England he must be tried, and by none other; for 'ubi quis delinquit, ibi punietur.' And it is most sure that we have disposed of the persons of kings of Scotland, coming into England, both living and dead; and if we may dispose of the person of a king of Scotland, without the consent of the kingdom of Scotland, much more may we dispose of the person of a king of England, he being now in England, without their privy or advice: but if they have any power to dispose of him, it is because they are either our masters or our fellows: if they be our masters, let them shew the time when they conquered us, or the price for which we were sold unto them: if they be our fellows, why come they not to our parliaments, why contribute they not to our necessities? But as it is apparent that they are two distinct kingdoms, governed by two distinct laws; so they ought not to intermeddle one with another's interest, but to content themselves with what doth naturally appertain to each of them severally.—There is no doubt to be made but that every husband hath as great an interest in the person of his wife, as any subject hath in the person of his sovereign; and yet a man may lose that interest by some act of his wife's; as if she commit felony, murder, or treason, the law disposeth of her person, and her husband cannot claim any right so much as to her dead body: so fareth it with a king, who, by going out of his kingdom, or by being taken prisoner by his enemies, his subjects lose the interest they had in him, and he is at the disposal of his enemies Jure Belli. John king of England was cited to appear at Paris, to answer for the death of Arthur Plantagenet duke of Brittainy, whom he had murdered. The state of England would not let him go, as holding it a great indignity and incongruity that a king of England should answer for any thing at Paris, right or wrong. The French answered, That they cited him not as king of England, but as duke of Normandy; as king of England, they acknowledged to have nothing to do with him, he was in that respect without them and beyond them; but as duke of Normandy which he held in fee of the crown of France, he owed fealty and allegiance for the same to the crown of France, and therefore ought to answer. The English replied, That if the duke of Normandy did go, the king of England must go; and if the duke of Normandy were beheaded, they knew well enough what would become of the king of England. Upon large debate hereof by all the lawyers in France, it was resolved, that if John had been in Normandy at the time of his summons, he ought to have appeared; but he being extra Jurisdictionem

Regni Franciæ at the time of his summons, and 'infra jurisdictionem regni Angliæ,' though legally he were a subject of France, yet locally he being in England, his summons was void, and he forfeited nothing by his non-appearance.—I will only urge one argument more, deduced from a known maxim of the law, not only of England but of Scotland also, which the commissioners of Scotland the other day at the conference did cite themselves, in my opinion much against themselves; and that is this, 'Quando duo jura, inter duo regna,' saith a great lawyer, 'concurrent in una persona, æquum est ac si essent in diversis,' which is no more than this, When two kingdoms, held by two distinct titles, do concur in one and the same person, it is all one as if they were in two distinct persons. I suppose here is our very case; here are two kingdoms, England and Scotland, held by two distinct titles, which do both concur in one person, in the person of king Charles; it is all one saith this rule and maxim of the law, as if they were under two several persons. Why then put the case, that there were one king of England and another of Scotland, would the State of Scotland have any thing to do to dispose of the person of a king of England, he being in England? I think you will say they could not.—Sir, I am sorry that our brethren have moved this question at this time; for all questions make debates, and debates differences; and this were a time for brothers to reconcile differences rather than to make them. We have now lived almost 44 years both under two princes, and in all this time this question was never stirred in till now; had it been stirred in, no question but it had been rejected. The people of England would have held it very strange that they could not have disposed of the person of their own king; or that a king of England could not have gone from Whitehall to Richmond or Hampton-Court, without the will and appointment of the council of Scotland; they would have thought they had made a bad bargain by such an union: for, before the union, they might have disposed of the person of their prince; but after, not. And since they conceived that, by the addition of Scotland, there was an addition of charge, they would have been very sorry withal to have had an addition of servility.—Since the beginning of the world there was never before such a contention about the person of a king. The Greeks and Trojans did contend for a long time in fight about the dead body of Patroclus which of them should have it; but here is not a contention about the dead body of a private man, but about the living body of a king: neither do we contend as they did, who should have his person; but here you do contend, as far as I conceive, who shall not have it. Your brethren of Scotland say positively, They will not have the king's person upon any condition whatsoever. It is now about six months past that you voted in this house the demanding of the king's person, but the lords then refused to join with you; ever since, until this present, you yourself did acquiesce, as if you had repented of your former Vote: now he must be put upon you, and with such terms as his present guardians please to allow of.—Truly it seems strange to me, that an Army of Scots, in pay of the kingdom of England, which, by the treaty, ought to be governed by the joint consent of the committees of both kingdoms upon the place, should, in England, take a king of England without the privy of the English committee, and convey him to Newcastle, a town likewise of England; and should there keep him for six whole months, without the consent of both houses of parliament; and when they find it not convenient for them to keep him any longer, then they will capitulate with you upon what conditions you must receive his person. I never thought to have found a king of England, his person being in England, under any other protection but that of the laws of England; but now I find him under the protection of a Scots Army, whither they say he is fled for shelter, and that they cannot render him up with honour.—Sir, if that army of theirs be come into this kingdom as brethren, friends, and confederates, as we hope they are, then is every person of that army, during the time of his stay here, locally a subject of England; and such children as are born to them here are not aliens, but denizens; and not only local, but legal subjects of this kingdom: and therefore they having gotten the king into their hands, they ought no more to capitulate upon what terms he should be delivered into yours, than if the army of sir Thomas Fairfax were in possession thereof; who, if they should deny the surrendering of the king unto you, but upon condition, no question but it were capital.—They say, That by virtue of the Covenant they are obliged to defend his person and authority. What his authority is in Scotland themselves best know; but you are only to judge of it in England; since, being not subordinate to any power on earth, there is no power under Heaven can judge you. The Covenant ties you to maintain, in the first place, the rights of parliament, and the liberties of the kingdom; and, in the second place, the king's person and authority; and that only in defence of the former, and not otherwise. And whereas they expect the king should be received by you with honour, safety, and freedom; I beseech you, sir, consider whether, as the case now stands, his reception with honour can stand with the honour of the kingdom; whether his safety be not incompatible with the safety of the commonwealth; and whether his freedom be not inconsistent with the freedom of the people.—I pray, sir, take heed lest that, bringing him in with honour, you do not dishonour yourself, and question the very justice of all your actions; be wary that, in receiving him with safety, you do not thereby endanger and hazard the commonwealth; be advised, lest, in bringing him home with freedom, you do not thereby lead the people of England into thralldom. I pray, sir, first settle the honour, safety, and freedom of the commonwealth; and then the honour, safety, and freedom of the king; so far as the latter may stand with the former, and not otherwise. Wherefore I shall conclude with my humble desire, that you would adhere to your former vote; that is, that the king be disposed of as both houses of parliament shall think fitting; and that you enter into no treaty, either with the king or your brethren of Scotland, lest otherwise thereby you retard the going home of their Army out of England.”

The lords agreed to an Ordinance, sent up by the commons, for disannulling and making void all Titles of Honour conferred by the king, on all persons, ever since the lord Littleton carried off the Great Seal: and that they shall not pretend to sit or vote, as peers, in the parliament of England, without the consent of both houses of parliament.

The two houses had likewise a great dispute, this month, about nominating new Commissioners of the Great Seal, and several conferences were held about it. At last they agreed to constitute the Speakers of both houses joint commissioners to act in that office for the space of 20 days: but it was enlarged to a longer time afterwards,

Ordinance for abolishing the Name and Title of Bishops, &c.] In order to the effectual extirpation of all episcopal power out of this kingdom, the parliament passed an Ordinance, the preamble to which runs thus: “That for the abolishing of Archbishops and Bishops, and providing for the payment of the just and necessary debts of the kingdom, into which the same had been drawn by a war, mainly promoted by and in favour of the said Archbishops and Bishops, and other their adherents and dependents, &c.” And then it proceeds to enact, “That the name, title, stile, and dignity of Archbishop of Canterbury, abp. of York, bishops of Winchester and Durham; and of all other bishops in England and Wales, be, from Sept. 6, 1646, wholly abolished and taken away, and their lands, possessions, and evidences thereof, settled in trustees, who are to hold such lands, as the bishops held of the king, in fee and common soccage by fealty; and such lands as they held of other than the king, by the accustomed rents and services, and discharged of tithes: that the trustees have power to name surveyors to put the deeds in safe custody, who are to take an oath: that leases not exceeding three lives or 21 years, whereupon an old rent is reserv'd, are not to be avoided; but leases made by the bishops since the 1st Dec. 1641, to be void: That such persons who have surrendered their old leases since that time, to the end they might have a new one granted, shall enjoy their old leases; with a saving of the right of all persons other than the king and the bishops; also to those who have adhered to the parliament, such estates as they have forfeited for non-payment of rent, and saving, to the earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Durham-House: that all rents payable to charitable uses be continued: that the sheriff present to the judges a fit person to perform the office of ordinary: that commissions upon the statute for charitable uses shall be valid, though the bishop be therein omitted: and that all issues, triable by the ordinary or bishop, shall be tried by jury in usual course."

Colonel Monk first employed by the Parliament.] Nov. 12. This day we find an entry in the Journals of a report made to the lords, from the commissioners of both kingdoms, That colonel George Monk had been with them, and had engaged his honour that he would faithfully serve the parliament in the war of Ireland, if he might be employed thither. That he had taken the negative oath, was willing to take the Covenant; and would be ready for his journey at a day's warning*; which being signified to the commons, both houses agreed to his commission, as a person well qualified to do great service in those wars. This is the first public notice we have met with relating to the conduct of this officer, who makes such a figure in these annals afterwards.

Both Houses resolve to compliment General Fairfax on his Arrival in London.] Nov. 13. The Speaker acquainted the lords, That, the day before, sir Thomas Fairfax arrived in town, and the same night came to him, and expressed his readiness to serve that house in all things that laid in his power. Upon which the question was put, Whether the house should appoint their Speaker, with a committee of the whole house, to go and compliment sir Thomas on his arrival? it was carried in the affirmative; the following lords by name, only protesting against this vote: the earls of Middlesex, Suffolk and Lincoln; and the lords Hunsden, Willoughby, and Maynard. The next morning at 11 was appointed for the Speaker to go to sir Thomas, with the whole house, to congratulate his coming to town, and make an acknowledgment of his good services done to the parliament and kingdom. The same day the commons also came to a resolution, That their Speaker, with the whole house, should, the next morning, make a visit to sir Thomas, and return him the thanks of the commons of England, as an acknowledgment of the great blessing of Almighty God upon his faithful services, wise conduct, and great valour, in the whole discharge of the great trust committed unto him, and reducing the distracted affairs of this kingdom to the present happy condition and issue. Accordingly, both houses went to visit him; when, as a Journalist of these times informs us †, the earl of Manchester, Speaker of the house of peers, in the name of that house, addressed the General to this effect; "He gave his excellency thanks for all his care and pains in the defence of the public, expressing their great acknowledgment of his memorable services, and faithful performance of the trust reposed in him; which their lordships should always have in remembrance, and be ready upon all occasions to express their gratitude."

The Speaker Lenthall's Speech on that Occasion.] But Mr. Rushworth tells us that William Lenthall, esq. Speaker of the house of commons, made the following speech to sir Thomas Fairfax:

"Sir; I have a very hard task to perform; to present the respects of the house of commons according to your excellency's merit, and their desires. To effect this accordingly, I should have informed myself from histories that have preserved the memories of the famous worthies of former ages, and should have taken the dimensions of the largest coronets and trophies wherewith they are made glorious; and even those would rather straiten than enlarge the temples of your excellency: or else I should have consulted some of the most learned and eloquent orators, who have set forth the glorious gests performed in former times, whereby I might have insisted on some parallel for your wisdom, piety, justice, and valour; but I conceived the virtues and success which God had bestowed upon you, were very hardly to be matched, and rather needed more industry and memory to enumerate, than oratory to polish. Heretofore when I read the histories of the acts of famous princes and warriors, in this or other nations, it was not without some jealousy that in them there was some mixture and glosses of oratory and art, the more to set off and give lustre to their acts, as arguments of emulation for others to follow the footsteps of their virtues; but the actions of your excellency will add lustre and belief to them being all verified in you. And indeed here, considering the swift marches, and the expedition of those grand and difficult attempts, which were prosecuted and effected by your excellency, I may say, 'The Almighty came riding on the wings of wind;' for these were nothing else but the Magnalia Dei, acted in and by you his instrument. It was the custom of the antient Romans, after a glorious and successful prince, to derive his name to posterity in memory of his virtues; as after that great Prince Julius Cæsar, his successors retained the name of Cæsars, as Augustus Cæsar, Tyberius Cæsar, &c. Thus hereafter all famous and victorious succeeding generals in this kingdom, (if the times shall prove so unfortunate) will desire the addition of the name of Fairfax. And surely the honour of the late lord-general was not, whilst he lived, any way eclipsed by the succession of your excellency in his command; but rather augmented, whilst each retained the brightness of his own honour, having both rays enough to enlighten a kingdom, then overset with clouds and thick darkness. I shall need to say no more but this, That the world will admire your excellency's worth; posterity will honour your name; and that the whole house of commons, in the name of the commons of England, do return you thanks for your faithful and memorable services: the beginning, continuance, and effect, whereof I must solely attribute to the Almighty, the Lord of Hosts and Victories."

To this extraordinary harangue, which so modest a man, as sir Thomas Fairfax is universally allowed to have been, must have blushed to hear, the general made a short Answer, expressing how much he esteemed himself honoured by the great respects of the houses towards him, for which he desired his humble thanks might be returned; and that he accounted it his greatest happiness, under God, to be in the least kind instrumental for theirs and the kingdom's good.

*The Earls of Northumberland and Pembroke charged with sending 4000*l.* to the King at Oxford.*] Towards the close of this month a message was brought from the commons, with an Order to deliver to the lords a Letter, with some Examinations, which did concern two Peers of their house, and that they had directions only to deliver them. Hereupon the Letter and Examinations were read, the purport of which was a Charge against the earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, that they should send Money to the King at Oxford, as had likewise some members of the house of commons. Their lordships being present declared their innocency in this business, and desired the houses would please to put it into a way of examination. After debate, this question was put, Whether, at the desire of the earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, there shall be a committee appointed; and that the house of commons be acquainted that the lords desire them to appoint a committee of their own house, who may be present, if they think fit, to examine this business? It was resolved in the affirmative, and an Order made for attaching the body of Richard Lloyd of the Inner-Temple, esq. and bringing him before the lords, to answer the scandals raised by him against the earls of Northumberland and Pembroke.

Then the following Examination of the said Richard Lloyd, taken by the standing committee of parliament in Truro, Nov. 16, 1646, was read: "That this examinant confessed, That on Sunday last, being at dinner at the sign of the Bull in Truro, together with Mr. Cowes and Mr. Trerise, he, amongst other things, told them of certain monies sent from two lords of parliament to the king at Oxford, during the late wars in this kingdom. And this examinant now saith, That he, being at Oxford about 4 years last past, was a gentleman of the privy chamber extraordinary to the king, and rode in his troop; and about that time there were two gentlemen that came from London, the one called Mr. Compton, who was a page to the earl of Pembroke, and was then one of the king's servants; and that they told this examinant they had brought from London 4000*l.* in gold quilted about them, from the earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, from each 2000*l.*, which they had sent to the king; and that the said Compton lay in the same house in Oxford where this examinant lay; and that they were so sore with carrying the said money, that they told this examinant they kept their beds 3 or 4 days; that sir George Crynes of Peckham in Surry, being then at Oxford, told this examinant that he had brought 100*l.* to the king, which sir Poynings Moore, a member of the commons, had sent to the king from London; and that sir Tho. Longueville, near Stony-Stratford, told this examinant above 2 years past, that he had 4 or 500*l.* sent by some parliament-men, friends of his, to the king: and this examinant knoweth that there was, of the said monies, 140 or 150*l.* paid by order from sir Edw. Hyde, the chancellor, for sir Tho. Lunsford's pay. And he further confesseth to have said, That the reasons why the said persons sent the money aforesaid was, because the parliament was weak, and they knew not how things would fall out." Next were read the Examinations of Mr. Trerise and Mr. Cowes in confirmation of the foregoing, and almost in the very same words, which we therefore omit.

Nov. 23. A committee of the commons had been busy, for some time, in framing an Answer to the Scots Commissioners Papers, concerning the disposing of the King's Person; and this day, it was read in that house. After which the question being put, Whether the lords concurrence should be desired to this Answer? it passed in the negative, on a division of 110 against 90. Next it was resolved, That a copy of this Answer to the Scots Commissioners Papers shall be sent to them, as the Answer of the house of commons; which was done accordingly. This Answer was afterwards ordered to be printed and published; but it is too long for our purpose.

Nov. 29. This Answer of the commons seems to have been resented by the Scots Commissioners; for this day the Speaker acquainted the house, That he had sent his servant, with the Answer and a Letter from himself sealed up, to those commissioners; and the servant being desired to stay a little, they came to him again, and gave him a Letter, directed to the Speaker, and returned the Answer sealed up as it was and wrapped in a clean cover. The servant urged, That he had no warrant to receive it back if it was the same he brought; but, upon the commissioners pressing it on him, he took both. The Letter was immediately read; it is not inserted in the Journals, but only said to be dated from Worcester-House, and subscribed by 5 of the commissioners.

*The Treaty concerning the Manner and Time of the Payment of the 400,000*l.* granted to the Scots Army.*] Dec. 16. The Treaty which had been long depending between the commissioners of both nations, about the Payment of the stipulated sums of money to the Scots, for their Army's evacuating this kingdom; and which had gone through great alterations in both houses, was at length fully settled and signed by the English and Scots commissioners: but, previously to the execution thereof, the commons had resolved, That after the Payment of the first 100,000*l.* to the Scots, their Army should not require or take any money or goods whatsoever from the country; but pay for all such provisions as they should receive. These Articles stand thus in the Journals of both houses.

ARTICLES of AGREEMENT between Committees of Lords and Commons of the Parliament of England and Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland, authorized thereunto by the Parliaments of each Kingdom respectively.

I. "That 400,000*l.* be paid to the kingdom of Scotland, in manner hereafter expressed, for the pay of their Army brought into the kingdom of England for the assistance of this kingdom, and of their forces that came into the garrison of Berwick, by virtue of the treaties between the two kingdoms of the 29th Nov. 1643; and for due recompence and full satisfaction for all the pains, hazard, and charges which they have undergone, and for whatsoever other sums of money or recompence the kingdom of Scotland can claim of the kingdom of England, by virtue of the said treaties. II. That the 200,000*l.* now ready, part of the said 400,000*l.* shall be forthwith sent to the city of York, and shall there forthwith be told by the treasurers in whose custody the money now is, or by such as they, or any two of them, shall appoint; and by such as shall be appointed by the kingdom of Scotland, or by sir Adam Hepburne, treasurer of the Scots army, or his deputies, except 12,000*l.* part thereof, which, at the desire of the Scots commissioners, is reserved to be paid here in London, and is accepted for so much of the first 100,000*l.* appointed to be paid at Northallerton; the which 12,000*l.* the said Scots commissioners have power to receive here in manner as aforesaid, and to discharge the kingdom of England thereof. III. That the first 100,000*l.* except the sum of 12,000*l.* before excepted, shall be told within six days after the arrival of the said money at York, and the second 100,000*l.* within six days after that. IV. That the money, so told as aforesaid, shall be sealed up in the several bags, each to contain 100*l.* by the seal of both parties appointed as aforesaid to tell the same; and shall be forthwith put into chests, 1000*l.* in each chest, and the said chests also sealed up by the aforesaid persons appointed to tell the said money. V. That the said persons appointed by the kingdom of Scotland to tell the said money shall continue with the same, to see that there shall be no alteration made thereof after the telling and sealing the same as aforesaid. VI. That within five days after the 200,000*l.* is told at York, 100,000*l.* thereof shall be paid at Northallerton to sir Adam Hepburne or his deputies, or to such others as by the kingdom of Scotland shall be appointed to receive the same, except only the 12,000*l.* reserved to be paid in London as aforesaid. VII. That the delivery of 100 chests of money, or of 1000 bags, so as aforesaid sealed up, to the persons mentioned in the foregoing Article, except before excepted, shall be, and be accounted, the payment of the said 100,000*l.* and acquittances are thereupon to be given for the same to the said treasurers for their discharge, by sir Adam Hepburne, or his deputies, or any other authorized by the kingdom of Scotland. VIII. That when the said 100,000*l.* except before excepted, is come to Topcliffe in the county of York, and before it pass any further towards Northallerton for the payment of the same as aforesaid, the kingdom of Scotland shall there deliver hostages; sir Walter Riddell, knt. George Hume, of Wedderburn, esq. sir Patrick Mackegie, knt. Alex. Strachan, of Thorneton, esq. sir James Wood, knt. sir James Lumsden, younger, knt. sir Arthur Forbes, knt. Tho. Craig, of Rickarton, esq. sir Wm. Ker, knt. Robert Douglas, of Tilly-Whitley, esq. col. John Welden; John Lesley, of Pitcaple, esq. or any six of them, for assurance that the Scots shall quit all their quarters, passes, and garrisons on the south side Tyne; and shall deliver up to such forces as both houses of the parliament of England, or such as shall be by them authorized, shall appoint, all the aforesaid places, together with all the ordinance, arms, and ammunition belonging to the kingdom of England, within ten days after the first 100,000*l.* shall be paid as aforesaid; and for assurance that they shall deliver up the town of Newcastle, with the high castle in the same; the castle of Tinmouth, with all the works belonging thereunto; the Spanish works, the Shields-Field fort, and all other forts and works on the north side Tyne, together with all ordinance, arms, and ammunition therein, belonging to the kingdom of England, unto such forces or persons as shall be appointed by both houses of the parliament of England, or by any by them thereunto authorized to receive the same, when and at such time as notice is given that the second 100,000*l.* is come to the North of the river of Tees, as is hereafter expressed in the tenth Article. IX. That within one day after the performance of all the particulars mentioned in the said former Article, the said hostages of the kingdom of Scotland shall be again re-delivered unto them, within half a mile of the works on the north side of Newcastle. X. That after the garrisons of Hartlepool, Stockton, Durham, and all other garrisons, quarters, and passes on the south side of Tyne, are quitted by the Scots army and forces; and, after that all the said army and forces are removed to the north side of Tyne, which is to be done in ten days after the payment of the first 100,000*l.* as aforesaid, that then the other 100,000*l.* shall be brought to the north side of the River Tees. XI. That the second 100,000*l.* being come to the north side of the said river of Tees, upon notice thereof given to the general or commander in chief of the Scots army, in writing, from him that commands the convoy, they shall deliver up the town of Newcastle, with the High Castle in the same; the castle of Tinnmouth, with all the works belonging thereunto; the Spanish works, the Shields-Field fort, and all other forts and works on the north side Tyne, other than is provided for in the 15th Article, together with all Ordinance, Arms, and Ammunition therein, belonging to the kingdom of England, unto such forces or persons as shall be appointed by both houses of the parliament of England, or by any by them thereunto authorized to receive the same. XII. That for the more speedy delivery and receiving the said towns of Newcastle and castle of Tinnmouth, the said forces that are to be put into those garrisons are to march before the said money and convoy. XIII. That when the Scots army and forces are marching out of, and the English forces are entering into, Newcastle and Tinnmouth Castle; and that there be 500 of the garrison appointed by both houses of parliament entered into Newcastle, and not above 500 of the Scots forces remaining therein; that then sir Wm. Selby, knt. Ralph Delaval, esq. sir Edw. Loftus, viscount Ely; sir Tho. Trollop, bart. Henry Mildmay, esq. sir Rd. Erle, bart. sir Ralph Hare, bart. and sir Lionel Tolmache, bart. or any six of them, shall be given hostages by the kingdom of England to the kingdom of Scotland, for assurance that the latter 100,000*l.* of the 200,000*l.* shall be paid unto the kingdom of Scotland, on the north side of the works of Newcastle, within a mile of the said works, within six days after the delivery of Newcastle, Tinnmouth castle, and places aforesaid, in manner aforesaid, to such persons, and in such manner, as is expressed in the 6th and 7th Articles for the payment of the first 100,000*l.* And acquittances are thereupon to be given, as in the said 7th Article is expressed. XIV. That upon the delivery of the said latter 100,000*l.* of the 200,000*l.* the hostages of the kingdom of England are forthwith to be re-delivered. XV. That upon the coming of the latter 100,000*l.* out of Newcastle, hostages, as in the 8th Article, shall be delivered to the kingdom of England, by the kingdom of Scotland, for assurance that all the Scots armies and forces shall march out of the kingdom of England within ten days after the payment of the latter 100,000*l.* That they will permit and suffer that the fortifications of Berwick and Carlisle may be slighted, according to the Large Treaty and Treaty for Berwick, which shall accordingly be slighted within ten days after payment of the last 100,000*l.* And that the said towns be quitted; and all ordnance, arms and ammunition therein, belonging to the kingdom of England be, within the said ten days, delivered unto such persons as shall be appointed by both houses of the parliament of England, or such as shall be by them, or any authorized by them for that purpose, appointed to receive the same; who also are appointed to cause and see Berwick and Carlisle slighted in manner as aforesaid; and are hereby authorized to call in the aid of the country for the doing thereof, as they shall see cause; and likewise the parliament of Scotland, or any by them authorized, are to appoint such persons as they shall think fit to see this performed. XVI. That within four days after the Scots army and forces shall be marched out of the kingdom of England, and the said garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle quitted as aforesaid, the hostages of the kingdom of Scotland shall be re-delivered unto them. XVII. That the public faith of the kingdom of England is hereby given for the payment of the latter 200,000*l.* as is hereafter expressed: That for the better satisfaction and security of some private persons of the kingdom of Scotland, who have advanced great sums of money, provisions, and other necessities during these troubles, the sum of 50,000*l.* shall be paid to the said persons, whose names are expressed in an ordinance of both houses for that effect, at twelve months after the payment of the last 100,000*l.* of the first 200,000*l.* out of the receipts of such monies as shall come in and be received by fines and compositions made, and to be made, with papists and delinquents, or by sale of papists and delinquents estates, according to the said ordinance for that effect: and that other 50,000*l.* shall also be paid at the said 12 months after the payment of the last 100,000*l.* of the first 200,000*l.* That the last 100,000*l.* of the 400,000*l.* shall be paid within 12 months after that, viz. two years after the payment of the last 100,000*l.* of the first 200,000*l.* and that out of such ways and means as both houses of parliament shall think fit. Signed at Derby House, in Westminster, the 23d Dec. 1646. Northumberland, Warwick, Manchester, London, Lauderdale, Wm. Waller, W. Pierpoint, Gilbert Gerrard, W. Armyn, A. Heslerig, O. Cromwell, P. Stapylton, R. Wallopp, J. Crew, Ol. St. John, Ch. Erskine, Hugh Kennedy, R. Barclay."

The Lords resolve that the King may come to Newmarket.] The reader may observe that there is not one word about delivering up the Person of the king in all the foregoing Articles: but we find that, on the very same day they were finally concluded, the lords went into a debate on the following Questions:

1. "Whether there shall be a committee appointed to consider of some Declaration to be offered to the house, concerning the king's coming to one of his houses? 2. Whether they should peruse a former Vote made on the 21st of October last?" (p. 521). They were both carried in the affirmative, and a committee of 7 lords were ordered accordingly.

The same day also the said committee drew up the following Resolution, which, after reading, was agreed to: "That the king, being now in England, it is resolved by the lords in parliament assembled, That he may come to Newmarket, there to remain with such attendants about him as both houses of parliament shall appoint; with respect had to the safety and preservation of his person in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdom: and then the two kingdoms are mutually to consider and determine what is necessary to the common peace; reserving to each their rights of exercise of their respective interests in providing for their respective securities."

Letter from the King, desiring to come to London, to treat with the Houses.] Dec. 24. The Speaker of the house of lords acquainted them, That last night a Letter was delivered to him which came from the King at Newcastle; the tenor of which was as follows:

"C. R. His majesty's thoughts being always sincerely bent to the Peace of his kingdoms, he was and will be ever desirous to take all ways which might the most clearly make appear the candor of his intentions to his people. And to this end, could find no better way than to propose a personal free debate with his two houses of parliament upon all the present differences: yet finding, very much against his expectations, that this offer was laid aside, his majesty bent all his thoughts to make his intentions fully known by a particular Answer to the Propositions delivered to him in the name of both kingdoms, the 24th of July last. But the more he endeavoured it, he more plainly saw that any Answer he could make would be subject to misinformations and misconstructions; which, upon his own paraphrases and explanations, he is most confident will give so good satisfaction, as would doubtless cause a happy and lasting Peace. Lest, therefore, that good intentions may produce ill effects, his majesty again proposeth, and desires again, to come to London, or any of his houses thereabouts, upon the public faith, and security of his two houses of parliament and the Scots commissioners, that he shall be there with honour, freedom, and safety; where, by his personal presence, he may not only raise a mutual confidence betwixt him and his people; but also have those doubts cleared, and those difficulties explained to him, without which he cannot (but with the aforesaid mischievous inconveniences) give a particular Answer to the Propositions; and with which he doubts not but so to manifest his real intentions for the settling of religion, the just privileges of parliament, with the freedom and property of the subject, that it shall not be in the power of wicked and malicious men to hinder the establishing of that firm peace which all honest men desire. Assuring them, that as he will make no other demands but such as he believes confidently to be just, and much conducing to the tranquillity of the people: so he will be most willing to condescend to them in whatsoever shall be really for their good and happiness. Not doubting likewise but you will also have a due regard to maintain the just power of the crown, according to your many protestations and professions. For certainly, except king and people have reciprocal care each of other, neither can be happy. To conclude; it is your king who desires to be heard, (the which, if refused to a subject by a king, he would be thought a tyrant for it) and for that end which all men profess to desire; wherefore his majesty conjures you, as you desire to shew yourselves really what you profess, even as you are good Christians and subjects, that you will accept this his offer, which he is confident God will so bless, that it will be the readiest means by which these kingdoms may again become a comfort to their friends, and a terror to their enemies. Newcastle, Dec. 20, 1646."

All the notice that the lords took of this Letter from the king, at this time, was, That it should be communicated to the commons by a message.

Both Houses resolve that the King shall be brought to Holdenby-House.] Dec. 31. Resolved, by the lords and commons assembled in parliament, "That Holdenby-House, in the county of Northampton, be the place which the houses think fit for the king to come unto; there to remain with such attendants about him, as both houses shall appoint; with respect had to the safety and preservation of his person in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms, according to the Covenant. And when the king shall be at Holdenby as aforesaid, and the Scots forces gone out of this kingdom, the two houses declare, That then they will be ready, according to their former declarations for preserving the peculiar rights of the kingdom of England, to join with the kingdom of Scotland in employing their best endeavours to procure his majesty's assent to the Propositions agreed on by both kingdoms, and presented to the king at Newcastle; and to the disposing of the bishops lands, according to the ordinances already passed both houses in that behalf: and, in case the king shall not give his assent thereunto the two houses are resolved still to maintain the happy union already settled between the two kingdoms, according to treaties and the Covenant."

January 1. The lords took into consideration the above Vote, and agreed that the said vote should have a short preamble to it, then, first to send it to the Scots commissioners, and afterwards to the king. The additional preamble was this: "We your majesty's loyal subjects, the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, having agreed upon this following Vote, do humbly present it to your majesty." Sir Peter Killegrew was ordered by both houses to carry this vote to the king.

A Committee appointed to receive the King from the Scots Army.] Jan. 6. The commons sent up to the lords some votes and resolutions of their house, of great significancy. The question was first proposed in that house, Whether the king should be delivered over to major-general Skippon at Newcastle? on which the house divided, when it appeared there were 69 for, and 130 against it. After which it was resolved. "That a committee be appointed, by both houses, to go to Newcastle to receive the Person of the King from the Scots Army; and that it shall consist of members of both houses."

Their Instructions.] This being agreed to by the lords, they next read a copy of Instructions, sent up at the same time, with the names of the commissioners appointed for that purpose: viz.

INSTRUCTIONS for Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Basil, earl of Denbigh, Edw. lord Montague, sir John Coke, sir Walter Erle, sir John Holland, sir James Harrington, John Crew, esq. and major-general Brown, who are appointed to go to Newcastle, to receive the Person of the King from the Scots Army.

"You are to make your repair to Newcastle, and be there by the 23rd of this instant January, or sooner if it may be, there to receive the Person of the King from the Scots Army. 2. You are, upon your arrival there, to signify to his majesty that you are come thither to receive his person; and you are also to signify the same to the committees or commissioners of the parliament of Scotland that shall be at Newcastle, and to the general of the Scots Army. 3. When you have received him as aforesaid, you are to signify the same to both houses of parliament. 4. You are to take care that the king's person be, with convenient speed, conducted in safety to Holdenby-House, according to the vote of both houses the 1st instant; and for that purpose you are to give directions to major-general Skippon to furnish you with such horse and dragoons, of those under his command, for the same convoy, as you shall think fit, who is hereby required to appoint the same convoy accordingly; which convoy are, from time to time, to obey your orders for that service; and if you find it necessary to have a greater convoy than can be spared from those parts, then you are to send to sir Tho. Fairfax for such addition of force as shall be necessary. 5. After you have received the person of the king, you are to take care that no person that has been in arms, or assisted in this unnatural war against the parliament, nor any other but such as you shall think fit and allow of, may come, or deliver, or send unto him, any letters or messages. 6. When you are come to Holdenby, you are to give notice thereof to both houses, and receive their further order; untill which time such horse and dragoons as you shall think fit, are to remain with you and observe your orders. 7. You shall return to both houses of parliament the names of such attendants as you shall appoint to come along with the king, and also of such as you shall permit to speak with him, or to deliver, or to send any letters or messages unto him."

Jan. 9. Some small Addition was made to the above Instructions viz. That, in the second Article, the words may be thus expressed, 'You are also, after your arrival, as soon as you shall think convenient, to signify unto his majesty,' &c. It was likewise ordered, That the House at Holdenby be repaired, and provision made for the king in his journey, and when he is come to Holdenby; and that a coach be sent to meet his majesty. The sum of 2500*l.* was allowed by the commons to pay all the necessary expences, &c. of this journey: and all the persons appointed to attend the person of the king instead of his own servants, were named by parliament.

The Commons grant Gratuities to several Members for their Sufferings, Anno 3tio. Car.]

Jan. 18. The house of commons had appointed a committee to consider of some proper reparation to be made to the members that were imprisoned tertio Caroli; and the report being made thereof this day, it was agreed to by the whole house. "That Mr. Hollis shall have 5000*l.* for his damages, losses, imprisonments, and sufferings, sustained and undergone by him, for his service done to the commonwealth in the parliament of tertio Caroli.* The like resolution in favour of Mr. John Selden, Mr. Walter Long, and Mr. Ben. Valentine; also to the representatives of sir John Elliot, sir Peter Heyman, and Mr. Wm. Strode. That 500*l.* be bestowed in erecting a monument to sir Miles Hobart, a member of the parliament of tertio Caroli, in memory of his sufferings for his service to the commonwealth. That Mr. Samuel Vassal shall have 10,445*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* paid him for his losses and damages sustained in denying to pay tonnage and poundage not granted by act of parliament, in pursuance of, and obedience to, a declaration and vote of this house. * In this gentleman's Memoirs we find the following remark: "I myself, for my suffering after the parliament tertio Caroli, which continued many years, cost me some thousands of pounds, and prejudiced me more, had 5000*l.* given me by the house for my reparation. I refused it, and said, I would not receive a penny till the public debts were paid. Let any of them say so much. I desire whoever shall chance to read this, to pardon me this folly, I do not mean for not taking the money, but seeming to boast of it. I must again repeat the Apostle's words, 'I am become a fool in glorying,' but they have compelled me. It is true I had paid for a fine imposed in the King's Bench, which I laid down in ready money out of my purse, a thousand marks: this, in the time of these troubles, (when my whole estate was kept from me in the West, that, for 3 years or thereabouts, I received thence not one farthing) was reimbursed to me." representatives of Mr. Hampden, in respect of the losses, damages, and sufferings sustained by him in opposing the illegal tax of Ship-Money, and for his service therein to the commonwealth."

Letter from the Scots Parliament; with a Declaration of that Kingdom, giving their Consent to the Delivering up of the King.] Jan. 25. The Speaker acquainted the house of lords, that this morning he received a Letter from the parliament of Scotland, which was opened and read. It was addressed to the Speakers of both houses, in the usual form:

"Edinburgh, Jan. 16, 1646-7.

"Right Honourable; Our commissioners at London and Newcastle having received from the honourable houses the Vote of the 1st of January, and communicated the same to us, we have considered of it as a business of very great concernment to both nations, and therefore have concluded upon the inclosed Declaration and Desires; whereby it will appear how willing we are to comply with the Resolutions of both houses; how desirous to remove all jealousies, for strengthening the peace and union, and maintaining a good understanding betwixt the kingdoms, so firmly tied by Solemn League and Covenant; and how confident that they will satisfy our reasonable Desires, and make the integrity of our proceedings and resolutions, in all this business touching his majesty, appear, either by declaration or otherwise, as in their wisdom they shall think fit; whereby no occasion of calumny may be left to the wicked enemies of either nation; and as God has blessed the joint endeavours of both during our army's abode in that kingdom, so it will be a great encouragement for us to hope for the continuance of the same blessing for times coming, that our resolutions may be known to be one at our removing, in relation to all the ends contained in our mutual League and Covenant: and if any difficulty occur there, for gaining of time, we desire that the honourable houses may be pleased to send particular Instructions to their commissioners at Newcastle, with whom we shall authorize ours to concur for the just satisfaction of both kingdoms. We rest, your affectionate friend and servant, Crawford and Lindsay, Presid. Parl."

And likewise a Declaration of the Kingdom of Scotland and another Paper was read, viz.

"Whereas it pleased God to join the kingdom of Scotland, England and Ireland, in a Solemn League and Covenant, for reformation and defence of Religion, the honour and happiness of their king, and their own Peace and safety; and, in pursuance thereof, the Scots army being in the kingdom of England, the king's majesty came to their quarters before Newark, and professed he came there with a full and absolute intention to give all just and absolute satisfaction to the joint desires of both kingdoms; and with no thought either to continue this unnatural war any longer, or to make division between the kingdoms; but to comply with his parliaments, and those intrusted

by them, in every thing for settling truth and peace; and that he would apply himself totally to the councils and advices of his parliaments; which he did not only profess verbally to the committee of estates with the Scots Army, but also, in his several Letters and Declarations, under his own hand, to the committee of estates in Scotland, and unto the two houses of parliament of England respectively: in consideration whereof, and of the reality of his intentions and resolutions, which he declared did proceed from no other ground than the deep sense of the bleeding condition of his kingdoms, the committee of the kingdom of Scotland, and general officers of the Scots army, declared to himself and to the kingdom of England, their receiving of his royal person to be in these terms (which is the truth, notwithstanding what may be suggested or alleged by any to the contrary, within or without the kingdom); and presented to him, that the only way for his own happiness and peace of his kingdoms, under God, was to make good his professions so solemnly renewed to both kingdoms: thereafter Propositions of Peace were not only (which after serious and mature deliberation were agreed upon) tendered to him in the name of both kingdoms for his royal assent thereunto; but also the chief judicatures of this kingdom, both civil and ecclesiastical, made their humble and earnest addresses to his majesty by supplications, letters, and commissioners for that end; and fully represented all the prejudices and inconveniences of the delay or refusal of his assent, and, in particular, that this kingdom would be necessitated to join with the kingdom of England, to conform to the League and Covenant in providing for the present and future security of both kingdoms, and settling the government of both, as might best conduce to the good of both. And the parliament of Scotland, being now to retire their army out of England, have again, for their farther exoneration, sent commissioners to represent their renewed desires to his majesty what danger may ensue by his delay or refusal to grant the same; and that till then there was danger to the cause, to his majesty, to this kingdom, and to the union betwixt the kingdoms, by his coming into Scotland: and that therefore there would be a joint course taken by both kingdoms, concerning the Disposal of his Person: and considering that his majesty, by his Answer to the Propositions of Peace in August last, and also by his late Message sent to the two houses, and by his warrant communicated to the estates of this kingdom, has expressed his desires to be near to the two houses of parliament: and seeing also that the parliament of England have communicated to the Scots commissioners at Newcastle, and by them to this kingdom, the resolution that Holdenby-House, in the county of Northampton, is the place where the houses think fit for the king to come unto, there to remain with such attendants about him as both houses of parliament shall appoint, with respect had to the safety and preservation of his royal person, in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms according to the Covenant: Therefore, and in regard of his majesty's not giving a satisfactory Answer to the Propositions as yet, and out of their earnest desire to keep a right understanding betwixt the two kingdoms; to prevent new troubles within the same; to testify the desire of the two houses of parliament of England and of this kingdom, for his majesty's residence in some of his houses near the parliament of England; to prevent misinformation, and to give satisfaction to all the estates of the parliament of Scotland; they do declare their concurrence for the king's majesty's going to Holdenby-House, or some other of his houses in or about London, as shall be thought fit, there to remain until he give satisfaction to both kingdoms in the Propositions of Peace; and that, in the interim, there be no harm, prejudice, injury, nor violence done to his royal person; that there be no change of government other than has been for these 3 years past; and that his posterity be no ways prejudiced in their lawful succession to the crown and government of these kingdoms. And as this is the clear intention and full resolution of the kingdom of Scotland, according to their interest and duty, in relation to the king's majesty, so they are confident (from the same grounds and manifold declarations of the parliament of England) that the same is the resolution of their brethren; and at such a time they do expect a renewed declaration thereof, and that they will give brotherly and just satisfaction to the desires herewith sent, like as the kingdom of Scotland do hereby assure their brethren of England that it shall be their constant endeavour to keep, continue, and strengthen the union and peace betwixt the kingdoms, according to the Covenant and Treaties."

I. "That a committee of both kingdoms be appointed to attend his majesty, and press him farther for granting the Propositions of Peace; and, in case of his refusal, to advise and determine what is further necessary for continuing and strengthening the union betwixt the kingdoms, according to the Covenant and Treaties; and that no peace or agreement be made by either kingdom, with the king, without the other, according to the late Treaty betwixt the kingdoms. 2. Next it is desired, That such of the Scots nation as have place or charge about the king, (excepting such as stand excepted in the Propositions of Peace) may attend and exercise the same: and that none shall be debarred from having access to attend his majesty, who have warrants from the parliaments of either kingdom respectively, or from the committee of either Parliament thereunto authorized. 3. It is desired that the one kingdom assist the other, in case they be troubled, from within or from without, for this agreement. 4. That the kingdom of England would speedily condescend and agree upon some competency of entertainment for the forces, which we are necessitated to keep up to suppress the Irish Rebels; whom, by the Large Treaty, they are bound to suppress. Crawford and Lindsay, Presid. Parl. Edinburgh, Jan. 16, 1646."

The lords having taken these Desires of the Scots Parliament into consideration, expressed their sense upon them in the following Resolutions: "1. That there be no harm, prejudice, injury, or violence, done to the king's royal person. 2. That there be no change of government other than has been these 3 years past. 3. That the king's posterity be in no ways prejudiced in their lawful succession to the crown and government of these kingdoms."

—The question being put, That these Votes, now expressed, be sent in a letter to the kingdom of Scotland, it was resolved in the affirmative. Then the Desires of the Scots Parliament being read a second time, were agreed to.—Then it was resolved, That the Papers read this day, with the votes of this house thereupon, be communicated to the commons at a conference, and their concurrence desired therein;" which was done accordingly.

Answer sent to the Scots Parliament by both Houses.] Jan. 26. The earl of Manchester reported, That the committee were of opinion, That the expressions in the Letter, Declaration and Desires of the parliament of Scotland, was such a testimony of the fidelity of that kingdom to this, that the like was never given by any kingdom to another; and that they had framed the following Letter to be sent to the parliament of Scotland: this being read, was agreed to, ordered to be signed by the Speakers of both houses, and sent forthwith to Edinburgh by sir Peter Killegrew:

To the Right Honourable the Lords and to the Commissioners for Shires and Boroughs, assembled in the Parliament of Scotland; Jan. 27, 1646.

"Right Honourable; A letter from your lordships, dated at Edinburgh the 16th Instant, and the Papers therewith sent having been communicated to both houses of the parliament of England, we are commanded to return this Answer: they do assure their brethren of Scotland, that nothing needs to be said unto them for removing any jealousies out of their hearts, or for strengthening that confidence which they have in the affections of that nation: and they do presume that the proceedings of the houses of the parliament of England, from the very beginning of these troubles, are a sufficient declaration of their integrity, and of their constant affection to their brethren of Scotland. And to the desires of the kingdom of Scotland they do return these Answers: To the first, That when the king shall be at Holdenby, and the Scots forces gone out of this kingdom, both houses of parliament (saving, according to their former Declarations, the peculiar rights of the kingdom of England) will then appoint a committee of theirs, to join with a committee of the kingdom of Scotland, to employ their best endeavours to procure his majesty's assent to the Propositions agreed on by both kingdoms and presented to his majesty at Newcastle, and to the disposing of the Bishops Lands, according to the ordinance already passed both houses in that behalf. And in case the king shall not give his assent thereunto, the houses however are still resolved firmly to continue and maintain the happy union between the two kingdoms according to the Treaties and Covenant; and that according to the late treaty between the kingdoms, no cessation, nor any pacification or agreement for Peace whatsoever, shall be made by either kingdom, or the armies of either kingdom, without the mutual advice and consent of both kingdoms. To the second Desire, both houses do declare That it is not their intention, by their appointing of persons to wait upon the king in his journey to Holdenby, to make a settlement of any persons in any particular places, nor to be any prejudice to any of the king's servants that are of either nation, who have adhered to the parliaments; and that none shall be debarred from having access to his majesty who have warrant from the parliament of Scotland, or from the committee of that parliament thereunto authorized, except such as are disabled by the Propositions agreed on by both kingdoms. To the third Desire, The coming of the king, according to the votes of both houses of the parliament of England, being agreeable to the Covenant and Treaties; they do declare that, upon any troubles that shall arise to the kingdom of Scotland for the same, they will assist them according to the said Covenant and Treaties. To the fourth and last Desire, both houses return Answer, That their garrisons being delivered up, and the Scots army and forces being marched out of this kingdom, they will take this their desire into speedy consideration. This being all we have in command, from the houses, we rest your, &c."

Letters from the Commissioners appointed to receive the King from the Scots Army.] Jan. 27. The earl of Manchester presented the following Letters to the lords, all of them directed to him as Speaker of that house; which were read. And first,

A Letter from the Commissioners appointed to receive the Person of the King from the Scots Army.

"My lord; We are now all together at Durham; some of us got hither on horseback last night, others, by reason of the length of the journey and foulness of the ways, not until this day. At Northallerton, where we all arrived late the 20th of this instant January, we understood, by the earl of Stamford, Mr Goodwin, and Mr. Ashurst, that, by reason of some difference in reckoning the days, whereof we suppose they have given you a full account, the first 100,000*l.* appointed to be paid by the Treaty, was not then received, but was delivered to the Scots the next morning, which was done in our presence; whereupon we computed that the Scots had still ten days to remove their quarters from this side the Tyne, and to quit the garrisons of Newcastle and Tynemouth; and that probably they would not remove out of their quarters, which they possess all over the bishoprick of Durham and the confining parts of Yorkshire, before the full time assigned by the treaty, according to their computation, be expired; which will be like to involve the service wherein you have employed us, concerning the reception of the King's Person, in greater difficulties and more inconveniences than were expected; whilst, upon the account of the houses, we hoped the Scots army should have removed on the north side Tyne, and the garrison of Newcastle have been delivered by the 15th of this instant January: but we shall faithfully endeavour to discharge the trust you have reposed in us in this weighty affair, according to our instructions, intending to be at Newcastle to-morrow morning; and so we remain your, &c. Pembroke and Montgomery, B. Denbigh, E. Montague. Durham, Jan. 22, 1646."

Another Letter from the same.

"My lord; We came to Newcastle on Saturday, and on Monday we sent to the king, that he would be pleased to appoint when we should wait on him, who assigned us this day between 9 and 10 in the morning; at which time my lord of Pembroke* signified to his majesty what we had in command from the parliament; whereupon the king said, 'It was a business of great concernment, and that it would take some time to give us an Answer, for he had Quæries to make;' and, a little before we took our leave, he said, 'He would send for us to-morrow or on Thursday.' We likewise, this morning, according to our Instructions, signified our arrival to the Scots commissioners and general, who have as yet given us no answer. We shall speedily give your lordships a farther account, and, upon all occasions, endeavour to approve ourselves, &c." Newcastle, Jan. 26, 1646."

* "When the intelligence," says Hume, "of the final resolution of the Scottish nation to surrender him, was brought to the King, he happened, at that very time, to be playing at chess. Such command of temper did he possess, that he continued his game without interruption; and none of the by-standers could perceive that the letter he perused, had brought him news of any consequence. The English Commissioners, who, some days after, came to take him under their custody, were admitted to kiss his hands; and he received them with the same grace and cheerfulness, as if they had travelled on no other errand than to pay court to him. The old earl of Pembroke, in particular, who was one of them, he congratulated on his strength and vigour, that he was still able, during such a season, to perform so long a journey in company with so many young people."

"My lord; We have already given an account, that upon Tuesday last we signified to the king, the Scots commissioners and the general, that we were come, by command of both houses of parliament, to receive his majesty's person. Yesterday we kept the Fast, and his majesty sent to let us know, that in that regard to defer his Answer until Thursday. This morning we received commands to attend him at four o'clock in the afternoon, which we did accordingly; and, after some general conferences, the king was pleased to propound some Questions, the substance whereof, and of our Answers, which were both by word of mouth, are as follow: 1. His majesty asked, 'Whether we had power to place or displace his servants; and what servants he was to have placed about him?' We answered, The houses had appointed some to attend him in his journey to Holdenby, a list of whose names we should present unto him. 2. 'Whether those which are now servants, might not go with him, although not wait upon him?' We answered, That if his majesty would give us the names of such as he desired should go with him in that condition, we would then acquaint his majesty whether they might or not, according to our Instructions. 3. 'Whether he might not speak to us severally?' We answered, That if his majesty spake any thing of moment, we were to acquaint the committee with it, without which we could not discharge our trust. 4. 'Whether he was to appoint the time of his going?' We answered, That we desired his majesty would appoint a time; but unless it were a short time it would not consist with our Instructions, by which we were commanded to attend him with all convenient speed to Holdenby. Whereupon his majesty did declare, 'That he would go with us to Holdenby,' and nominated Monday or Tuesday to begin his journey; but being told by some of his servants, that he could not be accommodated with necessaries by that time, he appointed Wednesday, whereunto we agreed; and shall at that time be ready to wait upon him according unto our Instructions. We desire that the committee of the revenue do take care and give order that Holdenby-House be repaired and fitted for the reception of the king, and provision made of all necessaries fitting for the king in his journey, and when he is come to Holdenby, according to your own order; so we remain, &c. Newcastle, Jan. 28, 1646."

Another Letter from the same.

"My lord; We have already given your lordships an account of what the earl of Pembroke said to the king at our first waiting on him; and in our last, of the 28th instant, of the king's Questions and our Answers, which were delivered by the earl of Denbigh this day. As soon as the Scots horse, under the command of lieut. gen. Lesley, had marched through this town, there came to us the Scots commissioners and the general. The earl of Lothian then acquainted us, that they had taken their leave of his majesty, and had delivered to him a Declaration from the kingdom of Scotland, a copy whereof was also delivered to us by his lordship, which we send you here enclosed;* whereupon we immediately attended the king; and presently after the Scots guard about the court were relieved by the English, without noise or disturbance; and about the same time the keys of Newcastle were delivered to major-general Skippon. The commissioners of Scotland and the general have proceeded with that honour and candour in the managing of this affair, that we should neither do them nor ourselves right, if we did not represent it unto you. We are, &c. Newcastle, Jan. 30, 1646."

Letter from the Commissioners attending the King, concerning his Majesty's writing in Cyphers to the French Agent.] Feb. 8. The following Letter from the Commissioners attending the King was read in the house of lords:

To the Right Hon. the Earl of MANCHESTER,
Speaker to the House of Peers, pro tempore.

"My Lord, Durham, Feb. 3, 1646.

"Upon Monday last there fell out an accident, whereof we think it very fit to give you this account: One Mr. Mungo Murray, formerly his majesty's servant, but never in arms, was permitted by us to take his leave of the king in the presence-chamber; and, being called aside, had a Paper put into his hand by his majesty; which being observed, upon examination he denied it not, but willingly suffered the said paper to be taken out of his pocket, wherein were written some lines all in cyphers, and directed to be by him delivered to the French Agent. Hereupon, though by his own earnest protestation, and by his ingenuity in not denying it, we had reason to believe he was surprized by the king; and although we had no express power of imprisoning contained in our Instructions, yet for deterring others from the like boldness, and for preventing of inconveniences, we thought fit to take upon us to commit him; but the earl of Lothian giving a very good testimony of him, and undertaking for his appearance at the command of the parliament; and considering in all likelihood he had no foreknowledge of his majesty's intentions, or any other design therein; we thought fit, after two days imprisonment, to release him, upon condition to render himself when and where you shall appoint. The king came this day from Newcastle to Durham, where he arrived by two of the clock in the afternoon; and the reason why we take no long journeys is to avoid such inconveniences as possibly might befall us in travelling late in the evening. Some of the Muscovia Company have importuned us for leave to move his majesty for a Letter, in his name, to the emperor of Russia, the effect whereof is as follows: 1. 'An Excuse for his Imperial majesty's messengers not having access to the king, by reason of the hostilities in this kingdom. 2. To condole the death of the late Emperor. 3. To congratulate the happy enthronement of his son the present Emperor. 4. To desire a continuation of the antient league and amity betwixt the two crowns. 5. To desire the resettlement of the antient privileges formerly enjoyed by the English nation. 6. To recommend the person of Spencer Bretton, now resident at the Emperor's court, to be agent there, until his majesty shall send his Ambassador.' The letter proposed, being the same in substance which the parliament have expressed by two several letters to his imperial majesty, the company desires that the king's majesty will be graciously pleased to sign the same: and they alledge it to concern the trade very much, and to be no other than what hath been permitted in like case to the Turkey Company; but we have referred them to your further directions, which shall be also observed, by, my lord, &c. P. S. We send your lordships here inclosed the copy of the Cypher we took from Mr. Murray."

The lords ordered that it be referred to the earls of Lincoln and Warwick, and the lord Wharton, to discover the above-mentioned Cypher; and that the Letter from the commissioners be communicated to the commons: which being done accordingly,

Feb. 9. The commons sent up a draught of an additional Instruction for Philip earl of Pembroke, and the rest of the Commissioners that had the King in custody; which was to this effect: "You are to take special care to prevent the secret conveying of any Letters, Papers, or Messages, to or from the king; and for that purpose you, or any three of you, have hereby power to examine and search all or any such persons or packets as you shall think fit. And also to secure and restrain the persons of such as you shall thereupon see cause, until the pleasure of both houses of parliament be known: and you are also, from time to time, to give notice to both houses of your proceedings therein." The lords agreed to this Instruction and declared their approbation of Mungo Murray's commitment by the commissioners.

Declaration of the Commissioners with the King, against Persons coming to be touched by his Majesty for the Evil. Feb. 13. Another Letter from the Commissioners with the King, with a Declaration inclosed, was read, viz.

"My lord; By your lordship's letter you have been pleased to give us notice of their lordships approbation and acceptance of our endeavours to serve them: we desire that, by the same hand, our humble thanks may be returned to their lordships, with this assurance, that from so great a favour we cannot but receive encouragement to improve our services to the best advantage. The king came to Ripon on Saturday night last, where he rested upon the Lord's Day. A little before dinner many diseased persons came, bringing with them ribbons and gold, and were only touched, without any other ceremony.* We are now at Leeds, where hundreds attend in the same manner; and for that it may be of very dangerous consequence to his majesty's person and safety, and otherwise inconvenient, we have agreed to publish a Declaration, the copy of which we here inclosed send you; and if you shall think fit of any other way to prevent this inconveniency, none shall be more ready to obey your commands than Your &c. Pembroke and Montgomery, B. Denbigh Ed. Montague. Leeds Feb. 9. 1646."

The DECLARATION referred to in the foregoing Letter.

"Whereas divers people do daily resort unto the court, under pretence of having the Evil; and whereas many of them are in truth infected with other dangerous diseases, and are therefore altogether unfit to come into the presence of his majesty: these are therefore strictly to require and charge all persons whatsoever, which are diseased, not to presume hereafter to repair unto the court, wheresoever it be, upon pain of being severely punished for such their intrusion; and we do further require all sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, constables, and other officers to see this our order published. Dated at Leeds the 9th Feb. 1646. By Command of the Commissioners appointed by both houses of parliament to attend the King's Person at Holdenby. Daniel Erle, Secretary to the Commissioners."

Feb. 15. About this time the populace began to shew a dislike against the Excise, which they had long groaned under; and this day a great tumult happened in London: the mob rising in Smithfield, pulled down the Excise-Office, and did more mischief; but, by the vigilance of the city magistrates, they were suppressed, many of them taken and sent to prison: however, on this warning, the commons thought proper to frame a Declaration of the Grounds for laying and continuing the Excise, which will appear in the sequel.

Advice of the King's Arrival at Holdenby-

* The King being delivered over by the Scots to the English commissioners, was conducted, under a guard, to Holdenby, in the county of Northampton. On his journey, the whole country flocked to behold him, moved partly by curiosity, partly by compassion and affection. If any still retained rancour against him, in his present condition, they passed in silence; while his well wishers, more generous than prudent, accompanied his march with tears, with acclamations, and with prayers for his safety. That ancient superstition likewise of desiring the king's touch in scrophulous distempers, seemed to acquire fresh credit among the people, from the general tenderness which began to prevail for this virtuous and unhappy monarch." Hume.

House.] Feb. 18. A Letter was read from the earl of Pembroke, and the other commissioners, with advice that the king was come to Holdenby; addressed to the Speaker of the house of peers:

“My lord; Holdenby, Feb. 16. 1646.

By the providence of God, which hath gone along with us from the first step to the last in this journey, the king is come well to Holdenby. Col. Greaves, who commanded the convoy, has managed his trust with great care and vigilancy, and hath performed extraordinary duty in his own person, which we hold ourselves obliged to represent unto you. We have here 900 horse and dragoons, which, quartering within a little compass, cannot but be very burthensome to the country; and therefore intreat your lordship to move the houses to give special directions for their pay. We are here now after five weeks spent in that service, attending their further orders, according to the commands laid upon us in our first Instructions. Our hope and earnest desire is, that our employment being come to this period, you will please to move their lordships to enjoin us to wait upon them at London; which we shall acknowledge a very great favour done to, My lord, &c. Pembroke and Montgomery, B. Denbigh. Ed. Montague.”

Sentiments of the Contemporary Writers upon the Charge against the Scots of selling the King.] We have now gone through our account of the king's throwing himself into the hands of the Scots Army, and their delivering up his majesty's person to the parliament's Commissioners, as it stands in the Journals of both houses, a crisis of English History which has been much canvassed. Every one knows that the Scots nation have been, and still are, blamed for giving up their natural-born king, (who had fled to them for protection) into the hands of his enemies. Nay, some do not hesitate to say that he was actually sold by them. We shall, therefore, before we enter upon other matters, exhibit the Sentiments of the several Contemporary Writers relating to this transaction.

Mr. Whitlocke* tells us, ‘That on the 24th of September a new committee was appointed of both houses, to treat with the Scots commissioners about disposing of the King's Person; which was purposely named to carry on the design intended: that the latter end of December there began to be an understanding between some here and the Scots, for their delivering up of the king's person to the parliament: that the king was much displeased with that nation for delivering him up; and that he also disliked going to Holdenby on account of the air: but that the Scots laid hold of his majesty's refusing to take the Covenant and to sign the Propositions, for their excuse.” He adds, That the parliament at Edinburgh had voted, ‘If his majesty should have thoughts of coming thither at that time, he having not subscribed the Covenant, nor satisfied the lawful desires of his subjects in both nations, they had just cause to fear the consequences of it might be very dangerous, both to him and to these kingdoms; which they desired might be timely prevented. And that if they should now receive his majesty, it would be contrary to their engagements with England and the treaties.’ And that a Scots lord told the king, If he did not sign the Covenant they must give him up to the parliament of England, and it would fall heavy upon him and his posterity.” In another place this Memorialist informs us, ‘That the aforesaid vote was carried, in the Scots parliament, but by two voices. That the king asked the Scots Commissioners, ‘Why he might not go into Scotland, when he came to their army for protection?’ And they answered him, ‘because he refused to sign the Covenant and Propositions; therefore they were to deliver him to the commissioners of the parliament of England, who were come to attend him to Holdenby-House.’ That the king desired the English commissioners, who had then received him from the Scots, to send to the parliament, that he might have two chaplains, who had not taken the Covenant, to go with him to Holdenby. And, on their refusal, amongst some other discourse, the king, as was reported by some, said, ‘That he was bought and sold.”

Lord Clarendon begins with telling us * “That when the Scots had secured the peace and quiet of their own country, by getting the king to send positive orders to the marquis of Montrose for disbanding of his forces, and transporting himself beyond sea, which he obeyed: and when they had, with such solemnity and resolution, made it plain and evident that they could not, without the most barefaced violation of their faith and allegiance, and of the fundamental principles of the Christian religion, ever deliver up their native king, who had put himself into their hands, into those of the parliament, against his own will and consent: and when afterwards they began to talk sturdily, and denied that the parliament of England had power, absolutely, to dispose of the person of the king without their approbation; to which the parliament as loudly replied, That they had nothing to do in England but to observe their orders; and added such threats to their reasons, as plainly shewed they had a contempt of their power, and would exact obedience from them, if they refused to yield it. Yet, their discourses were only kept up till they could adjust all accounts between them, and agree what price should be paid for the delivery of his person, whom one side was resolved to have, and the other as resolved not to keep. Thus they agreed; and, upon the payment of 200,000*l.* in hand, and security for as much more, upon days agreed on, the Scots delivered the king up into such hands as the parliament appointed to receive him. In this infamous manner that excellent

Sir Philip Warwick, a member of this parliament, but who had been expelled for taking part with the king, expresses himself thus. * "Whilst his majesty was employed in conferences with Henderson about the order of episcopacy, the Scots knew so well how to value him, that if it be not admitted they sold him, it must be confest, they parted with him for a good price; for they were paid 200,000*l.* upon their marching from Newcastle, and delivering up of that town, as likewise Berwick and Carlisle; and were promised 200,000*l.* more to be secured upon the public faith. But if the English army had been left to themselves, and the Presbyters had not then been prevalent in parliament, the Independent party would soon have shortened the taylor's bill. And thus were extinguished, or thus vanished, those loud and public assertions the Scots had made, That they would not do so base an act, as to render up their prince's person, who was come to them for safety in so great a danger; and that this act could not consist with their duty or allegiance, or Covenant, or with the honour of their army; it being contrary to the law and common practice of all nations, in the case even of private men; which Loudon, their chancellor, publicly made profession of at a conference of the two houses at Westminster. But at last silver out-weighed all these considerations, and the king was delivered up into the hands of the two houses commissioners, and brought to Holdenby-House in Northamptonshire, and denied his own chaplains and servants to be about him: a true Presbyterian Spirit."

Another Writer, who lived in these unhappy times, remarks,† "That the Propositions, sent to the king by the parliament, were the same dethroning ones which they used to send, and therefore he would not assent to them. Nor did the Scots swallow them at first, but made some exceptions against them, only, it seems, to make the parliament perceive they meant not to put the king into their hands gratis; so at last the bargain was made between them, and upon payment of 200,000*l.* the king was put into the hands of the commissioners which the English parliament sent down to receive him." He adds; "That this action bore the vile complexion of feigned religion, very covetousness, cowardice, perjury and treachery."

On the other side, Mr. Hollis,‡ who appears, by the Journals, to have been a Teller almost in every Division of the house relating to the Scots, intirely acquits them from this infamous charge. His account of this affair runs thus:

* Memoirs of the Reign of King Charles I. London 1701, p. 295.

† The History of the Civil Wars of England, from 1640 to 1660, by Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury.

"The Scots had cause enough to have their jealousy prompt them that it was not safe for them to depart with their army, lay by their swords, and leave standing in this kingdom so great a force, which they knew to be so ill affected to them, and might act to their prejudice; and, the king being in their power, perhaps force both him and the parliament to a peace disadvantageous to Scotland, and differing from those grounds, upon which, by the kingdom of England, they were engaged in this quarrel; or else make no peace at all, but interpose (as Cromwell to the earl of Manchester) to hinder it; and themselves govern by the sword, not only to the prejudice of Scotland, but also ruin of England. The Scots had no thoughts but of settling a Peace, laying down of arms, calling the people, and all things, to revert into their old channel; therefore they were willing to be gone and return into their own country, in confidence that, after their departure, the army under sir Thomas Fairfax should likewise presently be disbanded, since there was no more need of any army at all; so they were willing to go. But then the question was, If they would go or not, and how the soldiers would be disposed to march out, who had not been paid for so many months, inso-much as the Scots commissioners gave in an account of 800,000*l.* arrears. Here our gallants (the Independents) hoped they had them upon the hip, and should surely give them a fall. Then they thrust on some of their little Northern heagles, as Mr. Blaxton, and others, to inform what high sums they had raised upon the country; upon which they conclude the Scots Army was in their debt, and therefore they would come to an account with them, which had been a sure way to have kept them in the kingdom 5 or 6 months longer. But to help that, our just pay-masters said, The army should march away, and some persons be left behind to see all accounts adjusted; which had required very good rhetorick to have made it justice, especially to have appeared so to the Scots soldiers: for to have sent them away without money, and then asked the countryman what the soldiers had taken, when he might say what he thought good, the soldier not there to answer for himself, and yet his pay to be thereby determined, would have been but hard measure. But the rhetorick had been, for sir Thomas Fairfax to have gone down with his army, which should have made it just and easy, and every thing; for this was it they (the Independents) desired to bring it to, as it was often moved and pressed by them. At last the well-wishers to peace, with much ado, prevailed in the house, and it was carried to offer the Scots a gross sum for all; so to part fair, and avoid the delay and disputes of an account; to which they presently agreed. Then the question was what sum. Here again we had a strong debate; for our incendiaries hung by every twig, sticking fast to their principles to dissatisfy the Scots, and break with them, if possible, upon any point;

pretending the poverty of the kingdom and the great sums the Scots had raised; and therefore they would give but 100,000*l* which they knew was all one with a hundred shillings, as to the satisfying of the soldiers for marching away. In the end, after many debates in the house, and passages to and again with the Scots commissioners, the lowest sum that could be agreed unto by the commissioners was 400,000*l*. two in hand, and the other two after some time; with a protestation of theirs, that the army would not be satisfied with less, nor enabled to march, which was motive enough for these men to deny it; for if they could have wrought the dissatisfaction of the army, so as to have refused to go, it was where they would have it. Whereupon it was opposed by them with all the power they had; but in the end the better part, that is the moderate party, who were the peace-makers, those that laboured to keep things even and fair between the two kingdoms, carried it; and the sum was voted, and all things agreed upon, though with difficulty; (for they fought it out and lost it by inches) then the Scots declared they would march out by such a day.—Yet had our Boutefeus one hope left, which was to quarrel at last about the Person of the King; believing the Scots would certainly have taken his majesty with them into Scotland. This they knew had been ground sufficient, and would have engaged all England against them, giving a confirmation to all the jealousies formerly raised, and occasioned a thousand more; and had certainly more advantaged the designs of those who thirsted after the destruction of the king first, the Scots next, and then all such as desired peace within this kingdom; and have made them a smoother way to their damnable ends; the altering of the government, and bringing in a confusion both in church and state, than any thing that could have happened; and the two kingdoms had been together in blood, the author of the mischief undiscovered, masked over with the glorious pretences of zealously vindicating the honesty and interest of England, and every breach of covenant and treaty in this cause; which made them with so much peremptoriness and incivility, and in truth injustice, demand that the Scots would deliver up his majesty, who had an equal interest in his royal person with the kingdom of England, he being equally king of both; and an equal interest in the closing and binding up the unhappy differences which were between him and both his kingdoms, they having been engaged in that quarrel at the entreaty of England; and made up together an intire body with England, as is before shewed, for the prosecution of it: therefore they had no more reason to trust us with the king than we had them, and as much were they concerned in all that related to his majesty's person; so as they had ground enough to have disputed it, and out of that hope was it pressed by the others. But the wisdom of the Scots nation fore-

sarily followed, had they been positive at that time, how they had played their enemies game to their own ruin, and even ruin to his majesty: therefore they made for him the best conditions they could, that is, for the safety and honour of his person; and, to avoid greater mischiefs, were necessitated to leave him in England; and so marched away, which they did in February 1646.—Here then the very mouth of iniquity was stopped, malice itself had nothing to say to give the least blemish to the faithfulness and reality of the kingdom of Scotland, and the clearness of their proceedings; their zeal for peace, without self-seeking and self-ends, to make advantage of the miseries and misfortunes of England."

Mr. Rushworth acts in this affair as a collector only, making few or no reflections on the conduct of the English and Scots at this particular crisis; for, after giving a copy of a Letter from the parliament of Scotland to that at Westminster, to which a Declaration from that kingdom was subjoined, (see p. 541), containing, as he remarks, their full consent to the delivering up the king, this historian proceeds to tell us,* "That the commissioners who were to receive the king came to Newcastle, on the 23d of January, to whom his majesty gave the honour of kissing his hand; and the earl of Pembroke told his majesty, They were commanded by both houses of parliament to attend him to Holdenby; at which his majesty did not seem at all surprized, but inquired how the ways were. On the 28th of January the Scots lords being all with his majesty, he told them, He had often desired to go into Scotland; that he came into their army for protection, and had it, but now perceived they were not willing he should go to Edinburgh; and they being to deliver up the garrisons, he desired to know how they would dispose of him; and for that end required them to withdraw, and consider to whom they would deliver him, which they did; and coming in again, they told his majesty, That they had considered of his speech; and that since his majesty had refused to take the Covenant and sign the Propositions, they were to deliver him to the commissioners of both houses of parliament of England, who were come to attend him to Holdenby. On Saturday the 30th of January the Scots marched out of Newcastle, Skippon took possession of it, and the parliament's commissioners received the king into their charge; soon after they set forwards with him to Durham, and so on to Holdenby, being met by the way by sir Thomas Fairfax, who kissed his majesty's hand, and, having conducted his majesty through Nottingham, took his leave very respectfully; and so his majesty was brought to Holdenby, where he arrived on Tuesday the 16th of February."†

† To the sentiments of the above-quoted contemporary Historians, we shall add the following reflections of Mr. Hume, upon this

And now, leaving it to the reader's judgment to determine, from the foregoing extracts of the Journals of both houses, how far these contemporary writers have been led by truth or prejudice, we proceed to the subsequent transactions of parliament.

The King desires that some of his Chaplains may attend him at Holdenby.] Feb. 19. Another Letter came from the commissioners at Holdenby, with one inclosed in it from the king, which was read in these words:

To the SPEAKER of the House of Peers pro tempore, to be communicated to the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled at Westminster.

"C. R. Holdenby, Feb. 17, 1646.

"Since I have never dissembled nor hid my conscience, and that I am not yet satisfied with those alterations in Religion to which you desubject: "Great pains were taken by the Scots (and the English complied with their pretended delicacy) to make this estimation and payment of arrears appear a quite different transaction from that for the delivery of the king's person: but common sense requires, that they should be regarded as one and the same. The English, it is evident, had they not been previously assured of receiving the king, would never have parted with so considerable a sum; and while they weakened themselves, by the same measure have strengthened a people, with whom they must afterwards have so material an interest to discuss. Thus the Scottish nation underwent, and still undergo (for such grievous stains are not easily wiped off), the reproach of selling their king, and betraying their prince for money. In vain did they maintain, that this money was, on account of former services, undoubtedly their due; that in their present situation, no other measure, without the utmost indiscretion, or even their apparent ruin, could be embraced; and that, though they delivered their king into the hands of his open enemies, they were themselves as much his open enemies as those to whom they surrendered him, and their common hatred against him had long united the two parties in strict alliance with each other. They were still answered, that they made use of this scandalous expedient for obtaining their wages; and that, after taking arms, without any provocation, against their sovereign, who had ever loved and cherished them, they had deservedly fallen into a situation, from which they could not extricate themselves, without either infamy or imprudence. The infamy of this bargain had such an influence on the Scottish parliament, that they once voted, that the king should be protected, and his liberty insisted on. But the general assembly interposed, and pronounced, that, as he had refused to take the covenant, which was pressed on him, it became not the godly to concern themselves about his fortunes. After this declaration, it behoved the parliament to retract their vote."

sire my consent, I will not lose time in giving Reasons, which are obvious to every body, why it is fit for me to be attended by some of my Chaplains, whose opinions, as clergymen, I esteem and reverence; not only for the exercise of my conscience, but also even for clearing my judgment concerning the present differences in Religion, as I have more fully declared to Mr. Marshall and his fellow minister; having shewed them that this is the best and likeliest means of giving me satisfaction; which, without it, I cannot have in these things, whereby the distractions of this Church may be the better settled; wherefore I desire that at least two of those reverend divines, whose names I have here set down, may have free liberty to wait upon me, for the discharging of their duty to me according to their function, viz. The bishop of London,* the bishop of Salisbury,† the bishop of Peterborough,‡ Dr. Sheldon, clerk of my closet, Dr. Marshe, dean of York, Dr. Saunderson, Dr. Bailey, Dr. Fuller, Dr. Hammond, Dr. Heywood, Dr. Beal, Dr. Taylor."

The lords resolved to take this Letter of the King's into consideration the next morning. Notwithstanding which, we do not find that they took any further notice of it this month.

March 8. The commons voted, "That no member of that House should have any command in the garrisons or forces under sir Thor. Fairfax: That there be no officer above a colonel: that they should all take the Covenant: that none who had borne arms against the parliament should be in command: that they should all conform to the established church." This last occasioned a debate and a division of the house, but was carried for it by 136 against 108.—Then it was resolved, That no profane curser or swearer, drunkard or whoremaster, or otherwise scandalous in life or conversation, shall be employed as an officer in any of the garrisons or forces that are to be kept up in the kingdom of England.

The business of reducing the army had been debated, on the 19th ult. in the commons; and the question being put, Whether there should be a number of foot kept up, at the pay of the kingdom, more than what would be sufficient for the keeping of such garrisons as should be continued? the house divided, and it passed in the negative, 158 against 148. After which vote the house proceeded to order the dismantling and slighting the works and garrisons of several cities and towns, many castles and forts, in England, Wales, &c. amounting, in all, to a very great number.

A second Letter from the King, desiring the Attendance of his Chaplains.] March 8. The Speaker presented to the house of lords some letters he had received from the earl of Denbigh, &c. with another Letter inclosed from the King, was read: as follows:

"C. R. It being now 17 days since I wrote unto you from hence, and not receiving any Answer to what I then desired, I cannot but now again renew the same unto you: and indeed concerning any thing but the necessary duty of a Christian, I would not thus, at this time, trouble you with any of my desires; but my being attended with some of my Chaplains, whom I esteem and reverence, is that which is so necessary for me, even considering my present condition, whether it be in relation to my conscience, or a happy settlement of the present distractions in Religion, that I will slight divers kinds of censures rather than not obtain what I demand; nor shall I do you the wrong as in this to doubt the obtaining of my wish, it being totally grounded upon reason; for desiring you to consider, not thinking it needful to mention, the divers Reasons, which no Christian can be ignorant of, for point of conscience, I must assure you that I cannot, as I ought, take into consideration those alterations in Religion, which have been, and will be offered unto me, without such help as I desire; because I can never judge rightly of, or be altered, in, any thing of my opinion, so long as any ordinary way of finding out the truth is denied me: but when this is granted me, I promise you faithfully not to strive for victory in argument, but to seek and to submit to truth, according to that judgment which God hath given me; always holding it my best and greatest conquest to give contentment to my two houses of parliament in all things which I conceive not to be against my conscience or honour; not doubting likewise but that you will be ready to satisfy me in reasonable things, as I hope to find in this particular, concerning the attendance of my Chaplains upon me. Holdenby March 6, 1646."

Which is denied him.] The question being put, Whether their lordships will allow any of that number which the king desires, in his list, to go down to him to Holdenby, to reside there for 20 days: it was resolved in the affirmative. And the King's Letter was ordered to be sent down to the house of commons. The lords also appointed a committee of their house to draw up an Answer to his majesty's Letter, according to the sense of that house, That if the king thought fit to admit such of his Chaplains, as had taken the Covenant, they were inclined to give them leave. But the commons were more explicit than the lords in this affair; and absolutely voted, "That no persons should be employed about the person of the king, in any capacity, or be admitted to have access to him, but such only as have continued with the parliament and adhered thereto; and had testified their good affections to the parliament and their cause, and had taken the national League and Covenant.*

* "That which most displeased the king," says lord Clarendon, "was, that they would not permit him to have his own Chaplains; but ordered Presbyterian Ministers to attend

A Petition from several Officers of the Army to the House of Lords.] March 25. The next remarkable transaction of this month is a Petition from some Officers of the Army to the lords, which is the first we have met with presented from that quarter: viz.

To the Right Hon. the Lords in Parliament assembled: The Humble PETITION of Colonels, Lieutenant-Colonels, Majors, and other Officers that have faithfully served the great Cause of the Kingdom, under the Authority of the Parliament,

"Sheweth; That your Petitioners having faithfully served you in the maintenance and settlement of Religion, according to the tenor of the national Covenant taken by them, of the Liberty of the Subject, and of the Privileges of Parliament, in the times of the kingdom's greatest exigence, which were the principal ends for which they were at first engaged; they cannot but hold themselves bound in honour and conscience, in concurrence with many others, to tender to your honours consideration such things as they, in all submission, conceive exceedingly conducing to the speedy effecting of the said ends, together with their own sad and neglected condition; humbly desiring your honours favourable construction of their good intentions therein, with an opportune and timely Answer unto these ensuing particulars, viz. 1. That the public worship of God may speedily be settled according to the Word of God, and the example of the best reformed churches. 2. That the subject may have the benefit of Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, so far forth as may comport with the necessities of the kingdom. 3. That all committees in the several counties may be removed; and that the treasurers and sequestrators of the said counties may be called to a speedy and strict account, for the better satisfaction and ease of the kingdom. 4. That such offi-

Divine Service, and his majesty, utterly refusing to be present at their devotions, was compelled at those hours to be his own chaplain in his bed-chamber; where he constantly used the Common-Prayer by himself. His majesty bore this constraint so heavily, that he writ a letter to the house of peers, in which he inclosed a list of the names of thirteen of his Chaplains; any two of which he desired might have liberty to attend him for his devotion. To which, after many days consideration, they returned this Answer; 'That all those Chaplains were disaffected to the Established Government of the Church, and had not taken the Covenant; but that there were others who had, who, if his majesty pleased, should be sent him.' After this Answer, his majesty thought it to no purpose to importune them farther in that particular; but, next to the having his own Chaplains, he would have been best pleased to have been without any; they who were sent by them, being men of mean parts, and of most impertinent and troublesome confidence and importunity."

cers as have served under any general command, may have the accounts of their arrears speedily audited in London; and that a special order may be issued to the several committees of accounts residing in other counties, forthwith to audit the accounts of such officers as have been subservient to the orders of the committees of the said counties. 5. That such Pay as shall appear due unto the said officers, under the hands of committees of accounts, according to the establishment, may be forthwith paid unto them, with interest; that the Ordinance upon the Bishops Lands, with the security of the Excise, may be revived for the discharge thereof; and that such part as is respited on the public faith, may be discharged, with interest, at the end of 6 months, deducting the surcharges of the several counties; and that an order may be issued to the said several counties to bring in their surcharge within the time of 3 months, or otherwise that they shall not be charged to our accounts; that so all of us may not be utterly ruined, as some of us already are, by tedious and long solicitations, nor your justice blemished through our necessities and sufferings. 6. That all such Officers and Soldiers as have contracted any debts since this war begun, in order to the carrying on of the public service, either by want of the payment of their due salary, or by reason of their own disbursements, may have their persons freed from all process, arrests, or molestation until their arrears shall be discharged; and that then their creditors shall be proportionably satisfied, and the said officers left to the usual course and full power of the law as formerly. 7. That an act of indemnity may be passed for all Officers and Soldiers, for such actions as have been done by them in reference to the public service since the beginning of this war. 8. That all such Officers as have lost the benefit of their estates, and have disbursed divers sums of money for raising men, horses, arms, or ammunition, or in the managing their public trust, shall be considered for their said losses, and allowed for the said disbursements, upon just proof thereof made before the committees of accounts; and that the said committees shall have special order given them to audit such disbursements when they shall be brought unto them. 9. That not forgetting your honours tender care of the sad condition of bleeding Ireland, and that nothing may be wanting on our parts towards the promoting of so honourable and pious a work, some of us have engaged ourselves already, and the rest are most ready to contribute their best assistance thereunto, even as your honours shall be pleased to command us. And, in pursuance of a full establishment of the particulars aforesaid, as in your great wisdoms shall be thought most convenient, your petitioners do offer their utmost service and assistance, with their lives and fortunes, and shall ever pray, &c. colonels; Jeremiah Baines, James Baker, Rt. Wiltshire, Wm. Forcy, Wm. Warneford, lieut. colonels."

The officers who subscribed this Petition were all called in again, and had for Answer, "That the house gave them thanks for their good affections to them, and their services to the kingdom and parliament; and they take it well concerning their offer for Ireland: and as to their arrears, their lordships will do their parts, and will take their Petition into consideration."

On the same day a copy of the above Petition was presented to the house of commons by the same Officers, to whom the house sent out four of their members with the following Answer: "That, as to their Arrears, the house had and would take them into consideration, with others, in such manner as they should think fit, as well as their desires of employment. That as to the rest of the Petition, about the Management of public Affairs, it did not concern any persons to give instructions to the houses therein; yet, in consideration the petitioners were men that had done service to the parliament, and, in regard of their professions, and that they might have done this merely out of inadvertency, they were willing to pass it by."

Petition and Representation from the Army to Sir T. Fairfax.] March 30. The house of lords were informed, by some officers who came to offer themselves volunteers for the Irish service, of a Petition handed about in the Army, to be signed and delivered to sir Tho. Fairfax, their General; a copy of which was shewn and read to the lords in these words:*

To his Excellency sir THOMAS FAIRFAX, Knt. General of the Parliament's Forces: The HUMBLE PETITION of the OFFICERS and SOLDIERS of the Army under your Command,

"Sheweth; That, ever since our first engaging in this service, for preserving the power

* The following succinct account of the origin of the commotions in the Army, as given by Mr. Hume, will throw considerable light upon the subsequent proceedings of both houses: "In proportion as the terror of the king's power diminished, the division between independent and presbyterian became every day more apparent; and the neutrals found it at last requisite to seek shelter in one or the other faction. Many new writs were issued for elections, in the room of members who had died, or were disqualified by adhering to the king; yet still the presbyterians retained the superiority among the commons: and all the peers, except lord Say, were esteemed of that party. The independents, to whom the inferior sectaries adhered, predominated in the army: and the troops of the new model were universally infected with that enthusiastic spirit. To their assistance did the independent party among the commons chiefly trust, in their proof the kingdom in the hands of the parliament, we have, in our several places, served them with all faithfulness; and although we have lain under many discouragements for want of pay and other necessities, yet have we not disputed their commands, disobeyed their orders, nor disturbed them with Petitions; nor have there any visible discontents appeared amongst us, to the encouragement of their enemies, and the impediment of their affairs; but have, with all chearfulness, done summer service in winter seasons, improving the utmost of our abilities in the advancement of their service: and seeing God hath now crowned our endeavours with the end of our desires, viz. the dispersing of their public enemies, and reducing them to their obedience, the king being now brought in; our brethren the Scots satisfied and departed the kingdom; all jects for acquiring the ascendant over their antagonists. Soon after the retreat of the Scots, the presbyterians, seeing every thing reduced to obedience, began to talk of diminishing the army: and, on pretence of easing the public burdens, they levelled a deadly blow at the opposite faction. They proposed to embark a strong detachment, under Skippon and Massey, for the service of Ireland: they openly declared their intention of making a great reduction of the remainder.* It was even imagined that another new model of the army was projected in order to regain to the presbyterians that superiority which they had so imprudently lost by the former. The army had small inclination to the service of Ireland; a country barbarous, uncultivated, and laid waste by massacres and civil commotions: they had less inclination to disband, and to renounce that pay, which, having earned it through fatigues and dangers, they now purposed to enjoy in ease and tranquillity. And most of the officers, having risen from the dregs of the people, had no other prospect, if deprived of their commission, than that of returning to languish in their native poverty and obscurity. These motives of interest acquired additional influence, and became more dangerous to the parliament, from the religious spirit by which the army was universally actuated. Among the generality of men, educated in regular, civilized societies, the sentiments of shame, duty, honour, have considerable authority, and serve to counterbalance and direct the motives derived from private advantage: but, by the predominancy of enthusiasm among the parliamentary forces, these salutary principles lost their credit, and were regarded as mere human inventions, yea moral institutions, fitter for heathens than for Christians. The saint resigned over to superior guidance, was at full liberty to gratify all his appetites, disguised under the appearance of pious zeal. And, besides the strange corruptions engendered by dangers seemingly blown over, and peace in all their quarters; we, emboldened by their manifold promises and declarations to defend and protect those that appeared and acted in their service, do herewith humbly present to your Excellency the humble Representation of our Desires annexed; which we humbly beseech your excellency to recommend, orrepresent, in our behalf to the parliament. And your Petitioners shall honour and pray for your Excellency."

The HUMBLE REPRESENTATION of the DESIRES of the OFFICERS and SOLDIERS of the Army under the Command of his Excellency sir THOMAS FAIRFAX, presented first to his Excellency, to be, by him, represented to the Parliament.

I. "Whereas the necessity and emergency of this spirit, it eluded and loosened all the ties of morality, and gave entire scope, and even sanction, to the selfishness and ambition which naturally adhere to the human mind. The military confessors were farther encouraged in disobedience to superiors, by that spiritual pride to which a mistaken piety is so subject. They were not, they said, mere janizaries; mercenary troops inlisted for hire, and to be disposed of at the will of their paymasters. Religion and liberty were the motives which had excited them to arms; and they had a superior right to see those blessings, which they had purchased with their blood, ensured to future generations. By the same title that the presbyterians, in contradistinction to the royalists, had appropriated to themselves the epithet of Godly, or the Well-affected, the independents did now, in contradistinction to the presbyterians, assume this magnificent appellation, and arrogate all the ascendant which naturally belongs to it. Hearing of parties in the house of commons, and being informed that the minority were friends to the army, the majority enemies; the troops naturally interested themselves in that dangerous distinction, and were eager to give the superiority to their partisans. Whatever hardships they underwent, though perhaps derived from inevitable necessity, were ascribed to a settled design of oppressing them, and resented as an effect of the animosity and malice of their adversaries. Notwithstanding the great revenue, which accrued from taxes, assessments, sequestrations, and compositions, considerable arrears were due to the army; and many of the private men, as well as officers, had near a twelvemonth's pay still owing them. The army suspected, that this deficiency was purposely contrived in order to oblige them to live at free quarters: and by rendering them odious to the country, serve as a pretence for disbanding them. When they saw such members as were employed in committees and civil offices, accumulate fortunes, they accused them of rapine and public plunder. And, as no plan was pointed out by the commons for the pay-the war hath put us upon many actions which the law could not warrant, nor we have acted, in a time of settled peace; we humbly desire that, before the time of our disbanding, a full and sufficient provision may be made by ordinance of parliament, (to which the royal assent may be procured) for our indemnity and security in all such services.—II. That auditors, or commissioners, may be speedily appointed and authorized to repair to the head quarters of this army, to audit and state our accounts, as well as our former services in this army; and that, before the disbanding of the army, satisfaction may be given to the petitioners for their arrears; that so the charge, trouble, and loss of time, which we must necessarily undergo in attendance for attaining of them, may be prevented (we having had experience that many have been reduced to miserable extremi-

ment of arrears, the soldiers dreaded, that, after they should be disbanded or embarked for Ireland, their enemies, who predominated in the two houses, would entirely defraud them of their right, and oppress them with impunity. On this ground or pretence did the first commotions begin in the army. A petition, addressed to Fairfax the general, was handed about; craving an indemnity, and that ratified by the king, for any illegal actions, of which, during the course of the war, the soldiers might have been guilty; together with satisfaction in arrears, freedom from pressing, relief of widows and maimed soldiers, and pay till disbanded. The commons, aware of what combustible materials the army was composed, were alarmed at this intelligence. Such a combination, they knew, if not checked in its first appearance, must be attended with the most dangerous consequences, and must soon exalt the military above the civil authority. Besides summoning some officers to answer for this attempt, they immediately voted, that the petition tended to introduce mutiny, to put conditions upon the parliament, and to obstruct the relief of Ireland; and they threatened to proceed against the promoters of it, as enemies to the state, and disturbers of public peace. This declaration, which may be deemed violent, especially as the army had some ground for complaint, produced fatal effects. The soldiers lamented, that they were deprived of the privileges of Englishmen; that they were not allowed so much as to represent their grievances; that, while petitions from Essex and other places were openly encouraged against the army, their mouths were stopped; and that they, who were the authors of liberty to the nation, were reduced, by a faction in parliament, to the most grievous servitude. In this disposition was the army found by Warwick, Dacres, Massey, and other commissioners, who were sent to make them proposals for entering into the service of Ireland. Instead of inlisting, the generality objected to the terms; demanded an indemnity; were clamorous for their arrears: and, though they ty, even almost starved for want of relief, by their tedious attendance); and that no officer may be charged with any thing in his account that doth not particularly concern himself. III. That those who have voluntarily served the parliament in the late wars, may not hereafter be compelled, by press or otherwise, to serve as soldiers out of this kingdom; nor those that have served as horsemen may be compelled, by press or otherwise, to serve on foot in any future case. IV. That such in this army as have lost their limbs, and the wives and children of such as have been slain in the service, and such officers and soldiers as have sustained losses, or have been prejudiced in their estates, by adhering to the parliament, or in their persons, by sickness or imprisonment under the enemy, may have such allowance and satisfaction as may be agreeable to expressed no dissatisfaction against Skippon, who was appointed commander, they discovered much stronger inclination to serve under Fairfax and Cromwell. Some officers, who were of the presbyterian party, having entered into engagements for this service, could prevail on very few of the soldiers to inlist under them. And, as these officers lay all under the grievous reproach of deserting the army, and betraying the interests of their companions, the rest were farther confirmed in that confederacy, which they had secretly formed. To petition and remonstrate being the most cautious method of conducting a confederacy, an application to parliament was signed by near 200 officers; in which they made their apology with a very imperious air, asserted their right of petitioning, and complained of that imputation thrown upon them by the former declaration of the lower house. The private men likewise of some regiments sent a letter to Skippon; in which, together with insisting on the same topics, they lament, that designs were formed against them and many of the godly party in the kingdom; and declare, that they could not engage for Ireland, till they were satisfied in their expectations, and had their just desires granted. The army, in a word, felt their power, and resolved to be masters. The parliament too resolved, if possible, to preserve their dominion; but being destitute of power, and not retaining much authority, it was not easy for them to employ any expedient which could contribute to their purpose. The expedient which they now made use of, was the worst imaginable. They sent Skippon, Cromwell, Ireton, and Fleetwood, to the head-quarters at Saffron Walden in Essex; and empowered them to make offers to the army, and inquire into the cause of its distempers. These very generals, at least the three last, were secretly the authors of all the discontents; and failed not to foment those disorders, which they pretended to appease. By their suggestion, a measure was embraced, which, at once, brought matters to extremity, and rendered the mutiny incurable."

justice and equity. V. That, till the Army be disbanded as aforesaid, some course may be taken for the supply thereof with monies, whereby we may be enabled to discharge our quarters; that so we may not, for necessary food, be beholden to the parliament's enemies, burthensome to their friends, or oppressive to their countries, whose preservation we always have endeavoured, and in whose happiness we do still rejoice."

Declaration of the Parliament thereupon.] Some other Evidences being also read, to prove that this affair was warmly carrying on in the Army, the parliament thought proper to be beforehand with them; and thereupon ordered the following Declaration to be printed and published, and a number of copies thereof sent down in a Letter to sir Thomas Fairfax:

"The two houses of parliament having received information of a dangerous Petition, with a Representation annexed, tending to put the army into a distemper and mutiny, to put conditions upon the parliament, and obstruct the relief of Ireland, which hath been contrived and promoted by some persons in the army; they do declare their high dislike of that Petition, their approbation and esteem of their good service who first discovered it, and of such officers and soldiers as have refused to join in it; and that for such as have been abused, and, by the persuasions of others, drawn to subscribe it, if they shall for the future manifest their dislike of what they have done, by forbearing to proceed any further therein, it shall not be looked on as any cause to take away the remembrance and sense the houses have of the good services they have formerly done; but they shall be still retained in their good opinion, and shall be cared for with the rest of the army, in all things necessary and fitting for the satisfaction of persons that have done so good and faithful service; and as may be expected from a parliament so careful to perform all things appertaining to honour and justice: and, on the other side, it is declared, That all those who shall continue in their distempered condition, and go on in advancing and promoting that Petition, shall be looked upon, and proceeded against, as enemies to the state, and disturbers of the public peace."

This Declaration is expunged in the Commons Journals, and this Note inserted in the margin, 'Deletur per Ordinem tertii Junii, 1647. sedente Curia. H. E.' The reasons for which will appear in the sequel.

April 2. The lords received an Answer, from the General, to their Letter and the foregoing Declaration, which was also read as follows:

For the Right Hon. the earl of MANCHESTER.

"My lord; Walden, March 30, 1647,

"I received your lordship's letter, with the Declaration of both houses of parliament, and shall take care for sending copies thereof into the several regiments of the army, for the speedy suppressing of the Petition; notwithstanding I had before commanded the recall thereof, and given orders for stopping any further proceedings in the same; assuring your lordships, by the good assistance of God, neither that Petition, nor any other thing, should have come through my hands to the parliament, which should have the least countenance of disobedience, or appear in such a dress as might not be fit for the justice and honour of that eminent judicature to look upon: but not to trouble your lordship any longer, I take leave to rest Your &c. Tho. Fairfax."

The Army's Petition to the Commons vindicating their late Representation to General Fairfax.] April 27. Some Officers of the Army presented to the house of commons, on behalf of themselves and the rest of their brethren, a Vindication of the particulars in their late Petition, which was introduced in the following manner:

To the Honourable the House of Commons assembled in Parliament; The HUMBLE PETITION of the OFFICERS of the Army under the Command of his Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, on Behalf of themselves and the Soldiers of the Army,

"Humbly sheweth; That your Petitioners being sensible of some displeasure in this honourable house against them, through some misinformation concerning the carriage and managing of a late Petition in the Army, do humbly offer unto your consideration the Paper annexed, for the better clearing of our intentions: humbly desiring your favourable construction and acceptance of what is therein contained, according to the integrity with which it is presented. And your Petitioners shall pray, &c."

The VINDICATION of the OFFICERS of the Army under sir Thomas Fairfax.

"The misrepresentations of us and our harmless intentions to this honourable house, occasioning hard thoughts and expressions of your displeasure against us, we cannot but look upon as an act of most sad importance; tending, in our apprehensions, to alienate your affections from your ever trusty and obedient army; than which nothing can more rejoice your adversaries, or minister greater hopes of their re-advancement: nothing more discouraging to us, who should esteem it the greatest point of honour to stand by you till the consummation of your work, the removal of every yoke from the people's necks, and the establishment of those good laws you shall judge necessary for the common-wealth.—Out of our fears therefore of the advantage that may be had therefrom, and that the honourable house may retain the same good opinion of us they formerly had, (whom God hath hitherto blessed with abundant blessings) we humbly crave the boldness to present unto you some Reasons, to clear our proceedings in those passages which we find most obvious to exceptions in our Petition; whereby we hope to make it evident to you, that we did no more than what necessity prompted us unto: that the means that was used, and the method we took was, as we conceived, most orderly and inoffensive, proceeding not in the least from distemper, and aiming in no measure at mutiny, nor in any wise to put conditions on the parliament; and that you will from thence discover the corruptions of those men's hearts, who have been the evil instruments of occasioning your late Declaration against us.—For our liberty of petitioning, we hope this honourable house will never deny it unto us; we know not any thing more essential to freedom, without which grievances are remediless, and our condition most miserable. You have not denied it to your adversaries; you justified and commended it in your Declaration of the second of November 1642, in these words, 'It is the liberty and privilege of the people to petition unto us for the ease and redress of their grievances and oppressions, and we are bound in duty to receive their Petitions.' And we hope, by being soldiers, we have not lost the capacity of subjects, nor divested ourselves thereby of our interests in the common-wealth; that in purchasing the freedoms of our brethren, we have not lost our own. Besides, we can instance petitions from officers in the earl of Essex's and sir William Waller's army, even whilst they were in arms, which were well received by this honourable house, with a return of thanks; and therefore we hope we shall not be considered as men without the pale of the kingdom, excluded from the fundamental privilege of subjects; especially since we are conscious to ourselves of nothing that may deserve the same.—We have not till now appeared in petitioning, though our necessities have been frequent and urgent; not that we doubted our liberty, but because we were unwilling to interrupt you in your other weighty affairs. And we proceeded at this time with the greatest care and caution we could of giving the least offence, intending not to present our Petition to this honourable house, but with the approbation and by the mediation of his excellency, our ever honoured General; knowing how watchful our enemies were to make the hardest construction of all our actions, and represent us to you and the world under such terms as may render us most odious.—You may see the insidies of them by the false suggestions they have already made to you, of our forcing Subscriptions: the reasonableness and necessities of our desires, whereof almost every soldier is abundantly sensible, will plead the vanity of such an enforcement; especially when it shall be known that the Petition took its first rise from amongst the soldiers; and that we engaged but in the second place, to regulate the soldiers proceedings, and remove, as near as we could, all occasion of distaste. For our Desires of Indemnity for such actions as (being not warrantable by law in time of peace) we were enforced unto by the necessity and exigency of the war, we are confident this honourable house will approve of it, when you shall be informed that the soldiers are frequently indicted at assizes and sessions, and otherwise grievously molested for such actions, and many lately suffering for the same; and that notwithstanding that provision you lately made against it, divers have had verdicts passed against them this last assizes, for actions done as soldiers, as we are credibly informed. If this be practised during the time of your session, for what we did through the exigence of your service, what cruel and violent proceedings are we like to find after you are pleased to dissolve?—For the particular intimation that the Royal Assent may be desired, we never intended by it to lessen your authority; but since you have, by offering the Propositions, judged the desiring the king's assent convenient; since likewise the city of London made the same desire without offence: as to your orders to the Judges, we know not how effectual they may prove to save us from such proceedings after your sessions. All these reasons considered will, we hope, manifest our intentions in that intimation to be only a provident caution for our future safety, without the least thought of disrespect to your authority.—For the desire of our Arrears; necessity, especially of our soldiers, enforced us thereunto: that we have not been mercenary, or proposed gain as our end, the speedy ending of a languishing war will testify for us, whereby the people are much eased of their taxes and daily disbursements, and decayed trade restored to a full and flourishing condition in all quarters. We left our estates, and many of us our trades and callings to others, and forsook the contentments of a quiet life, not fearing or regarding the difficulties of war, for your sakes. After all which we hoped that the desires of our hardly-earned wages, by the mediation of our General, would have been no unwelcome request, nor argued us guilty of the least discontent or intention of mutiny.—We know not any thing further in our Petition which hath been excepted against, but your apprehensions that it tendeth to hinder the relief of Ireland, which we do not understand wherein; having always manifested, in all our actions, our readiness to further that work; unless you mean by that desire, that those who have served voluntarily should not be pressed to go out of the kingdom; to which we humbly offer this, That those who have voluntarily served in these wars, and left their parents, trades, and livelihoods; and, without any compulsion, engaged of their own accords, should, after all their free and unwearied labours, be forced and compelled to go out of this kingdom, whose peace they have so much endeavoured with unwearied pains, hoping thereby to have lived and enjoyed the fruits of their labours, would to them seem very hard: but besides this, our several Votes and Engagements, March 21, to endeavour the service of Ireland what we could, will clear us, and prove our good affections in promoting that work; and therefore we hope what hath been said will remove all scruples, and restore us to the good opinion of this honourable house: in assurance whereof, and in consideration of the premises, we are further emboldened to make these our Requests unto this honourable house: 1. That you will be pleased to allow us our liberty of petitioning in what may concern us now as soldiers, and afterwards as members of the commonwealth. 2. Since, upon the false suggestions of some men, informing you that this Army intended to enslave the kingdom, the honourable house was so far prevailed withal as to summon divers of us to appear at your bar, and to pass a Declaration, thereby expressing your high dislike of our Petition, declaring it tended to put conditions upon the parliament: the sense of such expressions is so irksome to us, who have ventured whatsoever we esteemed dear to us in this world for preservation of your freedom and privileges, that we cannot but earnestly implore your justice in the vindication of us, as in your wisdom you shall think fit."

This Petition was subscribed by col. Thomas Hammond, lieut. general of the ordnance, by 7 other colonels, 7 lieut. colonels, 6 majors, 130 captains, lieutenants, and other inferior officers.*

A Letter presented to the Commons by several Troopers.] April 30. The said Petition and Vindication were read. After which major-general Skippon produced a Letter presented unto him the day before, by some Troopers of several regiments in the Army, in behalf of eight regiments of horse; wherein they expressed some Reasons why they could not engage in the service of Ireland, under the present conduct; and complaining of the many scandalous and false suggestions, that were of late raised against the Army and their proceedings, whereupon they were declared enemies to the public; and that they saw designs were upon them, and many of the godly party in the kingdom: that there was an intention to disband and new model the army;† "which," they said, "was a plot contrived by some men who had lately tasted of sovereignty; and, being lifted up above the ordinary sphere of servants, endeavoured to become masters, and were degenerated into tyrants. They therefore declared, That they would neither be employed for the service of Ireland, nor suffer themselves to be disbanded, till their Desires were granted, and the Rights and Liberties of the subjects should be vindicated and maintained."

Great Debate thereupon.] The foregoing Letter being recommended to the consideration of the house by general Skippon,‡ the reading of the Army's Vindication was laid aside; and the three Troopers, viz. Edward Sexby,* Wm. Allen,† and Thomas Sheppard, who came with the Letter; (and who had presented copies of the same to sir Thomas Fairfax the general, and to lieut. general Cromwell, both which were brought into the house at the same time) were ordered to be sent for in; where several questions were propounded unto them, concerning the contriving, drawing up, and subscribing of the same. They affirmed it was drawn up first at a rendezvous of several of those regiments, and afterwards they had several meetings about it by agents from each regiment in several places. Being demanded, Whether their Officers were engaged in it? They answered, That they thought very few of them knew or took notice of it. Then, upon intimation that surely this Letter came by promotion of cavaliers in the army, it was demanded of each of the troopers severally by themselves, Whether they were Cavaliers? To which answer was returned, That they had engaged in the parliament's cause ever since Edge-Hill Battle, and some wounded there; at Brentford, at Newbery, at Henley, under major-general Skippon; and that they had been engaged in all the services since his excellency first marched into the field.—Then they were demanded, What the meaning of that clause was, wherein the word a 'Sovereignty' was expressed? They severally being called, one by one, answered, That the Letter being a joint act of those several regiments, they could not give a punctual answer, they being only agents; but if they might have the queries in writing, they should send or carry them to the several regiments, and return their own Answers together with, and comprized in the rest. After all these Examinations, they were ordered to attend the house upon summons.

General Ludlow writes,‡ "That after the reading of the Petition, some of the members moved that the messengers might be committed to the Tower, and the Petition declared seditious; but the house, after a long debate, satisfied themselves to declare, That it did not belong to the soldiery to meddle with civil affairs, nor to prepare or present any petition to the parliament without the advice and consent of their general, to whom they ordered a Letter to be sent to desire, for the future, his care therein; with which acquainting the three agents, and requiring their conformity thereunto, they dismissed them." He adds, "That the house having notice of this combination against them from col. Edward Harley, one of their members, who had a regiment in the army, expressed themselves highly dissatisfied therewith; and some of them moved that the petitioners might be declared traitors, alledging that they were servants, who ought to obey, not to capitulate. Others were not wanting; who resolved the securing of lieut. general Cromwell, suspecting that he had under-hand given countenance to this design; but he being advertised of it, went that afternoon towards the army, so that they missed of him, and were not willing to shew their teeth since they could do no more. The debate continued till late in the night, and the sense of the house was, That they should be required to forbear the prosecution of the said Petition; but when the house, wearied with long sitting, was grown thin, Mr. Denzil Hollis, taking that opportunity, drew up a Resolution upon his knee, declaring the Petition to be seditious, and those Traitors who should endeavour to promote it after such a day; and promising pardon to all that were concerned therein, if they should desist by the time limited. Some of us, fearing the consequence of these divisions, expressed our dissatisfaction, and went out; which gave others occasion to pass two or three very sharp votes against these proceedings of the army."

Lord Hollis's own account of the matter runs thus: "The Letter presented to the house, by the three Agitators before-mentioned, was an exclamation against the parliament; false and untrue complaints of wrongs done to the soldiers at assizes in the counties; a protestation against the Irish expedition, calling it a design to break the army, declaring, even if any of those three Commanders (Fairfax, Cromwell, and Skippon) should engage, their averseness to it; though Skippon was appointed by the parliament to command in Ireland, and had accepted it; in plain English saying they would not disband, nor receive any other propositions from the parliament, till their expectations were satisfied. The three Agitators, being called into the house, carried themselves at the bar in a slighting braving manner, refusing to answer such questions as the Speaker, by order of the house, asked them; saying they were employed by the army, and could not, without leave from thence, discover any thing. Many of the members resenting this high affront, were earnest to have them severely punished; but the party (the Independents) stood as stiffly for them, insomuch that the worthy burgess of Newcastle, Mr. Warmouth, stood up and said, He would have them committed indeed, but it should be to the best Inn of the town, and good sack and sugar provided them; which was as ridiculous as it was a bold and insolent scorn put upon the parliament; at last even Mr. Skippon himself excused them, and said, They were honest men, and wished they might not be too severely dealt with; whereupon the house flatted, let them go without punishment, and by tameness increased their madness and presumption."—His lordship proceeds to inform us, "That when they had wrought this feat, sir Tho. Fairfax himself came to London, upon pretence of taking physick; Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood, and Rainsborough, who were members of the house of commons, as well as principal officers of the army, kept the house, that the soldiers might be left to themselves to fire the more, run up to extremes, and put themselves into a posture to carry on their work of rebellion with a high and violent hand; but in the mean time disclaimed these proceedings, blaming the soldiers at that distance, (as Cromwell did openly in the house, protesting, for his part, he would stick to the parliament) whilst, under-hand, they sent them encouragement and directions; for nothing was done there but by advice and countenance from London, where the whole business was so laid, the rebellion resolved upon, and the officers that were in town so deeply engaged, that when the full time was come for putting things in execution, my friend Cromwell, who had been sent down by the parliament to do good offices, was come up again without doing any; and he who had made those solemn public protestations, with some great imprecations on himself if he failed in his performance, did, notwithstanding, privily convey thence his goods (which many of the Independents likewise did, leaving the city and parliament as marked out for destruction); and then, without leave of the house (after some members missing him, and fearing him gone, had moved to have him sent for; whereupon he being, as it seems, not yet gone, and having notice of it, came and shewed himself a little in the house), did steal away that evening, I may say run away post, down to the army."

Lord Clarendon concurs with the two last Memorialists as to the suspicions concerning Cromwell, and the intention of apprehending him, which he introduces in this manner: "Cromwell, hitherto, carried himself with that rare dissimulation (in which sure he was a very great master) that he seemed exceedingly incensed against this insolence of the soldiers; was still in the house of commons when any such addresses were made; and inveighed bitterly against the presumption, and had been the cause of the commitment, of some of the officers. He proposed, 'That the general might be sent down to the Army; who, he said, would conjure down this mutinous spirit quickly:† and he was so easily believed, that he himself was sent once or twice to compose the Army; where, after he had staid two or three days, he would again return to the house, and complain heavily 'of the great licence that was got into the army; that, for his own part, by the artifice of his enemies, and of those who desired that the nation should be again imbrued in blood, he was rendered so odious unto them, that they had a purpose to kill him, if, upon some discovery made to him, he had not escaped out of their hands.' And, in these and the like discourses, when he spake of the nation's being to be involved in new troubles, he would weep bitterly, and appear the most afflicted man in the world with the sense of the calamities which were like to ensue. But, as many of the wiser sort had long discovered his wicked intentions, so his hypocrisy could not longer be concealed. The most active officers and Agitators were known to be his own creatures, and such who neither did, nor would do, any thing, but by his direction. So that it was privately resolved by the principal persons of the house of commons, that when he came the next day into the house, which he seldom omitted to do, they would send him to the Tower; presuming, that if they had once severed his person from the army, they should easily reduce it to its former temper and obedience: for they had not the least jealousy of the general, Fairfax, whom they knew to be a perfect Presbyterian in his judgment; and that Cromwell had the ascendent over him purely by his dissimulation, and pretence of conscience and sincerity. There is no doubt Fairfax did not then, nor long after, believe that the other had those wicked designs in his heart against the king, or the least imagination of disobeying the parliament. This purpose of siezing upon the person of Cromwell, could not be carried so secretly, but that he had notice of it; and the very next morning after he had so much lamented his desperate misfortune in having lost all reputation, and credit, and authority in the army, and that his life would be in danger if he were with it; when the house expected every minute his presence, they were informed that he was met out of the town by break of day, with one servant only, on the way to the army; where he had appointed a rendezvous of some regiments of the horse, and from whence he writ a Letter to the house of commons, "That having the night before received a Letter from some officers of his own regiment, that the jealousy the troops had conceived of him, and of his want of kindness towards them, was much abated, so that they believed, if he would be quickly present with them, they would all in a short time, by his advice, be reclaimed: upon this he had made all the haste he could, and did find that the soldiers had been abused by misinformation; and that he hoped to discover the fountain from whence it sprung; and, in the mean time, desired that the general, and the other officers in the house, and such as remained about the town, might be presently sent to their quarters; and that he believed it would be very necessary, in order to the suppression of the late distempers, and for the prevention of the like for the time to come, that there might be a general rendezvous of the army; of which the general would best consider when he came down, which he wished might be hastened." It was now to no purpose to discover what they had formerly intended, or that they had any jealousy of a person who was out of their reach."

Mr. Walker, in his History of Independency, part 1. p. 31, says, "that Cromwell protested in the house, with his hand upon his breast, in the presence of Almighty God, before whom he stood, That he knew the Army would disband, and lay down their arms at their door, whensoever they should command them."

Mr. Whitlocke here observes*, "That a victorious Army, out of employment, is very inclinable to assume power over their principals; and this, he adds, occasioned the parliament's greater care to find them employment in Ireland." In another place, after some Petitions had been presented to the house, and some printers taken up for publishing two Pamphlets, one called 'Judge Jenkins's Vindication,' and another intitled, 'Sir Dudley Digges of the Illegality of Subjects taking Arms against their Sovereign,' he adds, "Thus we see there is nothing constant in worldly affairs; the parliament having conquest and success after their own desires, yet are now miserably incumbered with the mutinousness of their army on one side, with the petulancy of pamphlets and discontented Petitions on the other."†

* Memorials, p. 250.

† The following curious account of Cromwell's conduct during the above debate is related by bishop Burnet, in his "History of his Own Times," vol. 1. p. 45, fol. edition: "Upon this I will set down what sir Harbottle Grimston told me a few weeks before his death: whether it was done at this time or the year before I cannot tell: I rather believe the latter. When the house of commons and the army were quarrelling, at a meeting of the officers it was proposed to purge the army better, that they might know whom to depend on. Cromwell upon that said, he was sure of the Army; but there was another body that had more need of purging, naming the House of Commons, and he thought the Army only could do that. Two officers that were present brought an account of this to Grimston, who carried them with him to the Lobby of the House of Commons, they being resolved to justify it to the house. There was another debate then on foot: but Grimston diverted it, and said, he had a matter of privilege of the highest sort to lay before them: it was about the being and freedom of the house. So he charged Cromwell with the design of putting a force on the house: he had his witnesses at the door, and desired they might be examined: they were brought to the bar, and justified all that they had said to him, and gave a full relation of all that had passed at their meetings. When they withdrew, Cromwell fell down upon his knees, and made a solemn prayer to God, attesting his innocence, and his zeal for the service of the house: he submitted himself to the providence of God, who it seems thought fit to exercise him with calumny and slander, but he committed his

The King's Answer to the Propositions of Peace presented to him at Newcastle.] May 18. The lords received a packet from their commissioners at Holdenby, with a Paper inclosed in it from the King, which contained an Answer from his majesty to the Parliament's Propositions delivered to him at Newcastle, (p. 499).

For the SPEAKER of the Lords House, pro tempore, to be communicated to the Lords and Commons in the Parliament of England, at Westminster, and the Commissioners of the Parliament of Scotland.

"As the daily expectation of the coming of the Propositions hath made his majesty, this long time, to forbear giving his Answer unto them, so the appearance of their sending being no more, for any thing he can hear, than it was at his first coming hither, notwithstanding that the earl of Lauderdale hath been at London above these ten days, (whose not coming was said to be the only stop) hath caused his majesty thus to anticipate their coming to him; and yet considering his condition, that his servants are denied access to him, all but very few, and those by appointment, not his own election; and that it is declared a crime for any but the commissioners, or such who are particularly permitted by them, to converse with his majesty; or that any letters should be given to, or received from him, may he not truly say, that he is not in a case fit to make concessions, or give Answers, since he is not cause to him: this he did with great vehemence, and with many tears. After this strange and bold preamble he made so long a speech, justifying both himself and the rest of the officers, except a few that seemed inclined to return back to Egypt, that he wearied out the house, and wrought so much on his party, that what the witnesses had said was so little believed, that had it been moved Grimston thought that both he and they would have been sent to the Tower. But whether their guilt made them modest, or that they had no mind to have the matter much talked of, they let it fall: and there was no strength in the other side to carry it farther. To compleat the scene, as soon as ever Cromwell got out of the house, he resolved to trust himself no more among them; but went to the Army, and in a few days he brought them up, and forced a great many from the house. I had much discourse on this head with one who knew Cromwell well and all that set of men; and asked him how they could excuse all the prevarications, and other ill things of which they were visibly guilty in the conduct of their affairs. He told me, they believed there were great occasions in which some men were called to great services, in the doing of which they were excused from the common rules of morality: such were the practices of Ehud and Jael, Samson and David: and by this they fancied they had a privilege from observing the standing rules."

master of those ordinary actions which are the undoubted rights of any free-born man, how mean soever his birth be? And certainly he would still be silent as to this subject, until his condition were much mended, did he not prefer such a right understanding betwixt him and his parliaments of both kingdoms, which may make a firm and lasting Peace in all his dominions, before any particular of his own, or any earthly blessing: and therefore his majesty hath diligently imployed his utmost endeavours for divers months past, so to inform his understanding, and satisfy his conscience, that he might be able to give such Answers to the Propositions, as would be most agreeable to his parliaments; but he ingenuously professes, that notwithstanding all the pains that he hath taken therein, the nature of some of them appears such unto him, that, without disclaiming that reason which God hath given him to judge by for the good of him and his people, and without putting the greatest violence upon his own conscience, he cannot give his consent to all of them: yet his majesty, that it may appear to all the world how desirous he is to give full satisfaction, hath thought fit hereby to express his readiness to grant what he may, and his willingness to receive from them, and that personally, if his two houses at Westminster shall approve thereof, such further information in the rest as may best convince his judgment, and satisfy those doubts which are not yet clear unto him; desiring them also to consider, that if his majesty intended to wind himself out of these troubles by indirect means, were it not easy for him now readily to consent to what hath or shall be proposed unto him, and afterwards chuse his time to break all; alledging, that forced concessions are not to be kept? Surely he might, and not incur a hard censure from some indifferent men. But maxims of this kind are not the guides of his majesty's actions; for he freely and clearly avows, that he holds it unlawful for any man, and most base in a king, to recede from his promises for having been obtained by force or under restraint: wherefore his majesty (not only rejecting those acts which he esteems unworthy of him, but even passing by that which he might well insist upon, a point of honour in respect of his present condition) thus answers the first Proposition:—That upon his majesty's coming to London, he will heartily join in all that shall concern the honour of his two kingdoms, or the Assembly of the States of Scotland, or of the Commissioners or deputies of either kingdom, particularly in those things which are desired in that Proposition, upon confidence that all of them respectively, with the same tenderness, will look upon those things which concern his majesty's honour.—In answer to all the Propositions concerning Religion, his majesty proposeth, That he will confirm the Presbyterial government, the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and the Directory, for 3 years, being the time set down by the two houses; so that his majesty and his household be not hindered from that form of God's service which they formerly have had ; and, also, that a free consultation and debate be had with the Divines at Westminster, (20 of his majesty's nomination being added unto them) whereby it may be determined by his majesty and the two houses, how the church shall be governed after the said 3 years, or sooner, if differences may be agreed.—Touching the Covenant ; his majesty is not yet therein satisfied, and desires to respite his particular Answer thereunto until his coming to London ; because, it being a matter of conscience, he cannot give a resolution therein till he may be assisted with the advice of some of his own chaplains, which hath hitherto been denied him, and such other divines as shall be most proper to inform him therein ; and then he will make clearly appear, both his zeal to the Protestant profession, and the union of these two kingdoms, which he conceives to be the main drift of this Covenant. To the 7th and 8th Propositions, his majesty will consent. To the 9th, his majesty doubts not but to give good satisfaction, when he shall be particularly informed how the said penalties shall be levied and disposed of. To the 10th, his majesty's Answer is, That he hath been always ready to prevent the practices of Papists ; and therefore is content to pass an act of parliament for that purpose : and, also, that the laws against them be duly executed. His majesty will give his assent to the act for the due observation of the Lord's Day ; for the suppressing of Innovations, and those concerning the preaching of God's Word ; and touching Non-Residence and Pluralities.—His majesty will yield to such act or acts as shall be requisite to raise monies for the payment and satisfying all public Debts, expecting also that his will be therein included.—As to the Proposition touching the Militia ; though his majesty cannot consent unto it in terminis as it is proposed, because thereby, he conceives, he wholly parts with the power of the sword intrusted to him by God and the laws of the land, for the protection and government of his people ; thereby at once divesting himself, and disinheriting his posterity, of that right and prerogative of the crown which is absolutely necessary to the kingly office, and so weaken monarchy in this kingdom, that little more than the name and shadow of it will remain : yet, if it be only security for the preservation of the peace of this kingdom, after the unhappy troubles, and the due performance of all the agreements which are now to be concluded, which is desired, (which his majesty always understood to be the case, and hopes that herein he is not mistaken) his majesty will give abundant satisfaction ; to which end he is willing, by act of parliament, that the whole power of the Militia, both by sea and land, for the space of ten years, be in the hands of such persons as the two houses shall nominate, giving them power, during the said term, to change the said persons, and substitute others in their places at pleasure : and afterwards to return to the proper channel again, as it was in the times of queen Elizabeth and king James, of blessed memory. And now his majesty conjures his two houses of parliament, as they are Englishmen and lovers of peace, by the duty they owe to his majesty their king, and by the bowels of compassion they have to their fellow subjects, that they will accept of this his majesty's offer, whereby the joyful news of Peace may be restored to this languishing kingdom. His majesty will grant the like to the kingdom of Scotland, if it be desired, and agree to all things that are propounded touching the conserving of Peace betwixt the two kingdoms.—Touching Ireland (other things being agreed) his majesty will give satisfaction therein. As to the mutual Declarations proposed to be established in both kingdoms by act of parliament, and the modifications, qualifications, and branches which follow in the Propositions ; his majesty only professes, That he doth not sufficiently understand, nor is able to reconcile many things contained in them ; but this he well knoweth, That a general act of oblivion is the best bond of Peace ; and that, after intestine troubles, the wisdom of this and other kingdoms hath usually and happily, in all ages, granted general pardons ; whereby the numerous discontentments of many persons and their families, otherwise exposed to ruin, might not become fewel to new disorders, or seeds to future troubles : his majesty therefore desires, that his two houses of parliament would seriously descend into these considerations, and likewise tenderly look upon his condition herein, and the perpetual dishonour that must cleave to him, if he shall thus abandon so many persons of condition and fortune that have engaged themselves with and for him out of a sense of duty ; and propounds, as a very acceptable testimony of their affection to him, That a general act of Oblivion and free Pardon be forthwith passed by act of Parliament.—Touching the new Great Seal ; his majesty is very willing to confirm both it and all the acts done by virtue thereof until this present time, so that it be not thereby pressed to make void those acts of his done by virtue of his Great Seal, which in honour and justice he is obliged to maintain ; and that the future government thereof may be in his majesty, according to the due course of law.—Concerning the Officers mentioned in the 19th Article ; his majesty, when he shall come to Westminster, will gratify his parliament all that possibly he may, without destroying the alterations which are necessary for the crown. His majesty will willingly consent to the act for the Confirmation of the Privileges and Customs of the city of London, and all that is mentioned in the propositions for their particular advantage.—And now that his majesty hath thus far endeavoured to comply with the desires of his two houses of parliament, to the end that this agreement may be firm and lasting, without the least face or question of restraint to blemish the same, his majesty earnestly desires presently to be admitted to his parliament at Westminster, with that honour which is due to their sovereign; there solemnly to confirm the same, and legally to pass the acts before-mentioned; and to give and receive as well satisfaction in all the remaining particulars, as likewise such other pledges of mutual love, trust, and confidence as shall most concern the good of him and his people; upon which happy agreement, his majesty will dispatch his directions to the Prince, his son, to return immediately to him, and will undertake for his ready obedience thereunto. Holdenby, May 12, 1647."

May 20. The lords having appointed this day for taking the king's Letter into consideration, it was again read; and the question being put, Whether the king shall be brought from Holdenby nearer to London, before such time as their lordships consider of the whole matter of the Letter? It was resolved in the affirmative, by a majority of 15 against 9. The question being next put, Whether Oatlands shall be the place where the king shall be removed to from Holdenby, as soon as it can be made ready for him? It was also resolved in the affirmative, and a message was sent to the commons to desire their concurrence.

A Petition, styling the Commons the Supreme Authority of the Nation, ordered by them to be burnt.] This day a Petition directed 'To the Right Honourable and supreme authority of this nation, the Commons in parliament assembled;' and intitled, 'The humble Petition of many Thousands, earnestly desiring the Glory of God, the Freedom of the Common-wealth, and the Peace of Men,' was read; and it was resolved that the same be burnt by the hangman, on a division of only 94 against 86. The purport or prayer of the Petition is not entered in the Journals, nor do we meet with it in any of the Collections. The offence seems to have been styling the commons 'the Supreme Authority of the Nation.'

An Ordinance indemnifying all such as have acted in the Service of the Parliament] May 21. In order to satisfy the Army in some measure, an Ordinance was passed and published to this effect: "The lords and commons taking notice that divers well-affected persons have been sued, indicted, prosecuted, or molested; and others are likely to be sued, indicted, prosecuted, or molested, for acts done by authority of this present parliament, and for the service thereof, during these late wars and troubles; do hereby ordain and declare, That no persons who have acted by authority of parliament, or for the service thereof, ought to be sued or molested: that such as are or shall be so sued or molested may plead the general issue that they are not guilty, and give this ordinance in evidence; and shall have treble costs awarded them: that such persons as are not able to defend a suit at common law, or may find themselves aggrieved in the proceedings thereof, may, either before or after trial at common law, make their complaint to the committee of parliament, herein named, or any five of them, who are empowered to determine such complaints, to examine witnesses, and to commit to prison, if they see cause, any person suing as aforesaid, and to award to the defendant treble damages: that in case any solicitor, attorney, &c. do not forbear the prosecution upon order shewed from the said committee, that then such solicitor, attorney, &c. shall be committed to safe custody. Provided that nothing in this Ordinance shall discharge any person from making a true account to any commissioners or committee of parliament of what they have received for the benefit thereof."

Votes relating to the Disbanding of the Foot.]

May 22. The lords agreed to the following Votes, sent up by the commons, about disbanding the Foot. 1. "That the General's regiment be first disbanded; that the time for that disbanding be on the 1st of June, and that the town of Chelmsford be the place for the rendezvous. 2. That such as will engage for Ireland shall presently be taken on, and have a fortnight's advance paid them out of their 6 weeks, besides the two months pay of their arrears, and to march forthwith to Ingatstone, there to receive orders. 3. That those that shall be disbanded shall receive their two months pay of their arrears, and shall deposit their arms in the church, and have a pass to go to their several homes. 4. That the like manner be observed in disbanding the rest of the regiments, at the several times and places of rendezvous, as follows, viz. That col. Hewson's regiment be disbanded at Bishops-Stortford, on the 3rd of June next: and those who engage for Ireland to march to Puckeridge to receive orders: that col. Lambert's regiment be disbanded at Walden, on the 5th of June next; and that those that engage for Ireland march to Heydon to receive orders: that col. Lilburne's be disbanded at Newmarket, on the 10th of June next; and those who engage for Ireland to march to Botesham to receive orders; of this regiment there are 580 already engaged now at Evesholm: that col. Harley's be disbanded at Cambridge, on the 8th of June next: and those that engage for Ireland to march to Stanton to receive orders: that sir Hardress Waller's be disbanded at Huntingdon, on the 12th of June next; and those who engage for Ireland to march to Thrapston to receive orders: that col. Hammond's be disbanded at Bedford, on the 15th of June next; and those that engage for Ireland to march to Newport Pagnell to receive orders: that col. Ingoldsby's be disbanded at Woodstock, on the 4th of June next; and those who engage for Ireland to march to Chipping-Norton. 5. That field-marshal Skippon's at Newcastle be taken on for Ireland, and march according to his orders. 6. That the money for disbanding all those regiments, and also a fortnight's pay for those that shall go for Ireland, be conveyed under a strong guard to the several places of rendezvous, to be there the day before the day of disbanding. 7. That the general be desired to issue out his orders to the several regiments, to be at the several places and times of rendezvous respectively; and that himself be present to see them disbanded; as likewise field-marshal Skippon, who is then to take on such of them as will go for Ireland: and that, in regard the regiment of col. Ingoldsby lies off from the rest, and it is to be disbanded at Woodstock the 4th of June next, the general is desired to send some officers to see them disbanded. 8. That the several captains of each company bring a list of their company, under their hand, to the place of the rendezvous appointed for disbanding; wherein the name of every soldier in that company shall be expressed. 9. That where it shall appear that any of the soldiers have not two months pay due to them, so much be abated as shall be found to come short of it. 10. That it be referred to the committee of the army, to consider of Instructions for stating the Arrears and Accounts of the soldiers of this army, and how debentures shall be given them for so much as shall appear justly due upon their accounts. 11. That all commission-officers shall receive their particular debentures upon their accounts made by the committee and treasurers of the army abovesaid. 12. That the excise in course shall be the security to be given for the payment of the arrears of the inferior officers and common soldiers; and that the commission-officers shall be paid out of the estates of the delinquents in the first exceptions, not yet disposed: and that the committee of the army do prepare and bring in an ordinance to this purpose. 13. That a committee of lords and commons be appointed to go down, and be assisting to the general in this service of disbanding the army. 14. That the committee of lords and commons appointed to go down to the army, shall, at the head of every regiment, at their disbanding, give them the thanks of the houses for their faithful service to the parliament."

Besides the foregoing Votes sent up to the lords for their concurrence, the commons had resolved That 40,000*l.* be appointed for the disbanding of these regiments, and for the fortnight's pay, part of the six weeks pay for those that should go for Ireland. But this last Resolution was not sent up, which is thus accounted for in the commons Journals of the 25th of this month, viz. "Resolved, That all these Votes concerning the Army, except those that concern the disposing of the Monies, be sent to the lords for their concurrence."

It was afterwards ordered, That these Votes, so passed, should be sent down, inclosed in the following Letter from both the Speakers, to sir Thomas Fairfax.

"Sir; We are commanded to transmit unto you these Votes concerning the disbanding the Foot, whereby you will see the care of the two houses of parliament, to give all satisfaction to the officers and soldiers under your command. You are desired to communicate these Votes to them in such manner as you shall think best for preparing all things which may conduce to the expediting the service, which doth so much import the peace of this kingdom, and the relief of Ireland, to which it is not doubted but that you will contribute all that lies in your power, and thereby add to your former merit. We are &c. Westminster May 28, 1647."

The Parliament's Declaration touching the Disbanding of the Army; providing for Widows, &c.] May 28. Both houses passed the following Declaration:

"The lords and commons finding it of absolute necessity, in relation to their duty to this kingdom, to take off the great charge which it hath so long undergone in maintenance of arms; as likewise to that of Ireland, which cries out for present relief, and must otherwise irrecoverably perish, have therefore thought fit to disband the Foot of this army. But, withal, have taken it into their special care to give all just satisfaction to those who have served therein, providing for their indemnity, and for the maintenance of such as have lost their limbs; and likewise for the widows and orphans of those who have lost their lives in their service; and an assurance unto those who have voluntarily served them, not to be pressed out of the kingdom; and also such a considerable part of their arrears to be paid to those that are to be disbanded, as is possible to be provided for at present, with a regard to other public services of unavoidable necessity; and good and sufficient security for all that shall appear to be due, both to officer and soldier, upon the auditing of their accounts; which is put into a way of speedy dispatch, and of no trouble at all to the soldier, and but of little to the officer; all which doth appear by the several ordinances and orders of both houses, passed to that effect; which will, we presume, abundantly satisfy all persons of the parliament's tenderness towards the army, and acceptance of their faithful services; and dispose the army to a chearful and ready compliance with their resolution, that Ireland may be relieved, and this kingdom recover a breathing time after so long and heavy sufferings; the houses being fully resolved to apply their whole care and endeavours, with God's assistance, to remove those pressures, which either the necessity of war, or want of leisure for the remedy in these troublesome times, may have occasioned."

Letter from General Fairfax to the Irish Committee, concerning disbanding of the Army.] June 1. A Letter from sir Thomas Fairfax, in Answer to the last Orders of parliament sent to him, together with a Paper called 'The humble Advice, &c. of the Council of War,' were read to the Lords as follows:

For the Right Hon. the COMMITTEE of Lords and Commons for Irish Affairs, sitting at Derby-House: Bury, May 30, 1647.

"My lords and gentlemen; Yesterday, towards evening, I received your lordships letter, and Votes therein inclosed: before the receipt thereof I had convened the officers unto a general Council of War, to advise concerning the better transacting of that business, and prevention of all inconveniences; whereupon, after much time spent about it, we came to these Resolutions, which declare much dissatisfaction in the army at being disbanded without having their Grievances fully redressed; and the danger that may ensue if any one regiment should be drawn out to disband, before the whole army be equally satisfied. The Resolutions are long and many, which I shall hasten by a messenger on purpose to both houses of parliament; being things, indeed, of that great concernment, as I cannot but, in duty and discharge of myself, communicate unto the houses.—In the mean time, I humbly offer unto your lordships consideration, that if you hold your intended journey to Chelmsford, there is little hopes (as the temper of the army now stands) that your lordships will find things answerable to your expectations: however, I have appointed a guard of horse, out of my own regiment, to be there on Monday; but I doubt, the orders coming so late, they cannot be there so early, as to meet the money upon the way; and for the same reason I could not possibly have the life-guard to be there in time, it being now quartered in Bedfordshire, nor any other guard but out of my own regiment of horse, which lieth nearest. I remain, your, &c. THO. FAIRFAX."

The Advice of the Council of War to General Fairfax, concerning disbanding of the Army.]

To his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax, knt. Commander in Chief of the Parliament's Forces: The OPINIONS and Humble ADVICE of your Council of War, convened at Bury this 29th of May 1647, in relation to the Votes of Parliament communicated unto us by your Excellency, and your Desire of our Advice thereupon;

"Humbly shewing; I. That, upon the reports come to all quarters of the Army, concerning the Votes and proceedings of the houses of the 21st of May; as also of those of the 27th, we find the generality of the army (as we also ourselves) much unsatisfied with the one, and something amazed and startled at the other; the first Votes coming much short of satisfaction, as to the Grievances of the Army then reported to the house, and not taking any notice at all of some that are most material; and the latter, importing a resolution suddenly to disband the Army by piece-meal, before equal satisfaction be given to the whole army of the Grievances, or so much as any consideration had of some others most material; and also before any effectual performance of that satisfaction which the Votes of Friday seemed to promise, as to some of the Grievances; all which we shall be ready, upon a little time given us, to present to your excellency more distinctly, and in particulars. II. That the said dissatisfaction, and the jealousies occasioned upon the said proceedings, as we fear, and, by some effects already appearing, do find, may unhappily produce dangerous disturbances and tumultuous actings amongst several parts of the army, as they lie now dispersed and remote from the head quarters; especially amongst those regiments, whose principal officers, by neglecting and deserting their soldiers in their necessary concernments, or just grievances, have disoblged their soldiers, and lost their interest with them; inso-much that such officers are in some sort forced to withdraw from their charges, and can scarce, with safety, come at them: and, to prevent the inconveniences or ill consequences which such disturbed or tumultuous actings might produce, either to the countries where the army quarter, or to the kingdom, we humbly advise your excellency, without delay, to draw the army, or at least those parts thereof that are not fixed to certain quarters upon particular duty, unto a closer posture of quarters; so as each regiment, troop, and company may lie under the view and oversight of the respective officers that are left with them; and all of them under a nearer view and correspondence with the head quarters, which may thus have a readier influence upon all, for a better preserving of good order, and prevention of inconveniences; and, in such posture, for the country's ease, as to remove and shift the whole quarters once a week at least, till, upon further satisfaction, the army may be quietly and orderly disbanded. III. That, upon the same dissatisfactions, we find an extreme earnestness and violent propensity amongst the soldiers to a general rendezvous; and we verily believe the first attempting to disband any one regiment, before equal satisfaction to all, and assurance against those they have cause to fear, will occasion them all to draw together and rendezvous of themselves, as it were upon alarm. To prevent the inconveniences or ill consequences, both to those counties and the kingdom, of any such tumultuous or confused drawing unto rendezvous without order, we humbly advise your excellency, without delay, after the contraction of quarters, to order a general rendezvous for those parts of the army whose quarters shall be so contracted; and this we advise and desire the rather, because of the scandalous suggestions of some, importing as if the late discontents appearing in the army, and the representation of Grievances, were not really in or from the body of the soldiery; but a mere delusion and appearance, made by the contrivance and artifice of some factious officers, or some other persons in the army; the truth or falsehood whereof, as also the true distemper or disposition of the army, your excellency and all others may most clearly discover, by such a general rendezvous, without delay or trouble of going to every regiment apart as they now lye; the army may more certainly understand what they may expect from the parliament; and both parliament and kingdom know what to judge and trust to concerning the army: and to that purpose, at such a rendezvous, we shall (we hope through the grace of God) discharge our duties to the parliament and the kingdom, as well as to your excellency and the army; and demonstrate that the good and quiet of the kingdom is much dearer to us than any particular concernments of our own. These two last things we humbly advise and desire may be done without delay, or that otherwise we may be held acquitted from all inconveniences that may ensue in our several charges. IV. Since besides the dissatisfactions of the army hitherto in the point of Grievances, and defect of assurance as to several of those things promised towards satisfaction; and besides the jealousies occasioned upon the Votes of Thursday last, and all the ill consequences which may follow in proceeding thereupon; that course of disbanding the army by piece-meal, before the satisfaction intended be performed equally to the whole, seems something strange and unusual; not practised in the former armies, as major-general Massey's brigade, the Scots army, &c. nor used, that we have heard of, by any state towards any army that was ever accounted faithful; we humbly desire your excellency, by an effectual letter, to move the parliament for this, as that which we humbly offer and do beg of them, both for their own honour, in relation to what future armies they may have occasion to employ, for the reputation of your excellency and this army, as well as for its better satisfaction; and as they tender the good and assured quiet of this kingdom, or the effectual relief and saving of Ireland, that they would be pleased to resume the consideration of the things voted on Thursday last, and to suspend any present proceeding thereupon; as also to resume the Grievances of the Army, together with the things proposed in the conclusion of the Narrative from the Officers; and to give satisfaction, or at least some resolution, to each of them; and that they would not put that temptation and jealousy in the way of the army, or that dishonour upon it, as to disband it in scattered pieces before satisfaction be equally given to the whole. And we here further desire your excellency to move that what hereafter follows may be admitted into consideration, but not attending to delay the Relief of Ireland: 1. We find most clearly, that the great hopes suggested to the parliament of the supply of that service, in that way at present intended, will prove, as to any farther expectations out of this army, but vain and delusive; as the loud noise of so many powerful officers of the army, with 50 companies of foot and 10 of horse, so long since engaged for that service, hath already proved; and herein, if our judgments be not credited, we have yet discharged our duty to the parliament and both kingdoms in declaring it. 2. We cannot, but for our own and the army's farther discharge and clearing, declare, That if the parliament had not been abused by many of those who have pretended the promotion of that service; and not been by such men's false informations or misrepresentations concerning the army or otherwise, diverted from the consideration of, or from giving reasonable satisfaction to, the army, in those things proposed by the generality of the officers at the first meeting at Walden, in March last, in order to that service; and had not, by like mischievous practices of such incendiaries, been since then moved and drawn into a series and succession of such things, as have conduced to multiply discontents, discouragements, disobligations and provocations, upon the army; we say, had it not been for such persons and such things, we are confident the parliament might have had, if they pleased, an army entire and ready formed under the conduct of their old officers, to have engaged in that service, having first found a just consideration for the Service past, and assurance of the pay and subsistence in that to come. J. MILES, Advocate."

Sir THOMAS FAIRFAX'S Letter to the SPEAKER of the House of Commons, inclosing a Copy of the foregoing.

"Mr. Speaker; Bury, May 30, 1647.

"Having called the officers of the Army to St. Edmundsbury, I communicated unto them yesterday the votes of both houses, and a Letter of the house of peers sent therewith, concerning the disbanding the Army; after a long consultation had thereof, this inclosed was delivered unto me, as the result of the Council of War, where the officers were very many and unanimous: which being of importance, I held it my duty to hasten the same unto you, being much perplexed in my thoughts that dissatisfaction betwixt the parliament and the army should rather increase than lessen. I intreat you that there may be ways of love and composure thought upon. I shall do my endeavours, though I am forced to yield to something out of order to keep the army from disorder, or worse inconveniences. I desire you to take some speedy resolution for the composing of things, whereby the kingdom may be happy in a timely deliverance from further distraction; for the effecting whereof I could be content to be a sacrifice, as the last service you can have from, Your &c. T. FAIRFAX."

June 2. A Message was brought from the commons, to let the lords know, what whereas they had ordered that Monies should be sent down to Chelmsford and Woodstock, 7000*l.* to the first, and 5000*l.* to the latter, the house, upon some reasons, had ordered the said Money to be brought back to London. They also desired their lordships concurrence, that the Commissioners sent down to Chelmsford might be recalled. The lords agreed to the first, but took time to consider of the last request; though they afterwards consented to that also; and the Commissioners being returned gave this account, That they had not disbanded the foot, in regard the Army was in a distemper, and did march away from the place of rendezvous.

Letter from Lord Montague, advising that

Cornet Joyce had surrounded Holdenby House with a Party of Horse.] June 3. Advice came by a messenger from the Commissioners at Holdenby, that yesterday they had information the Army had a design to take the King away from them; and that last night there came 700 horse to King's-Thorpe, near Holdenby: that he, coming away from thence, was stopped and searched by the said troopers, though they knew him to be one of the Commissioners servants; and that the commissioners dare not send any letters lest they might be intercepted. Lastly, that col. Greaves had drawn all the guards into Holdenby-House, and had shut up the gates.—Both houses were now in great consternation at this news, and sat morning and afternoon for some time. And in the afternoon of this day the lords agreed to the form of a Letter to be sent to sir T. Fairfax, to desire him to come to London, that they might be more fully informed by him of the distempers and dissatisfaction of the Army, and be advised how they might appease them. The Letter to be sent down to the commons for their concurrence, who agreed to it. But the parliament were soon put out of their doubts, though not out of their fears, for June 4. The Speaker of the house of lords presented a Letter to them from the Commissioners attending the King at Holdenby, and a Paper inclosed, both which were read:

"My lord; Yesterday we got first uncertain intelligence of some parties of horse upon their march near Stony-Stratford; towards night, other reports came to us of an intention to surprise this place; whereupon col. Greaves doubled the guards by such as he had most confidence in; at length a scout of our own brought word of a party of horse rendezvousing upon Harlaston-Heath, not two miles off, about ten o'clock at night; and, withal, we were secretly informed that their intentions were to seize col. Greaves, and to possess themselves of this place: hereupon we began to prepare for defence; but we found, upon advice with col. Greaves, the guards were so little to be relied upon, that we thought it requisite he should withdraw himself, lest he should be taken by force from us, there being no means left us to secure ourselves; to which necessity he was contented to submit, and we purposely caused it to be divulged that he was gone, hoping thereby to divert the horse from falling on us; but, about one of the clock, we had certain knowledge of their being drawn into the park and meadows adjoining, and that we were surrounded by them; which caused us to send for all the officers of our guards, who, with one consent, declared to us that they found no disposition in their soldiers to fight with any of the General's Army, with whom they had so often adventured themselves against the common enemy. Whilst this discourse held with them, it passing two of the clock, about break of the day we discovered a party of horse drawn up before the great gates; whereupon we dismissed them to their charges, and immediately, at our back-yard, where our horse and dragoons stood, their horse with many of ours amongst them, entered without any resistance at all, being quietly let in and embraced by the soldiers. We presently sent to speak with their chief officer. It was answered, That there was none that commanded them; but soon after, Mr. Joyce, cornet to the General's lifeguard, came unto us; and being demanded the cause of their coming in this manner, he answered, They came with an authority from the soldiery to seize col. Greaves, that he might be tried by a council of war, for having scandalized the army; whereby a plot contriving to convey the king to London, without directions of the parliament, would be prevented. We desired he would put the same into writing, and accordingly he delivered us the following Paper; wherein you will not find col. Greaves mentioned by name, though intended."

"May it please the Hon. Commissioners of Parliament; We, Soldiers under his excellency sir Tho. Fairfax's command, have, by the general consent of the soldiery, manifested our true love to the parliament and kingdom, by endeavouring to prevent a second war, discovered by the designment of some men privately to take away the king, to the end that he might side with that intended army to be raised; which, if effected, would be to the utter undoing of the kingdom. We shall be able and willing to bring our testimony, when called for, who were the plotters and contrivers therein. This being the only way and means to prevent all those forementioned dangers, that might have unhappily come on us and this whole kingdom, whose weal we have always endeavoured with the hazard of our lives, and the blood of many of our dear friends and fellow soldiers and commanders. This being the only thing presented to us, which put us on our late action for the preservation of the King's person, and furthering of the parliament's proceedings, together with the commissioners great care to effect the same, and to discharge the trust imposed on them."

"This is the condition we are in, with much sorrow to ourselves that we can give you no better account, though our endeavours have not been wanting; our humble suit is, that, by this bearer, capt. Titus, you will please to send us speedy directions; the want whereof hath been no small discouragement to us hitherto, in a service of this length and importance. I remain, &c. ED. MONTAGUE. Holdenby, June 3, 1647."

Capt. Titus also made a Narrative of the business to the same effect as the foregoing Letter.

The King's younger Children brought to St. James's.] Hereupon the lords ordered that the earl of Northumberland be sent to, bring the King's Children, now in the country, to St. James's; and that a letter be sent to him for that purpose; and,

June 5. A Letter from the earl of Northumberland to the earl of Manchester was read:

"My lord; This Night, at 11 o'clock, I received, by your Messenger, the commands of the house for bringing back the King's Children to St. James's, which I shall readily obey, though with very great inconveniency to them; for there is no provision of any kind for them in that place. I am, Your &c. NORTHUMBERLAND. Hampton-Court, June 4, 1647."

Letter from lord Montague, concerning the King's being carried from Holdenby by Cornet Joyce.] Then another Letter from the lord Montague was read, addressed as the former:

"My lord; The party that possessed themselves of this place upon Thursday morning, carries the King this day to Huntingdon, in his way to Newmarket: we, having publicly declared to them that our commission was to attend the king at Holdenby, and not elsewhere, till further orders, are compelled to go along with them. Would the convoy assigned to the service have adhered to us, or had we been enabled by any other force, our resolution was to discharge our trust with the loss of our lives, as we told them openly this morning, when the king spoke with them in the outer court; but upon the question propounded, Who would stand by us? It was replied by them all, 'Not a Man.' We should make you a Narrative of colonel Joyce's admission to speak with the king, after he was in bed last night, when he propounded his going to the army; and also of his majesty's Answer given them in public this morning: the effect was, the king declared he came hither with his own consent, though not so willingly as he might have done, to the end he might send Messages, to his two houses of parliament, the greatest power next himself in England, and to receive Answers from them: that he had sent them several Messages, and was, in short, obliged to stay for their Answers; yet, being no way able to oppose so many, he should go more or less willingly with them according to the Answers they should give him; but, withal, required to know by what authority they came unto him. They replied, Their authority was from the Army:* That they did this of necessity in order to the peace of the kingdom and maintenance of the laws; which were in great danger of being overthrown by a plot, divers years since contrived amongst persons that had a hand in the present government; and as to the king's demands, which were, that he might be treated with honour and respect; that he might not be forced to any thing against his conscience; that his servants, against whom they had no just exception, might have liberty to attend him. All this they consented to with acclamation. The confusion we are in, together with the haste they impose upon us, gives us not leave to make you a better Narration; but shall humbly desire that we may not be forgotten in a condition wherein your service hath involved us, but that we may receive your directions, remaining, your &c. ED. MONTAGUE. Holdenby, June 4, 1647."

Votes passed for satisfying the Army, and expunging the late Declaration against them.]

June 5. The commons sent up to the lords, for their concurrence, the following Votes and Resolutions: "Resolved, &c. That the Officers of this Army, not in commission, shall have their full pay upon their disbanding or engaging for Ireland, deducting for free quarter according to the course and rules of the army: That 10,000*l.* be allowed to the reduced officers: That the common soldiers shall have their full pay, on the footing of the officers: That commission-officers should have a month's additional pay on their disbanding; that the Declaration of both houses, on the 30th of March last, be expunged." This last Vote the lords debated; and the question being put, it was carried in the affirmative.—When the same question for expunging this Declaration was proposed the day before, in the house of commons, they divided upon it; and it was carried in the affirmative by 96 against 79: accordingly it was expunged in the presence of the whole house; and, as the Journal expresses it, The whole house sitting. "Here," says Whitlocke, "the parliament began to surrender themselves and their power into the hands of their own army."

A Letter thereupon sent to sir T. Fairfax, in the Name of both Houses.] A Letter ordered by the lords to be sent to sir Tho. Fairfax, and now sent up again by the commons, was read, and debated whether it should go to that general; but this also was carried in the affirmative. The draught thereof, to be signed by the Speakers of both houses, runs thus:

"Sir; The houses have received your Letters and those Papers from the Council of War. They have taken into consideration to do that which may best conduce to the public peace, and have already passed divers Votes in order

* Lord Clarendon writes, "That there was no part of the Army known to be within 20 miles of Holdenby at that time; and that which administered most cause of apprehension was, that those officers who were of the guard declared, 'That the squadron, which was commanded by Joyce, consisted not of soldiers of any one regiment, but were men of several troops, and several regiments, drawn together under him who was not the proper Officer;' so that the king did, in truth, believe that their purpose was to carry him to some place where they might more conveniently murder him." vol. 5. p. 48.

thereunto, and are going on to the rest; which they are confident will give a full satisfaction to all good men, and will leave no scruple in the candid and honourable intentions of the parliament towards the Army. These Resolutions cannot be ready to be with you before Wednesday next, at which time they will send them to you, and a committee of both houses to advise with you how to improve these Votes for the settling of the present distempers, and to give you their best assistance in communicating them to the Army; and that it may be done in a more public and satisfactory way, they desire you to appoint a general rendezvous on Wednesday next, upon Newmarket-Heath; desiring and expecting that you and your officers will, in the mean time, so order it, that the army shall neither remove, nor act any thing to the disturbance of the public peace, Yours, &c."

The Scots Commissioners residing in London had also taken the alarm, and sent to the lords to desire that they would appoint a committee to meet them that day, having something of great importance to communicate to them. Accordingly, a committee of both houses were ordered to attend the Scots immediately.

Message from the King by the Earl of Dumfermline.] The lords being informed that the lord Dumfermline was in the little lobby, and said he had a Message to the houses from the King, they ordered him to be called in, and he delivered his message: but the lords desiring him to put it in writing, that so they might deliberately think of it, it was deferred to the afternoon of this day. In the mean time the Speaker, in the name of the house, gave his lordship thanks for his care in delivering the Message. It was to this effect:

"My lords; I am sent by his majesty to the hon. houses of parliament, and commanded to impart three things unto them: 1. That his majesty goeth from Holdenby unwillingly. 2. His majesty desires that his parliament will neglect no means for preserving the honour of parliament, and the established laws of England. 3. His majesty desires that they will believe nothing that is sent or done in his name against the parliament, unless they send to himself and know the truth of it."

The same Message was presented to the commons by the lord Dumfermline, who delivered it sitting in a chair appointed him by the house for that purpose.

Next, the lords commanded the King's Letter from Holdenby, of the 12th of May last, to be all read, and then it was ordered to be read in parts, and compared with the last Propositions for Peace; for the doing which the house adjourned into a committee during pleasure. The house being resumed, a motion was made that the question might be put, Whether this house would adhere to their former Propositions, or not? But it being put to the question, Whether this should be now put? it passed in the negative.

The last thing of this day was, that the lords received a Message from the commons, informing them that they, the commons, intended to sit the next day, being Sunday, in the afternoon, and desired the lords to do the same, which they readily agreed to.

The Parliament under great Apprehensions of the Army's marching up to London.] June 6. The lords made an Order, That the Committee for Irish Affairs, sitting at Derby-House, should immediately consider of the best ways and means for the ordering and directing the Forces within the city of London and lines of communication, Middlesex, Surrey, Hertfordshire, and Kent, to suppress all tumults, mutinies, and disorderly assemblies, to the disturbance of the parliament and hinderance of their proceedings, in the carrying on the great business of the kingdom. To this the commons gave their concurrence.

Ordinance for allowing Days of Recreation instead of the abolished Festivals.] June 8. The parliament passed an Ordinance for abolishing all Holidays, and appointing other days for Sports and Recreations for scholars, apprentices, and servants, in their room; of which the following is an abstract: "Forasmuch as the Feasts of the Nativity of Christ, Easter, and Whitsuntide, and other Festivals, commonly called Holidays, have heretofore been superstitiously used and observed; be it ordained, That the said Feasts and Festivals be no longer observed within England and Wales. And to the end that there may be a convenient time allotted to scholars, apprentices, and other servants, for their recreation, be it ordained, That, with the leave and approbation of their masters first obtained, they shall have such convenient reasonable recreation from their ordinary labours, on every second Tuesday in the month throughout the year, as formerly they used to have on the Festivals aforesaid: and if any difference shall arise between any master and servant, concerning the liberty hereby granted, the next justice of peace shall have power to order and reconcile the same."

Letter from General Fairfax relating to the King's being carried from Holdenby-House.]

For the Hon. WM. LENTHALL, esq. Speaker of the House of Commons.

"Cambridge, June 7, 1647.

"Mr. Speaker; By my last, of Friday the 4th instant, I gave you an account of what I understood from Holdenby, concerning the undertaking of some soldiers, on Wednesday last, to secure the king from being secretly conveyed away; and that col. Greaves, being thereupon privately slipt away, I had sent col. Whaley, with his regiment, to attend the commissioners, and to take charge of the king's guards there.—On Saturday morning, being at a rendezvous beyond Newmarket, and advancing the Army this way, in order to quarter about Cambridge, I received advertisement that the soldiers at Holdenby had, upon Friday morning, with his majesty's consent, brought him away from thence, together with your commissioners; that they lay at Hinchbrook, near Huntingdon, on Friday night, and would be at Newmarket that day. The ground of this remove was alledged to be an apprehension in the soldiers of some forces gathering towards the place suddenly to fall upon them, and to force the king out of their hands; to withstand which they thought they might be too weak, having then no notice of col. Whaley's coming with his regiment; upon this I immediately sent after col. Whaley, to advertise him thereof, with order to direct his course towards Huntingdon; and where ever he met his majesty and the commissioners, to desire they would come on no further this way, but rather to return and suffer him to guard them back; and to prevent any danger imaginable therein, I sent off from the rendezvous two regiments of horse more to march after col. Whaley, towards Huntingdon, and so on to Holdenby, to be assistant to him in the guards about his majesty, if it should be found needful; and thus I held on the motion of the rest of the army this way.—Towards the evening, after the quarters of the army were assigned and taken up hereabouts, and the regiments marching off towards their several quarters, I understood from col. Whaley, that, meeting the king and commissioners upon their way from Huntingdon, towards Newmarket, about 4 miles short from Cambridge, they had forbore coming on any further; but his majesty being not willing to return back for Holdenby, they had taken up his quarters, for the present, at sir John Cutt's house, at Childersley, being the next house of any conveniency to the place where he met them: hereupon I sent thither to sir Hardress Waller and col. Lambert, to inform the commissioners of my coming to Cambridge and the army's quartering thereabouts, and desired that they would think of returning back with his majesty to Holdenby; and, because there might be many inconveniences in delay, that they would not make any stay where they were, but remove back that way next morning, though it were the Lord's Day. The commissioners refused to act, or meddle any otherwise to dispose of the king, without the parliament's further directions; and his maj. declares himself very unwilling to go back to Holdenby.—Thus I have given you a true and faithful account how his majesty came to the place where he is, and how the quarters of the Army have fallen out to be so near him: whatever the concurrence of events to make it thus may be suspected to design therein, this is the exact truth of the business; and I can clearly profess, as in the presence of God, for myself,* and dare be confident of the same for all the officers about me, and the body of the army, that this remove of his majesty from Holdenby was without any design, knowledge, or privy thereof on our parts; and a thing altogether unexpected to us, until the notice of it came upon the rendezvous, as before; neither was our rendezvous, or our coming hither to quarter with the army, for any purpose or with any expectation to be so near his majesty as it happened; but the effect is so far merely providential, and to us accidental: that the case being as it is, the commissioners refusing to intermeddle as before, and the king to go back, I have placed, and shall continue, about his majesty such a guard of trusty men, and under such command, (col. Whaley being chief in the charge) as I may be responsible for to the parliament and kingdom; and so far, as can reasonably be expected from me, by the blessing of God, to secure his majesty's person from danger; and prevent any attempts of such as may design, by the advantage of his person, the better to raise any new war in this kingdom. And truly, sir, to prevent any attempts of such as may design any such mischief, as it is my own most earnest and humble desire, so I find it to be the unanimous desire and study of the army, that a firm Peace in this kingdom may be settled, and the Liberties of the people cleared and secured, according to the many Declarations by which we were invited and induced to engage in the last war: and the parliament's speedy and effectual application to these two things, I find, would conduce more surely to a cheerful and unanimous Disbanding than any other satisfaction to their particular Grievances can do: and yet, whatever may be suggested or suspected, I do certainly find, and dare assure you, and you may depend upon it, that the sense of the army is most clear from any purpose or inclination to oppose the settling of presbytery, or to have the independent go-majesty; although Cromwell protested he knew nothing of it." And, after taking notice that sir Thomas Fairfax professed the same thing, he proceeds thus, "Perhaps he said true; I would fain be so charitable as to believe it; nor indeed do I think the good man was privy to all their plots, he must have no more than what they were pleased to carve and chew for him, but must swallow all, and own them when they come abroad." Memoirs, p. 96.—Conformably to this Lord Clarendon observes, "That though general Fairfax had been with the king and kissed his hand, and made such professions as he could well utter; yet his authority was of no use, because he resigned himself entirely to Cromwell." And sir Philip Warwick, in his Memoirs, p. 299, adds, "That when, afterwards, they waited on the king both together, at Royston, his majesty asked them, 'Whether they commissioned Joyce to remove him?' which they denying, the king answered them, 'I'll not believe you unless you hang him.'" verment set up, or to uphold a licentiousness in Religion, or to meddle with any such thing as the advancement of any particular party or interest whatsoever; but wholly to leave all such particular matters to the wisdom of the parliament.—I shall, by the next, send you a full account of the proceedings and unanimous Resolution of the Army at the late rendezvous, being not at present so fully prepared to do it as is fit. The letter from both houses I have received but this night. The quarter of the army being lately altered before, will make the heath near Newmarket less convenient for a rendezvous; yet I shall take order, according to the desire of the houses, to have a rendezvous either there, or not far off, on Wednesday next. I remain, your, &c. T. FAIRFAX. P. S. I shall, according to my duty and the desire of the houses, do my utmost to keep the Army in good order, to which I find it absolutely necessary that there be some Pay immediately sent down, otherwise this country may suffer much. This Letter being long, and the business requiring haste, I desire that this may serve at present to be communicated to both houses."

* Lord Hollis informs us, "That a meeting was appointed at lieut. general Cromwell's upon the 30th of May, where it was resolved that cornet Joyce should, with a party of horse, go to Holdenby and seize upon his

A Declaration, for expunging that of the 30th of March against the Proceedings of the Army.] The commons sent up, at the same time, a Declaration for repealing and expunging another of the 30th of March last, to which the lords gave their concurrence. This extraordinary Recantation runs thus:

"Whereas the lords and commons did, by a Declaration of the 30th of March last, declare their sense upon a Petition, with the Representation thereunto annexed: and whereas they have been since informed, That the Petitioners intended not thereby to give any offence to the parliament; and calling to mind the great and eminent services done by the Army to the parliament and kingdom, the lords and commons, being tender of the honour of the said Army, have thought fit to ordain and declare, and be it declared and ordained by the said lords and commons in the parliament of England assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the said former Declaration of the 30th of March, be razed and expunged out of the Books of the said houses, and wholly taken away and made void; and that no member of the said Army shall receive any damage, prejudice or reproach, for any thing in the said former Declaration."

To shew more evidently what a panic both houses were in at this time, the Commons sent to let their lordships know that they intended to keep the next day for private Humiliation and Fasting in their own house. "This motion was made by field-marshal general Skippon, who, with a doleful countenance and lamentable voice, exhorted the house to humble themselves before God; and to do those things which a zealous and conscientious Army, who had done so much good service, desired of them." Adding, "That the Army was a formed body, not to be provoked, which would be upon them before they were aware."* The lords ordered the same, in regard of the Distractions of the whole kingdom. The commons, however, had the courage to put a negative on the question, Whether to give any further Answer to the particulars in the summary from the Army? But this was done only by a single vote; 78 against 77. Soon after a motion being made for concurring with the lords in their Vote of the 20th of May, for removal of the King to Oatlands, it passed in the negative by 119 against 86.

A Letter from Lord Montague concerning the King's coming to Newmarket.] June 9. A Letter from the commissioners with the king was read, and a Relation touching his majesty's removal from Holdenby. It was afterwards ordered to be printed and published:†

To the Right Hon. the Earl of MANCHESTER, Speaker of the House of Peers, pro tempore, these.

"Childersley, June 8, 1647.

"My lord; Upon Saturday, as we were upon the way between Huntingdon and Cambridge, in our journey, as we supposed, towards Newmarket, we were met by col. Whaley, who acquainted us with the first orders he had received from the general to attend the king with his regiment at Holdenby, in the room of col. Greaves; and also with such other orders as he received from his excellency, after it was known unto him that his majesty was upon his march towards Newmarket; whereby he was directed, at his meeting of the king upon the way, to entreat his majesty to take up his quarters at the next convenient house, which he had assigned to be at Childersley, the late dwelling-house of sir John Cutts; wherewith his majesty was contented. At the same time we also received two letters from the general, wherein he acquainted us, That the changing of the guards at Holdenby, and the removal of the king, had been without his privity; and that he had sent col. Whaley, with his regiment, to attend his majesty back to Holdenby: but those orders which col. Whaley last received, for waiting upon the king to such convenient quarters as should be next to the place where he met him in the way, were given, as it seems, after the date of those letters he directed to us, and upon his knowledge of the King's being advanced as far as Huntingdon.—Upon Saturday in the afternoon the king came accordingly to this place, and we returned Answer to his excellency's two Letters; wherein we acquainted him with our condition, and that we had sent to the parliament for directions, which we speedily expected. Upon Saturday, late in the night, sir Hardress Waller and col. Lambert came unto us from the general, and desired our advice what was fittest to be done upon this accident, which had befallen by the disorder of the soldiers, without his excellency's knowledge; and withal propounded unto us the king's return to Holdenby, whereto his majesty had declared his utter averseness to col. Whaley; insisting that he would not be posted from place to place, but, since they had removed him against his will from Holdenby, he would now go to Newmarket. To this we durst not, in the condition we were, presume to give any advice at all before we received new directions from you; and that was all the Answer we returned.—Upon Monday the general himself, the lieut. general, and other chief officers of the army, came hither; and were much pressed by the king that, for his conveniency, he might remove to his own house at Newmarket; protesting that he would not return to Holdenby. Herein, though much desired, we could not take upon us to advise or act any thing; conceiving that no new guards could be put into the capacity of the former, who, by ordinance of parliament, were immediately to receive and observe our orders, and could not be countermanded by any other authority than that of both houses. His excellency, after much discourse, returned to his quarters at Cambridge, having promised the king that he should have their resolution before morning; and accordingly col. Whaley hath now received orders to attend the king to Newmarket, whither we also waited upon him, expecting hourly to receive your directions; which are hereby earnestly intreated, and will be extremely welcome unto your, &c. EDW. MOUNTAGUE. P. S. In regard I was straightened in time when my last letter was written, I have here inclosed sent you a perfect Relation of what passed upon the 4th of this instant June, when the King spake publicly with the soldiers at Holdenby."

Narrative of what passed between his Majesty and Cornet Joyce.] The Narrative was as follows:

The NARRATION betwixt his Majesty and Cornet Joyce, &c.

"The party being drawn up in the first court before the house, his majesty came down, and, standing upon the top of the steps, directed his speech to Cornet Joyce; who, representing the commander of the party, stood before the horse at the foot of the stairs. The king said, 'That cornet Joyce having, though at an unreasonable hour of the night, acquainted him that he was come to convey his majesty to the army, his majesty according to his promise was there to give his Answer in presence of them all; but first he desired to know by whom he was authorized to propound this to his majesty.' Mr. Joyce answered, 'That he was sent by authority from the Army.' The king replied, 'That he knew no lawful authority in England but his own, and, next under him, the parliament;' but withal asked, 'Whether he had any authority from sir Tho. Fairfax; and whether in writing?' It being replied, 'That sir Tho. Fairfax was a member of the Army; the king insisted that he was not answered; sir Tho. Fairfax, being their general, was not properly a member, but head of the Army. Joyce said, 'That at least he was included in the Army; and that the soldiers present were his commission, being a commanded party out of every regiment.' The king replied, 'That they might be good witnesses, but he had not seen such a commission before; and if they were his commission, it was an authority very well written, all handsome young men.' The king proceeded to say, 'That he came to Holdenby, not by constraint, (though not so willingly as he might have done) to the intent he might send Messages to his two houses of parliament, and receive Answers from them: that accordingly he had sent several Messages to them, and thought himself in a sort obliged to stay for their Answers which were not come; yet, if they gave him such reasons as might convince his judgment he would go with them; nay, the commissioners should not stop him.' He desired therefore to know the reasons they could give him for this journey. Joyce replied, 'That a plot, for these 4 years last contrived by some members of both houses, to overthrow the laws of the kingdom, and a design to convey his person to an army newly to be raised for that purpose, were the causes of their undertaking this employment; and hoped would prevail with his majesty to go willingly with them, thereby to defeat the purposes of those that would otherwise, by the countenance of his person, perturb the peace of the kingdom: and that his being with the Army was the readiest expedient he could think upon to procure him a speedy and satisfactory Answer to his former Messages. The king returned, 'That he knew not a syllable of any such design or intended army: and that to seek an Answer with so many gallant men at his back, were to extort it, which were very unhandsome; besides that, their proposal looked like an opposition to the parliament, which he desired not, nor would ever infringe the just privileges of the laws of the land: that these reasons induced him not to go willingly; and therefore he desired to know what they intended, if he would not go with them.' It was answered, 'That they hoped his majesty would not put them to use those means, which otherwise they should be necessitated to, if he refused. For the commissioners, or any else that refused, they knew well what course to take with them.' The king protested, That unless they gave him satisfaction to the reasonable and just demands he should make, he would not go with them, unless they carried him by absolute force; and he thought they would well think upon it before they would lay violent hands upon their king: that the commissioners had never put any constraint upon him; they were more civil. Then he propounded, That he might be used with honour and respect; that they would not force him in any thing contrary to his conscience, or his honour; though he hoped he had long ago so fixed his resolutions, that no force could cause him to do a base thing: though they were masters of his body, yet his mind was above their reach. To all those propositions they consented with a general acclamation: Mr. Joyce adding, 'That their principles were not to force any man's conscience, much less the king's.' Then his majesty desired that those which attended him, and some other of his servants, against whom they had no just exceptions, might be permitted to wait upon him. This being agreed, the king asked whither they would have him go. Oxford was first nominated, then Cambridge. The king named Newmarket, which accepted, he desired care might be taken to carry his stuff; wherein Mr. Joyce said something was done already. Other expressions of their respect to the king, of the armies desire to see him with them, and of their fidelity towards him, were intermixed in the discourse, together with complaints of the proceedings of the parliament towards them; which the king said, He would not adjudge, unless he heard both sides.—The king having ended, at the desire of the commissioners, he gave them leave to speak to the troops; who, having repeated the sum of their Instructions from both houses, whereby they were appointed to attend his majesty at Holdenby till further orders, did publickly protest against his removal, and against this act of the soldiers, as unlawful in itself, and dangerous to them; requiring so many of them, as would stand by the commissioners in opposition thereof, to declare themselves accordingly. But it being with a general voice answered, 'That not a man of them would do so,' the commissioners added, 'That, as honest men, they held themselves obliged to discharge the trust reposed in them, to the utmost of their power; and, agreeable thereunto, if they had force for the service, they would withstand them to the loss of their lives; but since they were not in a capacity at present, they must acquiesce.' As the king turned back to go into the house, major Tomlins declared to his majesty, in the presence of the commissioners, That according to the orders they gave him, he had endeavoured what he could to induce the troops assigned for the ordinary guards, which he commanded in the absence of col. Greaves, to draw up and make resistance; but without effect, they all refusing to obey him therein."

Petition from the City of London, on occasion of the Differences between the Parliament and the Army.] June 10. Both houses had now a guard of a whole regiment of Trained Bands, placed every morning at 7 o'clock in the precincts of the Parliament Close, for their security. And this day a Petition was presented to the lords by alderman Cullum, with other aldermen, &c. which was as follows:

To the Right Hon. the LORDS assembled in the High Court of Parliament; The HUMBLE PETITION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled,

"Humbly sheweth; That as your petitioners acknowledge the parliament of England to be the supreme judicature of the kingdom, from whom the subjects of this nation have found shelter in danger, and relief in distress; so now your petitioners having, with the whole kingdom, a great share and interest in these privileges, do therefore at this time humbly, yet earnestly, present these their important Desires to this honourable house: 1. That all honourable ways and means may be used to prevent the further effusion and shedding of Christian blood; and, to that end, that all just satisfaction may be given to the Army, and all other soldiers who have adventured their lives for the defence of this parliament and kingdom. That though the condition of your affairs do not enable you to give full satisfaction at present, yet that their Accounts may be adjusted and put into a certain way of payment, to the quieting of many thousand discontented persons; which we humbly conceive will be much to the glory of God, the honour of the parliament, and the quiet of the kingdom. 2. That, according to our allegiance, and the Covenant and Agreement of both nations, his majesty's royal person may be preserved and so disposed of that the parliaments of both kingdoms may have free access unto him, that thereby a right understanding may be obtained between them; and this tottering church and kingdom, after all our fears, sorrows, and sufferings may enjoy the blessing of a well-grounded and long-desired Peace, whereby this kingdom may be the better enabled to send speedy relief and help to miserable bleeding Ireland. 3. That for the better defence and security of the parliament and city in these tumultuous and troublesome times, this honourable house will be pleased to renew so much of an Ordinance of the 17th Jan. 1645, as concerneth the raising, maintaining, and ordering of horses, and power of making searches, whereby the committee of the militia of London, and parishes mentioned in the weekly bills of mortality, may be the better enabled to suppress all tumultuous assemblies, and to prevent any dangers that may happen to the parliament and city. And as this city from the beginning of these troubles hath faithfully adhered to the parliament, so we are resolved, by the blessing of God, never to desert the same; but, with the utmost of our lives and estates, will stand and fall, live and die, with the parliament of England, according to our Covenant. And your Petitioners shall pray, &c."

The persons who presented this Petition being called in, the Speaker, by direction of the house gave them this Answer: "The lords acknowledge the constancy of the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons in common-council assembled in the city of London, to have been such, as that you have never been alienated from your fidelity to the parliament by the changes and alterations that have been in the condition of their affairs: they likewise do acknowledge this your care hath been the principal means, next under the providence of the Almighty, for upholding the honour and authority of the parliament; and likewise for the preservation of their safety in times of most pressing and imminent danger: the great reality and good affections thus seasonably expressed by you, who represent this renowned city of London, in this your Petition, the lords receive with gladness, and have commanded me to return you their heartiest thanks; assuring you that, as to the particulars of your Petition, they will put them into such a way as they doubt not but will give you full satisfaction."

The lords ordered that this Petition and Answer be forthwith printed and published, and that an Ordinance be prepared and brought into their house, pursuant to the desires of the city.

The commons had received the same Petition from the city two days before, and named a committee also to bring in an Ordinance according to the desire of the petitioners. And Mr. Whitlocke says, "They had the heartiest thanks the house could express, for their constant affections to the parliament, and for providing guards so seasonably for the safety of it; the continuance of which care was desired."

Self-denying Resolutions of the Commons.] The commons had been some time in framing a Self-denying Ordinance for their own Members only; and this day the debate of it was again resumed; after which they passed the following Votes: "That no Members shall receive any Profit of any Office, Grant, or Sequestration from the parliament: That the benefit such Members have received shall be paid, for the use of the common-wealth, to the committee of accounts. That the Lands and Estates of all the member of the house be liable to the law for payment of their debts." A day was also fixed to hear informations against members; and that no members hereafter shall receive any reparation for damages or losses sustained by these times, till the public debts be first satisfied.

Engagement entered into by the Army, containing the Terms on which they agree to disband.] June 11. The lords received advice from the earl of Nottingham, one of the commissioners sent down to the Army, communicated in the following letter, &c.

To the right hon. the earl of MANCHESTER, Speaker of the House of Peers, pro tempore.

"May it please your lordship; The Committee got last night to Cambridge, and immediately applied themselves to the general; and, about 10 o'clock, acquainted him and his officers with our Instructions and your Votes and Resolutions, and left copies of them in writing. The general appointed 8 o'clock in the morning to give his Answer, which we received by word of mouth about 11; but the committee desired to have it in writing, and about one they received the following Answer from the general and his officers by Mr. Rushworth:

'By the Engagement of the Army at the last general rendezvous, near Newmarket, your lordship and the rest of the commissioners may see what way the army had put themselves into for avoiding confusion or uncertainties; and, in order to a general satisfaction in the point of disbanding, you may perceive by that a ready and sure way to bring that affair unto an issue, without any course that may endanger disorders or other inconveniencies; but if you be, by your Instructions, bound up, or shall, of yourselves, think fit to see the Votes and Resolutions of both houses communicated immediately to the several regiments, the Army being now at rendezvous, I shall, with my officers, be ready to attend your lordship and the rest of the Commissioners, in pursuance of your Instructions.'

"Upon perusal of this Answer we have taken our instructions into consideration, and find ourselves obliged thereby to cause your Votes and Resolutions to be read, this day, at the rendezvous at the head of every regiment. The general's Answer having relation to an Engagement of the Army, and we finding the same in print, I send it your lordship inclosed. This afternoon we have attended the rendezvous, and immediately imparted the Votes and Resolutions to the army, and find the general sense of the army conformable to that Engagement. I am, &c. C. NOTTINGHAM. Royston, June 20, 1647."

A SOLEMN ENGAGEMENT of the Army, under the Command of his Excellency sir Tho. Fairfax, with a Declaration of their Resolutions as to disbanding, &c. read, assented unto, and subscribed, by all the Officers and Soldiers of the several Regiments, at the general Rendezvous near Newmarket, June 5, 1647.*

"Whereas, upon the Petition intended and agreed upon in the Army, in March last, to have been presented to the General, for the obtaining only of our due and necessary concerns as soldiers, the honourable house of commons being unseasonably prepossessed with a copy thereof, and (as by the sequel we suppose) with some strange misrepresentations of the carriage and intention of the same, was induced to send down an order for suppressing the Petition; and, within 2 or 3 days after, (upon further misinformations and scandalous suggestions of the like or worse nature, and by the indirect practices of some malicious and mischievous persons, as we suppose, surprizing or otherwise abusing the parliament) a Declaration was published, in the name of both houses, highly censuring the said Petition; and declaring the petitioners, if they should proceed thereupon, no less than enemies to the state and disturbers of the public peace: and whereas, at the same time and since, divers eminent officers of the army have been brought into question and trouble about the said Petition; whereby both they and the rest of the officers were disabled or discouraged, for the time, from further acting or appearing therein on the soldiers behalf:—And whereas, by the aforesaid proceedings and the effects thereof, the soldiers of this army (finding themselves so stopped in their due and regular way of making known their just grievances and desires to and by their officers) were enforced to an unusual, but in that case necessary, way of correspondence and agreement amongst themselves; to chuse out of the several troops and companies several men, and those out of their whole number to chuse two or more for each regiment, to act in the name and behalf of the whole soldiery of the respective regiments, troops, and companies, in the prosecution of their rights and desires in the said petition; as also of their just vindication and righting in reference to the aforesaid proceedings upon and against the same, who have accordingly acted and done many things to those ends; all which the soldiery do own and approve as their own acts:—And whereas afterwards (upon the sending down of field-marshal Skippon, and those other officers of the army that were members of the house of commons, to quiet distempers in the army*) fresh hopes being conceived of having our grievances and desires again admitted to be made known and considered in a regular way, and without such misrepresentations as formerly; the officers and soldiers of the army, except some few dissenting officers, did again join in a Representation of their common grievances; and the officers, except as before, did agree upon a narrative Account of the Grounds, Rise, and Growth of the Discontents in the Army, and their proceedings in relation thereunto, with an overture of the best expedients to remove or satisfy the same; both which were presented to the said members of the house, and from them reported to the house:—And whereas the parliament, having thereupon voted and ordered some particulars only towards satisfaction of our Grievances, hath since proceeded to certain resolutions of

* These were Ireton, Fleetwood, Harrison, with many other officers in the army, who were about this time elected into the house of commons, in the room of such as were dead, or had been expelled for adhering to the king; whereby they most effectually set aside their Self-denying Ordinance, and soon after gained a majority against the Presbyterian party in parliament.

sudden disbanding the army by pieces; which resolutions being taken, and to be executed before full and equal satisfaction be given to the whole army in any of the grievances; before effectual performance of that satisfaction in part, which the preceding votes seemed to promise, as to some of the grievances; and before any consideration at all of some others most material; (as by the results of a general Council of War on Saturday, May 29, was in general declared, and is now more fully remonstrated in particulars, by a Representation thereof agreed upon by us all) we cannot but look upon the said resolutions of disbanding us in such manner, as proceeding from the same malicious and mischievous principles and intentions, and from the like indirect practices of the same persons, abusing the parliament and us, as the former proceedings against us before-mentioned did; and not without cruel and bloody purposes, (as some of them have not stuck to declare or intimate) after the body of the army should be disbanded, or the soldiers divided from their officers; then to question, proceed against, and execute their malicious intentions upon, all such particular officers and soldiers in the army, as had appeared to act in the premises in behalf of the army:—And whereas, upon a late Petition to the General from the Agitators in behalf of the soldiery, grounded upon the preceding considerations, relating to the said Resolutions of disbanding, the said general council of war (to prevent the danger and inconveniences of these disturbances, or tumultuous actings or confusions, which the dissatisfactions and jealousies, thereupon also grounded, were like suddenly to have produced in the army) did advise the general first to contract the quarters of the army, and then to draw the same to an orderly rendezvous for satisfaction of all; and that his excellency would immediately send up to move and desire the parliament to suspend any present proceedings upon the said resolutions of disbanding, to resume the consideration of the grievances and desires sent up from the army, and not to disband it in pieces before just and equal satisfaction given to the whole:—And whereas some of the regiments appointed for disbanding, upon notice thereof have withdrawn themselves from their quarters adjacent to their appointed rendezvous and drawing towards the head-quarters; and the rest contracted their quarters by order, according to the said advice of the council of war: we, the officers and soldiers of the several regiments hereafter named, are now met at a general rendezvous; and the regiments appointed as aforesaid to be disbanded have not appeared, nor can appear; but are rather resolved not to appear at the several and respective rendezvous, appointed as aforesaid for their disbanding: and divers other things have been done by several other parties or members of the army, necessarily relating to the good and concernment of the whole in these affairs.—Now, forasmuch as we know not how far the malice, injustice, and tyrannical principles of our enemies, that have already prevailed so far to abuse the parliament and army, as is aforementioned in the past proceedings against the army, may farther prevail to the danger or prejudice of ourselves, or any officers or soldiers of the army, or other persons that have appeared to act any thing in the behalf of the army; or how far the same may farther prevail to the danger or prejudice of the kingdom, in raising a new war or otherwise; therefore, for the better prevention of all such dangers, prejudices, or other inconveniences that may ensue; and withal for the better satisfaction of the parliament and kingdom concerning our desires of conforming to the authority of the one, and providing for the good and quiet of the other, in the present affair of disbanding; and for a more assured way whereby that affair may come to a certain issue, (to which purposes we herein humbly implore the continued presence and assistance of God, the righteous judge of all) the officers and soldiers of the army subscribing hereunto, do hereby declare, agree, and promise, to and with each other, and to and with the parliament and kingdom, as followeth:—First, That we shall cheerfully and readily disband, when thereunto required by the parliament; or else shall many of us be willing, if desired, to engage in further services either in England or Ireland; having first such satisfaction to the army, in relation to our Grievances and Desires heretofore presented, and such security that we ourselves, when disbanded and in the condition of private men, or other the free-born people of England (to whom the consequence of our case does equally extend) shall not remain subject to the like oppression, injury, or abuse, as in the premises hath been attempted, and put upon us while an army, by the same men's continuance in the same credit and power (especially if as our judges) who have in these past proceedings against the army so far prevailed to abuse the parliament and us, and to endanger the kingdom; and also such security, that we ourselves, or any members of the army, or others who have appeared to act any thing in behalf of the army, in relation to the premises before recited, shall not, after disbanding, be any way questioned, prosecuted, troubled, or prejudiced, for any thing so acted, or for the entering into, or necessary prosecution of, this present agreement: We say, having first such satisfaction and securities in these things, as shall be agreed unto by a council, to consist of those general officers of the army, who have concurred with the army in the premises, with two commission-officers and two soldiers to be chosen for each regiment, who have concurred, or shall concur, with us in the premises and in this agreement; or by the major part of such of them who shall meet in Council for that purpose, when they shall be thereunto called by the general.—Secondly, That without such satisfaction and security as aforesaid, we shall not willingly disband or divide, or suffer ourselves to be disbanded or divided. And whereas we also find many strange things suggested, or suspected, to our great prejudice, concerning dangerous principles, interests, and designs in this army; (as overthrowing of magistracy, the suppressing or hindering of Presbyterian Government and establishing of Independent, or upholding of a general licentiousness under pretence of liberty of conscience, and many such things) we shall very shortly tender to the parliament a vindication of the army from all such scandals, to clear our principles in relation thereunto: and, in the mean time, we do disavow and disclaim all purpose or designs, in our late or present proceedings, to advance or insist upon any such interest; neither would we, if we might and could, advance or set up any one particular party or interest in the kingdom, though imagined never so much our own; but should much rather study to provide, as far as may be within our sphere or power, for such an establishment of common and equal right, freedom, and safety to the whole, as all might equally partake of, that do not (by denying the same to others, or otherwise) render themselves incapable thereof.”

A Letter from General Fairfax and the Army to the City of London.] June 11, p. m. A deputation from the City waited on the two houses, and presented them with the following copy of a Letter they had received from the General and principal Officers of the Army, with their Desires thereupon; which we give from the Lords Journals:

To the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Common-Council of the City of London.

“Right Hon. and worthy Friends; Having, by our Letters and other Addresses presented by our General to the honourable house of commons, endeavoured to give satisfaction of the clearness of our just Demands; and also in Papers published by us remonstrated the Grounds of our Proceedings in prosecution thereof; all which having been exposed to public view, we are confident have come to your hands, and at least received a charitable construction from you: the sum of all which our Desires as Soldiers, are no other than a desire of satisfaction to our demands as soldiers, and reparation upon those who have, to the utmost, improved all opportunities and advantages, by false suggestions, misrepresentations, and otherwise for the destruction of this army, with a perpetual blot of ignominy upon it; which we should not value, if it singly concerned our own particulars, being ready to deny ourselves in this, as we have done in other cases for the kingdom's good; but, under this pretence, finding no less involved in it than the overthrow of the privileges both of parliament and people; wherein, rather than they shall fail in their designs, or we not receive in the eyes of all good men what is just, do endeavour to engage the kingdom in a new war; and this singly by them who, when the truth of these things shall be made appear, will be found the authors of those evils that are feared, as having no other way to protect themselves from question and punishment, but by putting the kingdom into blood, under pretences of the honour of, and their love to, the parliament; as if that were dearer to them than us; or as if they had given greater proof of their faithfulness to it than we. But we perceive that, under these veils and pretences, they seek to interest their design in the city of London, as if that city ought to make good their miscarriages, and should prefer a few self-seeking men before the welfare of the public; and indeed we have found these men so active to accomplish their designs, and to have such apt instruments for their turn in that city, that we have cause to suspect they may engage many therein, upon mistakes which are easily swallowed in times of such prejudices against those that have given (we speak it without vanity) the most public testimony of their good affections to the public, and to that city in particular.—For the thing we insist upon as Englishmen, and surely our being soldiers hath not stript us of that interest, although our malicious enemies would have it so: we desire a Settlement of the Peace of the kingdom, and of the Liberties of the subject, according to the Votes and Declarations of parliament; which, before we took up arms, were, by the parliament, used as arguments and inducements to invite us and divers of our dear friends out; some of which have lost their lives in this war; which being, by God's blessing finished, we think we have as much right to demand, and desire to see, a happy settlement, as we have to our money and the other common interest of soldiers, which we have insisted upon. We find also the ingenuous and honest people, in almost all the parts of the kingdom where we come, full of the sense of ruin and misery, if the army should be disbanded before the peace of the kingdom, and those other things before-mentioned, have a full and perfect settlement.—We have said before, and profess it now, we desire no Alteration of the Civil Government. We desire not to intermeddle with, or in the least to interrupt, the settling of the Presbyterian Government; nor do we seek to open a way to licentious Liberty, under pretence of obtaining ease for tender consciences. We profess, as ever, in these things, when the State have once made a settlement, we have nothing to say but to submit or suffer; only we could wish that every good citizen, and every man that walks peaceably in a blameless conversation, and is beneficial to the commonwealth, may have liberty and encouragement, it being according to the just policy of all states, and even to justice itself.—These, in brief, are our Desires and the things for which we stand, beyond which we shall not go; and for the obtaining of these things we are drawing near your city; professing sincerely from our hearts we intend no evil towards you; declaring with all confidence and assurance, that if you appear not against us in these our just desires, to assist that wicked party that would embroil us and the kingdom, neither we nor our soldiers shall give you the least offence: we come not to do any act to prejudice the being of parliaments, or to the hurt of this, in order to the present settlement of the kingdom: we seek the good of all, and we shall here wait, or remove to a farther distance there to abide, if once we be assured that a speedy settlement of things be in hand, until they be accomplished; which done, we shall be most ready, either all of us, or so many of the army as the parliament think fit, to disband or go for Ireland: and although you may suppose that a rich city may seem an enticing bait to poor hungry soldiers to venture far to gain the wealth thereof; yet, if not provoked by you, we do profess, rather than any such evil should fall out, the soldiers shall make their way through our blood to effect it: and we can say this for most of them, for your better assurance, that they so little value their pay in comparison of higher concerns to a public good, that rather than they will be unrighted in the matter of their honesty and integrity, which hath suffered by the men they aim at, and desire justice upon; or want the settlement of the kingdom's Peace and theirs, with their fellow-subjects Liberties, they will lose all: this may be a strong assurance to you that it is not your wealth they seek, but the things tending in common to your and their welfare, that they would attain: you shall do like fellow-subjects and brethren, if that you solicit the parliament for them on their behalf.—If after all this you, or a considerable part of you, be seduced to take up arms in opposition to, or hinderance of, these our just undertakings, we hope, by this brotherly premonition, to the sincerity whereof we call God to witness, we have freed ourselves from all that ruin which may befall your great and populous city, having hereby washed our hands thereof. We rest your affectionate friends to serve you, THOMAS FAIRFAX, OLIVER CROMWELL, ROB. HAMMOND, THO. HAMMOND, HARDRESS WALLER, NATH. RICH, THO. PRIDE, HENRY IRETON, ROBERT LILBURN, JOHN DESBOROUGH, THO. RAINSBOROUGH, JOHN LAMBERT, THO. HARRISON. Royston, June 10, 1647."

The DESIRES of the City of London in Consequence of the foregoing Letter. Commune Council. tent. in Camera Guild. Civit. London 11^o Die Junii, 1647.

"Forasmuch as this Court of Common Council hath received a Letter, bearing date the 10th of this instant June, subscribed by his Excellency sir Tho. Fairfax, and other commanders of the Army, signifying, for reasons therein expressed, the drawing the army near the city; the which, in this dear time, may occasion great scarcity of provisions therein; which we hope is not the meaning, nor will be the matter of contentment to the said army: for prevention of which this court doth humbly pray, if it may seem good to the hon. houses, to send to his excellency the general not to quarter the Army, nor any part thereof, within 25 miles of this city, hoping there shall be no just cause given them to do otherwise; and that it may please the houses to give to this court such further directions in this weighty business as, in their grave wisdoms, shall seem meet."

The Parliament require the General not to advance within 40 Miles of London.] After reading the foregoing Letter from the general to the lord mayor, and the city's Desires thereupon, in the house of lords, the messengers that presented them were called in again, and the Speaker gave them this Answer:—"That the lords receive daily expressions of the fidelity of the city of London, for which their lordships return them thanks; and will speedily send a Letter to sir Tho. Fairfax, not to quarter the Army within 30 miles of the city; and their lordships will speedily give them advice in relation to the whole business." But afterwards, at the desire of the commons, the distance was extended to 40 miles; and both houses agreed to send the following Letter accordingly to sir Tho. Fairfax, signed by their respective Speakers:

"Sir; The houses having this day received information from their commissioners, of the advance of the Army near the city of London, thereby threatening danger to the parliament and city; they have commanded us, in their names, to require you so to dispose your motions and quarters, that no part of the army may quarter within 40 miles of London; that so the dangerous consequences, which may arise by a fact so highly prejudicial to the kingdom, may be timely prevented. We rest, &c."

Petition from the Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, to the General, against disbanding the Army.] June 12. A Letter from the earl of Nottingham, at Royston, was read, with some Papers inclosed:

For the Right Hon. the Earl of MANCHESTER, Speaker of the House of Peers.

"My lord; Since the resolution taken by this committee last night, to send two of our number to London, we do find that every hour doth administer unto us fresh occasion of address unto you. This morning we having been to hear a sermon at Royston, where the general and his officers were, we did observe, upon our return home, many persons, ministers and others, about 100 in number, on horseback, styling themselves the peaceable and well-affected Inhabitants of the county of Norfolk; who, meeting the General in the street; one of the said persons, in the name of all the rest, presented a Petition to him, after some time spent in a speech to his excellency. This morning, also, information came unto us that, the last night a Letter was sent to the city of London, signed by the General and divers of the chief officers, declaring the intentions of the Army to come unto the city; which, so soon as we had notice of, and were able to recover copies of them, it was the resolution of this committee that both houses should be acquainted therewith; and I have accordingly here inclosed sent the copies of them. The printed copies of the Votes and Resolutions of both Houses, sent down unto us, we shall endeavour to see distributed, the best we can, to the several regiments; though we find them to go off but slowly. Your, &c. C. Nottingham. Royston, June 11."

The Letter from the Army to the City, mentioned in the above, we have already given: the Petition was in these words:

To his Excellency sir THO. FAIRFAX, Knt. Captain-General of the Parliament's Forces: The HUMBLE PETITION of the peaceable and well-affected Inhabitants of the Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, together with the City and County of Norwich, earnestly endeavouring after the Prosperity of the Parliament and the Peace of the kingdom;

"Sheweth, That whereas your excellency has been appointed commander in chief over those free commons of England, that have been invited by the parliament to stand up in defence of themselves and fellow subjects in time of imminent danger, against all arbitrary government, tyranny, and oppression; and that the parliament has, by divers Declarations, Remonstrances, and Protestations, engaged themselves, both to God and the kingdom, to endeavour to the utmost to maintain the ancient government of this kingdom, and to preserve the Rights and Liberties of the subjects, and to lay hold of the first opportunity of procuring a safe and well-grounded Peace; notwithstanding all which, there is now an appearance of a most horrid design to ruin the native Liberties of the subject whereby discontents are fomented in the hearts of the people, and the kingdom like to be divided into factions, to the imminent danger of embroiling us yet again in blood: and from the policy of the complotters of this design, we humbly conceive, have already proceeded those sad obstructions of our free Addresses to the parliament, in representing our Grievances and making humble offers to their wisdom of just remedies; which have imposed this necessity upon us humbly to implore your excellency's assistance to mediate with the parliament, in the behalf of us and all the free commons of England, for the speedy and peaceable establishment of those our native liberties, which have now cost the kingdom such vast expence of blood and treasure: that all obstructions that lay in the way to hinder the Addresses of the free subjects of England to the parliament, in representing their Grievances, fears, doubts, and jealousies, as also offers of remedy, might be so speedily removed, as that a firm peace and union might be yet again enjoyed in our distracted kingdom, according to the intentions of the parliament, the frequently declared engagements of the army, and the ardent expectation of all the well-affected of the kingdom. And your petitioners shall ever pray."

This Petition was subscribed by about 1400 of the inhabitants.

After reading the foregoing Petition, the lords ordered that a Letter should be written to the commissioners, to let them signify to the Army that the parliament is in a way of settling the Peace of the kingdom; and that it is desired they should declare what the great design mentioned therein is, with the particulars of the matters and persons, else they must take it as a reflection upon the whole house. The Speaker was ordered to draw up a Letter to this purpose, and report it to the house. They also resolved that all the lords shall be served with an order to attend on Monday the 14th instant, about the great affairs of the kingdom; and all such who have had leave to be absent to be recalled.

Sir Tho. Fairfax's Letter, advising that the Army is marching to St. Alban's.] June 12. p. m. A Letter from sir Tho. Fairfax was read, addressed to the earl of Manchester, Speaker of the house of peers.

"My lord; The letter from both houses, concerning the disposing of quarters of the Army, so as no part may be within 40 miles of London, I received but this morning between 9 and 10 o'clock: the Orders for removing to new quarters about St. Alban's were given out yesterday, without any appointment of rendezvous for this day, so as the several regiments are already upon their march, in several ways, from their last quarters to their new, and it is not now possible to stop them. The quarters now assigned, the nearest to London, are 20 miles distant; and of the reasons pressing me to this motion, besides what my last letter to yourself does express, I have given the commissioners here a further account, to which I refer you, since now the disposing of the quarters cannot at present be otherwise. I shall, for the better ordering of the Army, be this night at St. Albans, appointed before for the head quarters; where I shall wait your further resolutions on Monday. I shall, by the next, give your lordship an account of several Petitions I have received from some counties. I remain Your &c. THO. FAIRFAX."

Next, a Letter from the earl of Nottingham, with sir Tho. Fairfax's Reasons for removing the Army nearer to London was read; and a copy of a Letter from the Commissioners to the General, declaring their dissent to that removal.

The same day both houses agreed to the following additional Instruction to be sent to their Commissioners with the Army, viz. "To use their best endeavours fully to know the particulars which the Army desires, and will insist on, for their satisfaction." *

*Mr. Whitlocke writes, "That this day, upon a rumour that the Army was coming towards London, all the Trained-Bands were raised on pain of death, and strong guards set;

Sir Tho. Fairfax sends to the Parliament Petitions from several Counties in favour of the Army.]

June 13. Being Sunday, both houses sat again to do business; when another Letter from sir Tho. Fairfax, addressed to the Speaker of the house of peers, was read, with two Petitions inclosed; the one from Norfolk, the other from Essex, to mediate with the parliament for settling of Peace:

"My lord; St. Albans, June 12, 1647.

"Having had these inclosed Petitions, in the names of the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk and Essex, directed and delivered to me by the hand of several inhabitants of the said counties, together with their desire, through my mediation, to have their Grievances contained therein humbly presented to the honourable houses of parliament; I assured them that I would, with all convenient speed, make them known unto you, and also use my uttermost endeavours for the speedy obtaining their just requests; and therefore, conceiving it my duty, I thought fit to tender them to your lordships; not doubting but that, according to the encouragement I have given them, you will please to consider and redress them therein as speedily as your other affairs will permit. I remain &c. T. FAIRFAX. St. Albans, June 12."

The Petition from Essex, herein mentioned, we omit, because that from Norfolk and Suffolk, given before, is of the same tenor; as were several more from different counties, all praying sir Tho. Fairfax not to disband the Army till the general Grievances should be redressed.*

June 15. On notice of a nearer approach of the Army, the commons sent to desire the Committee of the Militia of London to double their guards about the houses, to prevent any interruption or disturbance. Ordered, also, That halberts, half-pikes, and other arms, be brought into the outward rooms forthwith, as if they expected an immediate storm.

The Parliament resolve that the King be brought to Richmond] June 15. p. m. The commons sent up the following Votes for the lords concurrence, in relation to the Removal of the King; which were agreed to, and ordered to be sent to sir Tho. Fairfax; viz. "Ordered, That the General be required to deliver up the Person of the King to such persons as both houses shall appoint; to be placed at Richmond under such a guard, and in such manner, as they think fit; to the intent that the Propositions agreed upon by both kingdoms may be speedily presented to his majesthe shops were also shut up, but in a day or two opened again, and all things were quiet in the city."

*Mr. Whitlocke here observes, "That it was strange to see how several counties, with the citizens of London, began to make all their application to the General and Army, omitting the parliament; all looked upon the Army in the chief place, and were afraid of doing any thing contrary to them."

ty, for the settling a safe and well grounded Peace. That the persons to whom the General is required to deliver the Person of the King, shall be the commissioners formerly appointed to receive the Person of the King, at Newcastle, or any three of them."

Representation from the Army to the Parliament, containing their Desires.] June 16. The lords received the following Letter from the Parliament's Commissioners with the Army, directed to their Speaker:

"May it please your lordship; As we signified to you by ours late last night, we were in hopes then to have received from the Army what it was they desired, and would insist upon, and to what end; somewhat after 12 o'clock the general sent unto us, and prayed us to sit up some time, for that he would speedily send us the Answer. In expectation whereof, such of us as were not before gone to bed did stay up, but it came not; whereupon, this morning early, we did attend the General, who did excuse his not sending last night, by some mistake in the transcribing that could not be so soon amended, but that we should have it forthwith. About 11 o'clock this day lieutenant general Hammond, and four colonels of the Army, came to us from the general, commanders, and soldiers of the Army, and presented to us their Representation; and desired us to send the same, with all speed, to the parliament; which here inclosed we present. We likewise sent to know whether if this Representation, were contained all the particulars that the Army did desire and insist upon. To which, by colonel Hammond and other officers, this Answer from the general was returned, That the sum and bottom of the Desires of the Army are delivered in the Representation, only there remain some Heads tending to the clearing of the Representation, which should be within three hours brought to the commissioners. These shall be sent you from Your &c. C. Nottingham. De La War. St. Alban's June 15."

The Representation from the Army mentioned in the above letter, is not entered in the Journals. However, it was published by the special order of the general and his officers*: from which Authority we give it, together with another Paper, printed by the same authority and hinted at above, which contained the Heads of a Charge against several Members of the house of commons.—And first,

A REPRESENTATION from his Excellency Sir THOMAS FAIRFAX and the Army under his Command, humbly tendered to the Parliament, concerning the just and Fundamental Rights and Liberties of themselves and the Kingdom, with some humble Proposals and Desires in order thereunto, and for settling the Peace of the Kingdom.

"That we may no longer be the dissatisfaction of our friends, the subject of our enemies malice, (to work jealousies and misrepresentations upon) and the suspicion, if not astonishment, of many in the kingdom, in our late or present transactions and conduct of business, we shall, in all faithfulness and clearness, profess and declare unto you those things which have of late protracted and hindered our disbanding; the present Grievances which possess our Army, and are yet unremedied; with our Desires as to the complete settlement of the Liberties and Peace of the kingdom, which is that blessing of God than which, of all worldly things, nothing is more dear unto us or more precious in our thoughts; we having hitherto thought all our present enjoyments (whether of life, or livelihood, or nearest relations) a price but sufficient to the purchase of so rich a blessing; that we, and all the free-born people of this nation may sit down in quiet under our vines, and under the glorious administration of justice and righteousness, and in full possession of those fundamental Rights and Liberties, without which we can have little hopes, as to human considerations, to enjoy either any comfort of life, or so much as life itself, but at the pleasure of some men, ruling merely according to will and power. It cannot be unknown what hath passed betwixt the parliament and the Army as to the service of Ireland; by all which, together with the late proceedings against the Army in relation to their Petitions and Grievances, all men may judge what hath hindered the army from a ready engagement in that service; and without further account or apology as to that particular, than what those passages and proceedings themselves, already made public, do afford, we do appeal to all men, whether those courses to which the parliament hath, by the designs and practice of some, been drawn, have rationally tended to induce a cheerful and unanimous undertaking of the army as to that service, or rather to break and pull the army in pieces with discontents and dishonour; and to put such disobligations and provocations upon it as might drive it into distemper, and, indeed, discourage both this army and other soldiers from any further engagement in the parliament's service. And we wish all men would with us, upon the whole carriage, seriously consider whether, in the intentions of those who have, by false informations and misrepresentations, put the parliament upon such ways, the timely and effectual relief of Ireland seems really to have been intended; or rather, with the breaking and disbanding of this army, to draw together or raise such other forces, and of such a temper, as might serve to some desperate and destructive designs in England : for which, besides the probable suspicions from their carriage of the business, we have before-hand, in the transaction thereof, had more than hints of such a design, by clear expressions to that purpose, from many of those officers of the army that have been persuaded, and appeared most forward, to engage for Ireland on the terms proposed. And that such a design hath all along been driven seems now too evident, by the present disposing of those forces that have been engaged as for Ireland, by the endeavours of some to gain a power from the parliament of ordering the same for some service in England, and by the private listings of men for service here, without any public authority of parliament ; and all this by the same persons who have all along appeared most active and violent in the late proceedings against the army.—As to the just Discontents and Dissatisfactions of the Army in relation to their Grievances, and their non-compliance to the late Orders for sudden disbanding by piecemeal, before more full and equal satisfaction were given to the whole, we desire you to look back to the Papers already published of the Grievances themselves, the Narrative of the Officers, and to the later Papers from the general Council of War at Bury, and from the late general rendezvous last week near Newmarket : and, we think, the parliament's late resuming the consideration of those things as to a further satisfaction, doth much justify the desires and proceedings of the army in those past particulars hitherto.—And though had we, upon our first addresses for our undoubted rights and dues, found a free and candid reception, with a just consideration and reasonable satisfaction, or at least an ingenuous Answer therein, we should have been easily persuaded to have abated or forborne much of our dues ; and not to have inquired into or considered, so far as we have, either the possibilities there are for more present satisfaction of arrears, or the credit of future securities proposed ; yet since, upon those former addresses, we have found such unworthy dealing, as in the said Papers is set forth : and those additional, though hitherto but partial, satisfactions coming so hardly as they have, we find no obliging reasons, in the least, to decline or recede from what is our due ; but rather still to adhere unto our desires of full and equal satisfaction in all the things mentioned in the aforesaid Papers, not only in behalf of ourselves and the army, but also of the whole soldiery throughout the kingdom, who have concurred, or shall concur, with us in the same desires.—And to all our former Desires as soldiers we cannot but add this, (wherein we find ourselves so nearly concerned in point of justice and reputation) that more care and a stricter course may be taken for making good all articles granted upon surrenders, according to the true intent and meaning of them ; as also for remedy and reparation in case of any breach ; and this without those delays which divers have found as prejudicial, or more, than if they had been totally denied the performance of them.—Nor will it now, we hope, seem strange or unreasonable to rational and honest men, who consider the consequence of our present case to their own and the kingdom's, as well as our future concerns in point of right, freedom, peace, and safety, if (from a deep sense of the high consequence of our present case, both to ourselves in future and all other people) we shall, before disbanding, proceed in our own and the kingdom's behalf, to propound and plead for some provision for our and the kingdom's satisfaction and future security in relation to those things ; especially considering that we were not a mere mercenary army, hired to serve any arbitrary power of state, but called forth and conjured, by the several Declarations of parliament, to the defence of our own and the people's just rights and liberties : and so we took up arms in judgment and conscience to those ends, and have so continued them ; and are resolved, according to your first just desires in your Declarations, and such principles as we have received from your frequent informations and our own common sense, concerning these our fundamental rights and liberties, to assert and vindicate the just power and rights of this kingdom in parliament, for those common ends premised, against all arbitrary power, violence, and oppression, and all particular parties and interests whatsoever ; the said Declarations still directing us to the equitable sense of all laws and constitutions, as dispensing with the very letter of the same, and being supreme to it, when the safety and preservation of all is concerned ; and assuring us, that all authority is fundamentally seated in the office, and but ministerially in the persons. Neither do or will these our proceedings, as we are fully and in conscience persuaded, amount to any thing unwarrantable before God and men ; being thus far much short of the common proceedings, in other nations, to things of an higher nature than we have yet appeared to : and we cannot but be sensible of the great complaints that have been made to us generally in the kingdom, from the people where we march, of arbitrariness and injustice, to their great and insupportable oppression.—And truly such kingdoms as have, according both to the law of nature and nations, appeared to be the vindicators and defenders of their just rights and liberties, have proceeded much higher : as our brethren of Scotland, who, in the first beginning of these late differences, associated in covenant from the very same principles and grounds, having no visible form either of parliament or king to countenance them : and as they were therein justified and protected by their own and this kingdom also, so we justly shall expect to be.—We need not mention the States of the Netherlands, the Portugals and others, all proceeding upon the same principles of right and freedom : and accordingly the parliament hath declared it no resistance of magistracy to side with the just principles of law, nature, and nations, being that law upon which we have assisted you. And that the soldiery may lawfully hold the hands of that general who will turn his cannon against his army, on purpose to destroy them; the steamen the hands of that pilot who wilfully runs the ship upon the rock, as our brethren of Scotland argued: and such were the proceedings of our ancestors of famous memory, so the purchasing of such rights and liberties as they have enjoyed through the price of their blood; and we, both by that and the later blood of our dear friends and fellow soldiers, with the hazard of our own, do now lay claim unto.—Nor is that supreme end, the Glory of God, wanting in these cases to set a price upon all such proceedings of righteousness and justice; it being one witness of God in the world, to carry on a testimony against the injustice and unrighteousness of men, and against the miscarriages of government, when corrupted or declining from their primitive and original glory.—These things we mention but to compare proceedings, and to shew that we are so much the more justifiable and warranted in what we do, by how much we come short of that height and measure of proceedings which the people in free kingdoms and nations have formerly practised.—Now, having thus far cleared our way in this business, we shall proceed to propound such things as we do humbly desire for the settling and securing of our own and the kingdom's Rights, Freedom, Peace, and Safety, as followeth:—I. That the Houses may be speedily purged of such Members as, for their delinquency, or for corruption, or abuse to the state, or undue election, ought not to sit there; whereof the late elections in Cornwall, Wales, and other parts of the kingdom, afford too many examples to the great prejudice of the people's freedom in the said elections. II. That those Persons who have, in the late unjust and high proceedings against the army, appeared to have the will, the confidence, credit and power to abuse the parliament and the army, and endanger the kingdom in carrying on such things against us while an Army, may be some way speedily disabled from doing the like or worse to us, (when disbanded and dispersed, and in the condition of private men) or to other the free-born people of England in the same condition with us; and that, for that purpose, the same persons may not continue in the same power, especially as ours and the kingdom's judges in the highest trust, but may be made incapable thereof for the future.—And if it be questioned who those are, we thought not fit particularly to name them in this our representation to you; but shall very speedily give in their names, and, before long, shall offer what we have to say against them to your commissioners; wherein we hope so to carry ourselves, as that the world shall see we aim at nothing of private revenge or animosity, but that justice may have a free course; and the kingdom be eased, at least, by disabling such men from places of judicature, who, desiring to advantage and set up themselves and their party, in a general confusion, have endeavoured to put the kingdom into a new flame of war, than which nothing is more abhorrent unto us.—But because neither the granting of this alone would be sufficient to secure our own and the kingdom's Rights, Liberties, and Safety, either for the present age, or posterity; nor would the proposal of this, singly, be free from the scandal and appearance of faction, or design only to suppress one party, under the notion of unjust or oppressive, that we may advance another which may be imagined more our own: We therefore declare; That indeed we cannot but wish that such men, and such only, might be preferred to the great power and trust of the common-wealth, as are approved at least for moral righteousness; and of such we cannot but, in our wishes, prefer those that appear acted thereunto by a principle of conscience and religion in them; and accordingly we do and ever shall bless God for those many worthies, who, through his providence, have been chosen into this parliament; and to such men's endeavours, under God, we cannot but attribute that vindication in part of the people's rights and liberties, and those beginnings of a just reformation, which the proceedings at the beginning of this parliament appeared to have driven at, and tended to, though of late obstructed or rather diverted to other ends and interests by the prevailing of other persons, of other principles and conditions.—But we are so far from designing or complying to have any absolute arbitrary power fixed or settled, for continuance, in any persons whatsoever, as that, if we might be sure to obtain it, we cannot wish to have it so in the persons of any who we might best confide in, or who should appear most of our own opinions or principles, or whom we might have most personal assurance of, or interest in; but we do and shall much rather wish that the authority of this kingdom in a parliament rightly constituted, free, equally, and successively chosen, according to its original intention, may ever stand and have its course; and therefore we shall apply our desires chiefly to such things, as (by having parliaments settled in such a right constitution) may give more hopes of justice and righteousness, to flow down equally to all in that its antient channel, without any overtures tending either to overthrow that foundation either of order or government in this kingdom, or to ingross that power, for perpetuity, into the hands of any particular person or party whatsoever.—And for that purpose, though, as we have found it doubted by many men, minding sincerely the public good, but not weighing so fully all consequences of things, it may and is not unlike to prove, that, upon the end of this parliament and election of a new, the constitution of succeeding parliaments, as to the persons elected, may prove for the worse many ways; yet since neither in the purging of this present parliament, nor in the election of a new, we can promise to ourselves or the kingdom an assurance of justice, or other positive good from the hands of men; but those that appear at present most righteous, and most for common good, (having an unlimited power fixed in them during life or pleasure) in time may become corrupt, or settle into parties or factions; or on the other side, in case of new elections, those that should so succeed may prove as bad or worse than the former:—We therefore humbly conceive that (of two inconveniences the less being to be chosen) the main thing to be intended in the case (and beyond which human providence cannot reach, as to any assurance of positive good) seems to be this, viz. To provide that however unjust or corrupt the persons of parliament-men, in present or future, may prove; or whatever ill they may do to particular parties, or to the whole in particular things, during their respective terms or periods; yet they shall not have the temptation or advantage of an unlimited power fixed in them during their own pleasure, whereby to perpetuate injustice and oppression upon any, without end or remedy; or to advance and uphold any one particular party, faction, or interest whatsoever, to the oppression or prejudice of the community and the enslaving of the kingdom unto all posterity; but that the people may have an equal hope or possibility, if they have made an ill choice at one time, to mend it in another; and the members themselves may be in a capacity to taste of subjection as well as rule, and may be so inclined to consider of other men's cases, as what may come to be their own. This we speak in relation to the house of commons, as being intrusted on the people's behalf, for their interest in that great and supreme power of the commonwealth, (viz. the legislative power, with the power of final judgments) which being in its own nature so arbitrary, and in a manner so unlimited, unless in point of time, is most unfit and dangerous, as to the people's interest, to be fixed in the persons of the same men during life or their own pleasure; neither, by the original constitution of this state, was it, or ought it, to continue so; nor doth it, where ever it is, and continues so, render that state any better than a mere tyranny, or the people subjected to it any better than vassals: but in all states where there is any face of common freedom, and particularly in this state of England (as is most evident both by many positive laws and antient constant custom) the people have a right to new and successive elections unto that great and supreme trust, at certain periods of time; which is so essential and fundamental to their freedom, as it cannot or ought not to be denied them; and without which the house of commons is of very little concernment to the interest of the commons of England: yet in this we would not be misunderstood to blame those worthies of both houses, whose zeal to vindicate the liberties of this nation did procure that act for the continuance of this parliament, whereby it was secured from being dissolved at the king's pleasure, as former parliaments have been, and reduced to such a certainty as might enable them the better to assist and vindicate the liberties of this nation (immediately before so highly invaded, and then also so much endangered); and this we take to be the principal ends and grounds for which, in that exigency of time and affairs, it was procured, and to which we acknowledge it hath happily been made use of; but we cannot think it was by those worthies intended, or ought to be made use of, to the perpetuating of that supreme trust and power in the persons of any, during their own pleasures, or to the debarring of the people from their right of elections totally, now when those dangers or exigencies were past, and the affairs and safety of the commonwealth would admit of such a change. Having thus cleared our Grounds and intentions, as we hope, from all scruples and misunderstandings in what follows, we shall proceed further to propose what we humbly desire for the settling and securing of our own and the kingdom's Rights and Liberties, through the blessing of God, to posterity? and therefore, upon the Grounds premised, we further humbly desire as followeth: III. That some determinate period of time may be set for the continuance of this and future parliaments, beyond which none shall continue, and upon which new writs may of course issue out, and new elections successively take place, according to the intent of the bill for Triennial parliaments. And herein we would not be misunderstood, to desire a present or sudden dissolution of this parliament; but only, as is expressed before, that some certain period may be set for the determining of it, so that it may not remain, as now, continuable for ever, or during the pleasure of the present members. And we should desire that the period to be now set for ending this parliament may be such as may give sufficient time for provision of what is wanting, and necessary to be passed, in point of just reformation and for further securing the Rights and Liberties, and settling the Peace of the kingdom; in order to which we further humbly offer:—IV. That secure provision may be made for the continuance of future parliaments, so as they may not be adjournable or dissolvable at the king's pleasure, or any otherwise than by their own consent during their respective periods; but at those periods each parliament to determine of course as before. This we desire may be now provided for, if it may be, so as to put it out of all dispute for the future, though we think of right it ought not to have been otherwise before. And because the present distribution of Elections for parliament members is so very unequal, and the multitude of burghesses for decayed or inconsiderable towns (whose interest in the kingdom would in many not exceed, or in others not equal, ordinary villages) doth give too much and too evident opportunity for men of power to frame parties in parliament to serve particular interests, and thereby the common interest of the whole is not so minded, or not so equally provided for: We therefore further desire, V. That some provision may be now made for such distribution of Elections for future parliaments, as may stand with some rule of equality or proportion, as near as may be, to render the parliament a more equal representative of the whole; as for instance, That all counties or divisions and parts of the kingdom (involving inconsiderable towns) may have a number of parliament-men allowed to their choice, proportionably to the respective rates they bear in the common charges and burdens of the kingdom, and not to have more; or some other such like rule.—And thus a firm foundation being laid in the authority and constitution of parliaments for the hopes, at least, of common and equal right and freedom to ourselves and all the free-born people of this land; we shall for our parts, freely and chearfully commit our stock or share of interest in this kingdom, into this common bottom of parliaments; and though it may for our particulars, go ill with us in one voyage, yet we shall thus hope if right be with us, to fare better in another. These things we desire may be provided for by bill or Ordinance of parliament, to which the royal assent may be desired. And when his majesty (in these things, and what else shall be proposed by the parliament necessary for securing the Rights and Liberties of the people, and for settling the Militia and Peace of the Kingdom) shall have given his concurrence, to put them past dispute, we shall then desire that the rights of his majesty and his posterity may be considered of and settled in all things, so far as may consist with the right and freedom of the subject, and with the security of the same for the future.—VI. We desire the Right and Freedom of the People to represent to the parliament, by way of humble Petition, their Grievances, in such things as cannot be otherwise remedied than by parliament, may be cleared and vindicated; that all such Grievances of the people may be freely received, and admitted into consideration, and put into an equitable and speedy way to be heard, examined, and redressed, if they appear real; and that in such things, for which men have remedy by law, they may be freely left to the benefit of the law and the regular course of justice, without interruption or check from the parliament, except in case of things done upon the exigency of war, or for the service and benefit of the parliament and kingdom in relation to the war, or otherwise in due pursuance and execution of ordinances or orders of parliament. More particularly, under this head, we cannot but desire that all such as are imprisoned for any pretended misdemeanor, may be put into a speedy way for a just hearing and trial; and such as shall appear to have been unjustly and unduly imprisoned, may, with their liberty, have some reasonable reparation according to their sufferings and the demerit of their oppressors.—VII. That the large power given to committees, or deputy-lieutenants, during the late times of war and distraction, may be speedily taken into consideration; that such of those powers as appear not necessary to be continued may be taken away, and such of them as are necessary, may be put into a regulated way, and left to as little arbitrariness as the nature and necessity of the things wherein they are conversant will bear. VIII. We could wish that the kingdom might both be righted, and publickly satisfied, in point of Accounts, for the vast sums that have been levied and paid; as also in divers other things wherein the common-wealth may be conceived to have been wronged or abused: but we are loth to press any thing that may tend to lengthen out further disputes or contestations, but rather such as may tend to a speedy and general composure and quieting of men's minds, in order to peace; for which purpose we further propose,—IX. That public Justice being first satisfied, by some few examples to posterity out of the worst of excepted persons and other delinquents having past their compositions, some course may be taken, by a general Act of Oblivion, or otherwise, whereby the seeds of future war or feuds, either to the present age or posterity, may the better be taken away; by easing that sense of present, and satisfying those fears of future, ruin or undoing to persons or families, which may drive men into any desperate ways for self-preservation and remedy; and by taking away the private remembrances and distinctions of parties, as far as may stand with safety to the rights and liberties we have hitherto fought for.—There are besides these, many particular things which we could wish to be done, and some to be undone, all in order still to the same end of common Right, Freedom, Peace, and Safety; but these Proposals foregoing being the principal things we bottom and insist upon, we shall, as we have said before, for our parts, acquiesce for other particulars in the wisdom and justice of parliament. And whereas it hath been suggested or suspected that, in our late or present proceedings, our design is to overthrow Presbytery, or hinder the Settlement thereof, and to have the Independent Government set up, we do clearly disclaim and disavow any such design: We only desire that, according to the Declarations promising a provision for tender consciences, there may be some effectual course taken, according to the intent thereof, that such who, upon conscientious grounds, may differ from the established forms, may not for that be debarred from the common Rights, Liberties, or Benefits belonging equally to all, as men and members of the commonwealth, while they live soberly, honestly, inoffensively towards others, and peacefully and faithfully towards the State.—We have thus freely and clearly declared the depth and bottoms of our hearts and desires, in order to the Rights, Liberties, and Peace of the Kingdoms; wherein we appeal to all men, whether we seek any thing of advantage to ourselves, or any particular party whatever, to the prejudice of the whole; and the things we wish and seek do not equally concern and conduce to the good of others, in common with ourselves, according to the sincerity of our desires and intentions; wherein, as we have already found the concurrent sense of the people in divers counties, by their Petitions to the General, expressing their deep resentment of these things, and pressing us to stand for the interest of the kingdom therein; so we shall wish and expect to find the unanimous concurrence of all others that are equally concerned with us in these things, and wish well to the Public.—And so (trusting in the mercy and goodness of God to pass by and help any failings or infirmities of ours in the carriage or proceedings hereupon) we shall humbly cast ourselves and the business upon his good pleasure, depending only on his presence and blessing for an happy issue to the peace and good of this poor kingdom, in the accomplishment whereof we desire and hope that God will make you blessed instruments."

Heads of a Charge, presented by the Army, against eleven Members of the House of Commons.] Next follow

The HEADS of a CHARGE, delivered in the Name of the Army, under the Command of sir Thomas Fairfax, unto the Commissioners of Parliament, now with the Army at St. Albans, June 14, 1647, to be by them sent up against Denzil Hollis, esq. sir Philip Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir John Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, sir John Maynard, knts. major-general Massie, John Glynn, esq. Recorder of London, colonel Walter Long, colonel Edward Harley, and Anthony Nichols, esq. Members of the House of Commons, jointly or severally:

1. "That, contrary to the trust reposed in them, the persons above-named, members of the house of commons, have jointly or severally invaded, infringed, or endeavoured to overthrow, the Rights and Liberties of the Subjects of this nation, in arbitrary, violent, or oppressive ways; and in this case, where no pretence was, or could be, of the exigence of war, or other necessity, which might justify or excuse the same. And they have likewise endeavoured, by indirect and corrupt practices, to delay and obstruct justice, to the great damage and prejudice of divers of the poor Commons of England petitioning for the same. 2. That this Army being, until the middle of March last, in a quiet and orderly condition and posture, free from any colour or appearance of distemper or disorder, or from offence to any, and ready, upon reasonable satisfaction in their necessary dues for service past, either quietly to have disbanded, or else to have engaged in the service of Ireland; the persons above-named have jointly or severally endeavoured by false informations, misrepresentations, or scandalous suggestions against the army, to beget misunderstandings, prejudices or jealousies in the parliament against the army; and by deluding, surprizing, or otherways abusing the parliament, to engage the authority of parliament to such proceedings, as to put insufferable injuries, abuses, and provocations upon the Army; thereby to provoke and put the army into a distemper, and to disoblige and discourage the same from any further engagement in the parliament's service; by all which, and other the like particulars and proceedings of theirs, the peace of the kingdom hath been imminently endangered, and the relief of Ireland retarded. 3. That whereas the parliament might otherwise have had out of this Army an entire force, and answerable to their proportion, designed to have engaged for Ireland as aforesaid, under their old officers and conduct, the persons above-named, for advancement of their own ends, faction and design, to the prejudice of the public, have, jointly or severally, under pretence of the service of Ireland, endeavoured by such evil practices as before, to break and pull this army in pieces, to the weakening of the power, and endangering the safety, of the parliament and kingdom; and have likewise endeavoured to put the parliament and kingdom to the trouble hazard, delay, and vast expence of raising a new force as for that service. 4. That with the breaking of this Army as aforesaid, they have in the like manner endeavoured, under the pretence of the service of Ireland, to raise a new force as before, to advance and carry on desperate designs of their own in England, to the prejudice of the parliament and public; and, in pursuance of the same, have endeavoured to divert the forces, engaged as for Ireland unto such their purpose as aforesaid here in England; and have in like manner endeavoured to have gained a power from the parliament for themselves, or some of them, of diverting or misemploying those forces aforesaid, and to raise new forces, under pretence to guard the parliament; and, not having obtained that, have, in like manner, endeavoured privately to list and engage officers and soldiers; or procure them to be listed and engaged, without authority of parliament, for the raising of and embroiling this kingdom in a new and bloody war, and to interrupt and hinder the settling and securing the Rights, Liberties, and Peace of the Kingdom; and for the settling, upholding, and protecting of themselves and their accomplices in their unjust, oppressive, and factious designs and proceedings. 5. That they have jointly or severally invited, encouraged, abetted, or countenanced divers reformadoes, and other officers and soldiers, tumultuously and violently to gather together at Westminster, to affright and assault the members of parliament in passage to and from the house; to offer violence to the house itself; and, by such violence, outrages, and threats, to awe and inforce the parliament.—The several Heads of Charge the Army will, (by such solicitors as they shall appoint, when the house of commons shall admit thereof) make good, in particulars, each head against some of the persons, and some one head or more against each of the persons; and shall shortly give in the several particulars against each person respectively, which shall be made good by proofs; the Army desiring to save and reserve to themselves the liberty of exhibiting any further Charge against all or any of the said persons."

A Paper delivered thereupon to the Parliament's Commissioners at St. Albans.] Next follows,

A PAPER delivered to the Right Hon. the COMMISSIONERS of Parliament now with the Army, June 15, 1647, from his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax, and the Army under his command,

"Shewing, I. That in pursuance of the Representations delivered in, we have prepared a Charge against divers persons, members of the house of commons, (to whom many passages in the said Representation do relate) which we have delivered in to be speeded to the parliament; and shall, when the parliament have admitted thereof, appoint fit persons on our and the kingdom's behalf to prosecute and make good the same. II. That if the parliament shall please to admit these things into debate and consideration, at the desire of the army in behalf of themselves and the kingdom, and to proceed thereupon for a general satisfaction therein, we shall then desire, 1. That the persons impeached in the said Charge may be forthwith suspended from sitting in the house, without which we cannot reasonably expect such proceedings upon any the things we have proposed, as may probably bring the same to an happy or timely issue to the kingdom or ourselves; or as may prevent the present designs and practices so imminently endangering the peace of this kingdom, if the same persons (who have notoriously appeared most active in all the late proceedings, to the prejudice and provocation of the Army, and hazarding thus far the Peace of the Kingdom) shall continue in the same power, and judges of those things relating to the army's satisfaction and peace of the kingdom. 2. That there may be a month's pay at least immediately sent down to the Army for a present supply, out of which the army shall pay 14 days quarter for time to come, and the other 14 days pay shall be accounted as part of arrears: and to this we must desire a present resolution to be with us on Thursday next, by noon at farthest. 3. That if the officers and soldiers of the army who have engaged for Ireland, or those who have deserted the army to come to London, have since then received more than a month's pay, there may be so much more money sent down to the army, above the month's pay before mentioned, as may make up that month's pay to the army equal to what such officers and soldiers have so received at London or elsewhere. 4. That no officers or soldiers who have so deserted the army shall have any more paid them as for arrears, until the rest of the army shall first be satisfied in point of their arrears. 5. Whereas there have been several designs and endeavours, without authority from the parliament, to raise and list new forces in this kingdom, to draw together the forces engaged for Ireland, and march them towards London, and other secret practices to engage the kingdom in a second war; we further desire that, during the debate and transaction of this business betwixt the parliament and the army, the parliament would not suffer any new forces to be raised within this kingdom, or any forces to be invited or admitted out of any other kingdom into this; or any thing else to be done that may carry the face of a new war, or of preparations thereunto, which may endanger or interrupt the present proceedings to the settlement of the liberties and peace of this kingdom. 6. That the parliament would be pleased, without delay; to put the things contained in our several Representations and Papers already given in, into a speedy way of resolution and dispatch, the present posture and condition of the kingdom and army, as also of his majesty himself, not admitting delays."

Both Houses reverse most of the Orders made against the Army.] This bold step of the Army must have made both houses tremble; but, in order to stop the torrent, they went eagerly on in passing Ordinances, and giving Orders for paying of large sums of Money to the Officers and Soldiers; which, as the sequel will shew, did but serve to make them more insolent. As a proof of the passive disposition the Parliament was reduced to, they this day joined in revoking the Orders made for drawing together any of the Forces out of the several adjacent counties for their own defence; and likewise an Order for desiring colonel Dalbier, and other colonels, to bring in Lists of the names and qualities of such gentlemen and Reformed officers, as they should find willing to engage in their service. All which shews plainly, that the parliament then thought themselves at the mercy of the Army.

Sir T. Fairfax's Answer to the Letter from the City of London.] June 17. The lords being informed that some aldermen and others were at the door to deliver a Message from the city of London, they were called in; and alderman Fowke gave an account of their going to sir Thomas Fairfax with the Letter from the City of London, and of the Answer of the General to it, and of the Votes of the lord mayor and common council of London thereupon; all which were read as follows: and, first, the General's Answer to the Letter from the City, addressed to their Commissioners that carried it:

For our honoured Friends Alderman Warner, Alderman Fowke, Alderman Gibbs, Alderman Vyner, and the rest of the Commissioners of the City of London.

"Being informed that divers Soldiers are daily listed under officers in and about the cities of London and Westminster, and parts thereto adjacent, besides the Trained Bands and usual auxiliaries, we strongly apprehend that, notwithstanding all our desires and labours of Peace, the kingdom is like to be precipitated, by some persons, into a new war; therefore, before we can answer that part of your City's Letter, to remove 30 miles distant from London, we desire the city would use their endeavours to prevent all such listings, and therein deal so effectually, as that nothing be for the future done towards such listing or raising any forces; and those already raised may be forthwith discharged: but if this cannot be done, we shall be forced, by an unwilling necessity, to apply our endeavours to break all designs of that kind, and therein we hope to receive the concurrence of your city; professing we have nothing else in our eye but yours, our own, and this poor kingdom's good and quiet. Hereof we desire to hear speedily from you, and so, from time to time, as oft as may be; which we shall own as a seal of that reciprocal love which the City's Letter purports to this army, and shall be, on our parts, most earnestly endeavoured to be maintained. Signed in the Name, and by the Appointment, of his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax and his Council of War. JO. RUSHWORTH. St. Alban's, June 14, 1647."

Inclosed in the above was another Letter directed

For the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of London.

"Honourable and Worthy Friends; We are very glad our Letter from Royston, of the 10th of this instant June, had so good a reception with you, whereof you have given us assurance by your letter of the 12th of this instant, and by those worthy aldermen and others the members of your city, whom you sent unto us; by whose hands we yesterday returned such Answer to that part of your Letter, for our removal 30 miles distant from London, as the present exigency of affairs could possibly admit; to which we add this sincere assurance, that so soon as we shall receive the next Resolution from the parliament, in relation to the proceedings upon the Papers now given in unto them (whereof likewise your commissioners have received a copy from us) we shall then immediately give you such further Answer and satisfaction to that particular, as the nature of these results will permit, with respect only had to the necessary prosecution of those pressing concerns of the kingdom, comprised in those Papers; whereunto, for the justness and reasonableness of our Desires, and their consistence with the true honour, just power, and privileges of parliament, the liberty of the subject, and the safety of your city and kingdom, we do refer you.—As to your Desire expressed in your Instructions to your Commissioners, of our care for the safety of his majesty's person while amongst us, we had, upon his first coming into our quarters, assigned (and have since continued in attendance about his majesty) a guard of two regiments of horse, of as faithful men, and under as trusty a commander as this army doth afford; neither shall our future care be wanting in any further provision necessary for the safety of his royal person.—And we now cannot but take notice, as of the past most free and forward engagements of your famous city in the same cause, which we are now desiring to see a period to and accomplishment of, so of your continual readiness to close with us in our just and necessary desires to the same ends; as also of your present professed averseness to engage in any thing that may tend to a further war or distraction in this kingdom; for all which we cannot but return (after our praises to God) thanks to you and your city; and we assure you that the sense thereof hath a deep impression on our spirits, to find (as we do hitherto) the hand of God working all men's hearts to so clear and unanimous concurrence with our own, in our Desires for the present settling and securing the Rights, Liberties, and Peace of this kingdom, beyond which we have no aims nor ends of our own." (Signed as the last.)

Proceedings of the Common Council thereupon.] The following is a Copy of the Act of Common Council, in consequence of the foregoing Letters:

Commune Concil. tent. in Camera Guildh. Civit. London. 15to Die Junii, 1647.

"Upon relation now made, by the committee of this court, of the noble reception and entertainment of them by sir Tho. Fairfax, and the rest of the commanders at St. Albans; and of the Passages and Answers between them concerning the contents of the Letter sent from this court; and, after reading of the Letter and Papers presented unto this court from his excellency and Council of War; and, after long debate thereupon had, it was thought fit, and so ordered by this court, That the said committee shall, to-morrow morning, acquaint both houses of parliament with these Letters, and signify the desire of his excellency and his council of war, that the city of London would use their endeavours to prevent the listing of soldiers, under officers, in and about the cities of London and Westminster, and parts thereto adjacent, (except the Trained Bands and usual Auxiliaries) for raising a new war; and that those already raised may be forthwith discharged: and the said committee are hereby ordered to take the contents of the said Letter into serious consideration, and to prepare a letter to be sent from this court in answer to the same, to give satisfaction to his excellency and his Council of War that no forces are, or shall be, listed within the city but their Trained Bands, and Auxiliaries; and to signify the proceedings of the said court herein; and the said committee are to present unto this court a draught of the said Letter to be sent as aforesaid."

The Answer returned to all this was, That the lords gave the citizens thanks for communicating those Papers unto them, and let them know that the Orders they mentioned were already annulled and made void by both houses of parliament.

The Parliament's Letter to Sir T. Fairfax to remove his Army 40 Miles from London.]

Another Order agreed to by both houses this day, was, that the Army under sir Tho. Fairfax should be required to remove 40 miles from London, and the following Letter to the general, to put in execution the aforesaid Vote, was also agreed to.

“Sir; The lords and commons being desirous to prevent jealousies and misunderstandings between them and the Army, and, as much as in them is, to preserve the kingdom in peace, and prevent a new war, have passed several Votes, which they have commanded their commissioners to communicate unto you, in order to prevent the great mischief that may arise through popular discontents, by scarcity of provisions; and to the end that the parliament may have more free debate upon the matters presented to them from the Army, the houses do require you that, according to their former Order, you would speedily remove the Army 40 miles distance from London: and they require you likewise to take order, that no forces be raised or admitted into the army, nor any forces placed in any forts, or displaced from any garrisons which they have made, without their approbation. The houses do likewise expect from you a speedy and positive account of what you have done upon the Letter and Votes you have received for the Removal of the King's Person to Richmond. So we rest, Your, &c.”

Narrative of some Conversation that passed between the King and Mr. Reynes,] The last thing done this day was reading a Paper, drawn up by one Mr. Reynes, of what had passed between the King and him, which he had before delivered by word of mouth at the bar of the house of lords. It is entered in their Journals, and was ordered by them to be printed and published:

“In obedience to the command of this right honourable house, I shall here give an Account of my Admission to his majesty's presence, and commission of declaring his Message to the Militia of London, who have thought fit it should be communicated to both houses of parliament. For the first; partly my occasions, partly my desire of seeing his majesty, drew me to Sir William Russel's, where he was then playing at bowls with some of the commissioners; amongst the rest major-general Browne, espying me, proffered me the honour of his majesty's hand, which I readily accepted of, so it might be without inconvenience; and, coming near his royal majesty, he was graciously pleased to grant me that favour; withal asking my name, and something else of major-general Browne, which I did not hear; but he soon after came to me, and desired my attendance at court; where, at my entrance, I was received by him according to his promise, and carried into the presence-room, where he acquainted me with several passages betwixt his majesty, the general, lieut. general, and col. Whaley, whom the king had that day struck for being so presumptuous as to listen while his majesty was in conference with one whom they suspected to be come from London.—From this he fell to a Relation of his majesty's averseness and unwillingness to comply at all with the Army's proceedings; saying, That all their actions, for aught he saw, were both inequitable in themselves, and disproportionable to their pretences. To this the major-general added, That it did highly concern both the parliament and the city to be careful of their safeties, he being an ear-witness daily of their threats, and how much they were animated with the hopes of spoil, and enraged with hatred to the parliament.—This he desired me to deliver, and so led me into the privy-chamber, and his majesty presently came out of his bed-chamber. He came towards me, who was standing with the commissioners: Then major-general Browne anticipated his majesty's discourse by an humble intreaty, that he would be pleased to confirm the Relation he had given me of his majesty's unwillingness to come from Holdenby, and how much against his will he staid here. In answer to which his majesty, clapping his hand upon his breast, said, ‘Upon my life I came against my will,’ which he told me I might well conjecture myself by the Relation he was pleased to afford me of his being taken from Holdenby: ‘But,’ said he, ‘rather than to be carried by neck and heels,’ that I may use his own expression, ‘I went along. Nor am I so in love with their proceedings that I should be willing to continue here, for I find myself an absolute prisoner. As concerning my refusal of returning to Holdenby, which by some of my subjects may be misunderstood, for all the reason I had was, that I chose golden fetters, and a lightsome room before a dark dungeon; for I conceive this to be the better air, knowing that my restraint there should not be less than here.’ Then, appealing to the commissioners, he said, ‘Have I not told the general himself, and others, that I admired by what authority he durst thus resist me and my parliament?’ To which he answered, There was necessity. He told them, ‘They did more than ever the king, though in the height of his power, durst, to enforce justice, either in criminal or civil affairs: indeed I have many times hastened it, but never enforced it, as they have done, in saying, Give us Justice, or——.’ Yet, for my part,’ proceeded his majesty, ‘I know not what they do or intend, but what I hear from those gentlemen,’ pointing to the commissioners, ‘for they have not sent legally to me since my coming; therefore let all those know whom you think fit communicants of this business, that I desire nothing more passionately than to be with my parliament.’—After this I assumed the boldness to tell his majesty, That I thought him then politically absent, when his affection, though not his person, was alienated from them. To which he answered, 'It is very right.' Next I told him, I thought it would be no small comfort to those whom he was pleased to make partakers of this his intention, that his majesty's propension and inclination towards them was so great; which he required me to assure them, whatsoever illusive persuasion would possess them to the contrary: and, moreover, That if he were at the head of their army, he would declare and protest against all their proceedings; and whatsoever they heard to the contrary, he desired them not to believe, no, though under his hand, unless they spake with one who had it from his own mouth. Last of all, at my demand of some Letter, major-general Brown answered, That that was not so safe, and this would be as effectual. This is all my memory supplies me withal. The incompactness of this Narration shall, I hope, obtain your honours pardon, being penned without the least premeditation, and without affecting the least methodical style; only in obedience to your honours command, that I might testify myself to be Your &c. B. Reymes."

Petitions from Hertfordshire, and Buckinghamshire to Sir T. Fairfax.] June 18. A Letter from the earl of Nottingham, addressed to the Speaker of the house of peers, was read, dated at St. Albau's, June 17, 1647, with copies of two Petitions inclosed:

"May it please your lordship; The General last night sent us copies of two Petitions, that day presented to him; the one from divers knights, commoners, gentlemen, freeholders, and others in the county of Hertford; the other from the county of Buckingham, which here inclosed I send you. We shall endeavour, according to the commands of parliament, that the Army may remove their quarters farther from the city; which, as soon as we can bring to any certainty or resolution, shall be made know to you by Your &c. C. Nottingham."

To the Right Noble his Excellency Sir THO. FAIRFAX, Captain-General of the Forces raised for the preservation of the Kingdom: The Humble PETITION of divers Knights, Gentlemen, Freeholders, and other Inhabitants of the County of HERTFORD.

"May it please your Excellency; We do, with much thankfulness, acknowledge the great care and pains which have been undergone by those our faithful and well-to-be-trusted worthies of parliament; who, even in the saddest of times, when deserted by many of their own members, have not spared the hazard of their lives, estates, and fortunes, for the preservation of the just liberties, immunities, and franchises of the free-born subjects of this kingdom, being desperately and strongly invaded by a powerful and malignant party; and also have made many solemn protestations and declarations of their aims, intentions, and purposes, whereby we have been greatly encouraged to yield all cheerful and due assistance in so necessary a work; yet now, to our great grief, observing, by reason, as we conceive, of the machinations and contrivances of some desperately ill-affected to the weal and quiet of the public in general, and to the honour of your ever-honoured army in particular, many obstructions daily to intervene and fall in; whereby both they and we, notwithstanding the still real intentions of the aforementioned worthies, are as yet clearly debarred of the fruition of these our often promised, much wished for, prayed for, fought for, Rights and Privileges, whereof we had well hoped long since to have been partakers.—Wherefore we your said petitioners do most humbly intreat and beseech your excellency, whom God hath eminently and highly honoured, and we well know to have a tender and compassionate care over the distress of this miserably afflicted kingdom, to use your utmost endeavours, and with all expedition before the disbanding of the Army now under your excellency's command, that those firebrands and incendiaries, who have endeavoured to raise new divisions in the kingdom, or, by their slanderous tongues, to fix undeserved reproaches on the army, may be brought to condign punishment; and that we your petitioners, with the rest of our faithful brethren in the kingdom, may have a certain relief in our Grievances hereto annexed; and, as in duty bound, we shall not fail to yield our best assistance with our persons, purses, and prayers. 1. That divers counties and corporations in this kingdom, viz. Devon, Cornwall, Wales, &c. formerly in open hostility, and for the present wholly disaffected to the proceedings of this Parliament, have notwithstanding retained, equally with the most cordial to the state, their privileges of electing members; a thing very destructive to the safety of the common-wealth, which is the chief end of parliaments, and one main cause of many present grievances: Wherefore we desire that such elections may be revoked, and the places declared incapable of any such privileges during the sessions of this parliament, or until such time as it shall appear that their former enmity and rancour be laid aside. 2. That whereas the honourable houses have raised up the expectations of the well-affected, by promising to apply their time and care in procuring Remedies against their pressing evils, as appears most fully in their Declarations of the 17th of April, 1646; yet the said commons have, to their great grief, been frustrated of their hopes; and, instead of being relieved, have, to their great grief, been vexed, imprisoned, and otherwise molested. 3. Our Petitions to the parliament are not, as in former times, either received or answered, whereby no redress can be had to our pressing Grievances; as, in particular, petitions against tythes, and that for the enlargement of our fellow-commoners long, and, as we humbly conceive, unduly detained in prison. 4. The putting in malignant neuters, and persons who have not shewn any affection, or done any service, for the parliament during these troubles that have lain upon kingdom, into places of honour, trust, and profit; as governors of towns, castles, forts; Justices of the peace, commissioners of the excise, committees of accounts, &c. whereby the most cordial friends to the parliament are slighted and disregarded, and upon very slender causes, indicted, committed, and imprisoned. 5. That the body of the kingdom, consisting much of copyholders, who for the most have been very cordial and faithful to the parliament, may not be left fineable at the will of the lord; in regard the generality of these have been very malignant and much disaffected to a parliamentary or thorough reformation, and from whom they cannot but expect very severe dealings. 6. That all men that have received any State Money, as well parliament-men as others, may be called to an account for such money; and that committees (not as now, for the most part neuters and malignants, but of approved fidelity) may be elected for that purpose. 7. That one Cordwell, a man of a most notorious lewd life and conversation, and withal a most desperate malignant, did procure a warrant for the apprehending three soldiers under the command of col. Alban Cox; and brought them before one King, a justice of peace, at St. Alban's, where their said colonel did appear with them; and made it very clear and apparent to the said justice, that what they did was by command from their captain, and no more than what was expressly contained within their Ordinance; which the said justice did acknowledge, and was fully satisfied that their ordinance authorized them thereunto; yet, notwithstanding, the said King would have committed them to Hertford goal, had not their colonel and captain become bound for their appearing at the next session; and the said Cordwell did prefer a bill of indictment against them, and, had it not been for two or three honest men that served on the grand jury, the said bill had been found; to the great peril of the lives of the said soldiers, there being but little favour or mercy to be had for parliament soldiers by the justices of our county."

The Humble PETITION of the Inhabitants of the county of BUCKINGHAM.

"May it please your excellency: We bless God for you, as the instrument whom he raised up and made eminent in putting an end to the sad and dreadful war wherein this kingdom was involved not many months since: our eyes are still upon you, and our prayers for you, that God would crown your labours with an happy period of our miseries, ending in the enjoyment of our due and native liberties, which are the things we have chosen our fellow subjects serving in parliament to obtain for us: They are the things for which we have adventured our lives and estates freely, being the first county that appeared for them: They are the things we have so often petitioned for, and could not so much as have expected a delay of Answer to these our just desires: But, to our great grief we speak it, we have been rejected, and are become hopeless of satisfaction, by some men who have not only prevailed in discountenancing our just Petitions, the proper way of subjects address, but almost have made it a fault for subjects to petition; even for things that are due unto them both by common birth-right and the laws of the kingdom, and which frequently have been confirmed to us by several Ordinances and Declarations of parliament. We are not ignorant that even some men amongst them, whom in due time we shall not stick to name, are such as, by their subtle slights, have endeavoured to render your army odious to the parliament and kingdom; which rather than they shall not obtain, they will not stick to inflame the kingdom in a second unnecessary and unjust war, that being the only obstacle to their wicked designs, and the only help, under God, left us of having a firm peace settled in this kingdom. These things being come to this pass, we take upon us the boldness to beseech your excellency, you being a person whom your justice, courage, fidelity, and zeal for the common good have made eminent, and given so great an interest in the hearts and affections of all men who have any sense of their common good and just liberties, that you will be pleased to mediate on our behalf to the honourable houses of parliament, for the obtaining of our so dear and near concerns, without enjoyment of which even our lives will be uncomfortable to us.— And although this our Address may seem strange or hazardous unto you, we doubt not but the justice of our desires will preserve you. And as for our own parts we are resolved, in the mediation thereof, to assist you to the utmost of our power."

All the notice the lords took of these menacing Petitions, and those before received from sir Thomas Fairfax, was to order them to be sent to the several counties to know whether they would own them.

Votes of the Commons in favour of the Army's Desires.] June 21. The commons had, upon the former Representation from the Army, voted, 'That no person that had been in actual war against the parliament, or acted in the commission of array, or voluntarily aided the king, or received pardon from him, should presume to sit in the house: that if they did sit they should incur the displeasure of the house: that the committee for examining such cases be revived; and that a Declaration be brought in for any person who has a charge against any member of the house to come in: that the committee bring in, by a day, such Charges as are already before them against any members: and that reports of elections be brought in by a short day.'*

Letter from the Parliament to the King inviting him to Richmond.] June 22. Both houses agreed on sending the following Letter to the King:

"May it please your majesty; Your majesty's loyal subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, out of their earnest desire that the Peace of your three kingdoms may have a speedy settlement, have passed their Votes for your majesty's coming to your house at Richmond* that then a joint application may be made unto your majesty, from your parliaments of England and Scotland. To that purpose it is our humble desire that your majesty will be pleased to come accordingly; and our prayers shall be to the great God, that he will bless all endeavours that shall tend to the preventing further distractions in church and state, and to the procuring of a safe and well-grounded peace. Your, &c.

Letter from sir Tho. Fairfax to the Speaker of the House of Peers, relating to the Motions of the Army.] This day the following Letter from sir Tho. Fairfax to the Speaker of the house of peers was read:

"My lord; By your lordship's of the 17th

for their cow Votes and compliance with a mutinous Army, who had their power and pay from them; whilst others approved of them as prudent, respecting the time, to avoid bloodshed. That some wished the first Votes, and the severe prosecuting the business of Disbanding, had been declined, since it occasioned all this trouble." He adds, "That now Cromwell began to mount still higher, and carried his business with great subtilty. He had got his enemies in parliament impeached, and the business of the Army guided by his son-in-law Ireton, with others, under himself."

* "The King now found himself in a better situation than at Holdenby, and had attained some greater degree of freedom, as well as of consideration with both parties. All his friends had access to his presence: his correspondence with the Queen was not interrupted; his chaplains were restored to him; and he was allowed the use of the Liturgy: his children were once allowed to visit him, and they passed a few days at Cavershaw, where he then resided. No private man, unacquainted with the pleasures of a court, and the tumult of a camp, more passionately loved his family, than did this good prince; and such an instance of indulgence in the Army was extremely grateful to him. Cromwell, who was witness to the meeting of the royal family, confessed that he never had been present at so tender a scene. This artful politician, as well as the leaders of all parties, payed court to the king; and fortune, notwithstanding all his calamities, seemed again to smile upon him. The parliament, afraid of his forming some accommodation with the Army, addressed him in a more respectful style than formerly; and invited him to reside at Richmond, and contribute of June instant, I am commanded to render the charge of his majesty to your commissioners, now attending his majesty at Newmarket: to which I humbly answer, That the commissioners have attended the person of the king ever since his coming from Holdenby; and have been desired, by me, to continue the discharge of the trust which was committed to them by the parliament; which, that it might be the better performed, I gave them a guard of two regiments of horse, who do at this time attend the king and commissioners at Newmarket. I humbly conceive I have nothing else to answer as touching this matter.—As to our removal to a further distance from London, we entreat we may receive an Answer to the Desires of the Army in the Papers we last sent you; conceiving that otherwise we shall neither give satisfaction to the kingdom, nor to the army, who are in expectation of some effect thereupon.—There is also information of daily under-hand preparations of forces, and the keeping up of those that are raised publicly avowed, together with other grounds of jealousies occasioned by the endeavours of some to bring in foreign forces; and by sending divers his assistance to the settlement of the nation. The chief officers treated him with regard, and spake on all occasions of restoring him to his just powers and prerogatives. In the public Declarations of the Army, the settlement of his revenue and authority was insisted on. The royalists every where entertained hopes of the restoration of monarchy; and the favour which they universally bore to the army, contributed very much to discourage the parliament, and to forward their submission.—Though Charles kept his ears open to all proposals, and expected to hold the balance between the opposite parties, he entertained more hopes of accommodation with the army. He had experienced the extreme rigour of the parliament. They pretended totally to annihilate his authority: they had confined his person. In both these particulars the army shewed more indulgence. This conjunction too seemed more natural with his generals, than with that usurping assembly. By gratifying a few persons with titles and preferments, he might draw over, he hoped, the whole military power, and, in an instant, reinstate himself in his civil authority. To Ireton he offered the lieutenancy of Ireland: to Cromwell the garter, the title of earl of Essex, and the command of the army. Negotiations to this purpose were secretly conducted: Cromwell pretended to hearken to them; and was well pleased to keep the door open for an accommodation, if the course of events should at any time render it necessary. And the king, who had no suspicion that one born a private gentleman could entertain the daring ambition of swaying a sceptre, transmitted through a long line of monarchs, indulged hopes that he would, at last, embrace a measure which, by all the motives of duty, interest, and safety, seemed to be recommended to him." officers into several parts of the kingdom to possess places of strength, and to raise men; which, to our apprehensions, tend to the raising of a new war, whereof I thought fit to give you this account. I remain Your &c. T. FAIRFAX. St. Alban's. June 21. 1647."

The Answer of the Parliament's Commissioners to the above Letter:

"Sir; We have perused your Letter sent us this night by scout-master-general Watson, with the copy of yours inclosed to the houses of parliament; and having thereupon considered the Vote of both houses, and their direction to us, we held it our duty, in discharge of the trust committed to us, to let your excellency know that the order of both houses for the removal of the army 40 miles from London is positive; and we are commanded to be very earnest in pressing your excellency therein, as also to desire you to give the parliament a speedy and positive account of what you have done upon their Letter and Votes sent to you for removal of the King's Person to Richmond; to both which points we find your answers, by the copies sent us, to be defective and uncertain; and therefore do again very earnestly desire your excellency to take the same into consideration, and give a more full and certain answer to what is expected from you by both houses in these particulars. We rest Your &c. C. Nottingham. P. Wharton. St. Alban's June 21. 1647."

Letter sent thereupon to Sir Tho. Fairfax, by both Houses.] The lords, having debated upon the foregoing Papers, ordered that a Letter be written, by their Speaker, to sir Tho. Fairfax, and sent to the commons for their concurrence; which was done accordingly:

"Sir; The lords and commons assembled in parliament have received your Letter of the 21st inst. by which you gave them an account of several informations that are given to the army, that there are daily under-hand preparations made of forces, and that there is a publick avowment of keeping forces already raised: they did, by their former Letter unto you, affirm the contrary; and do again assure you that there are no forces either prepared or avowed, by their authority, against the army; and therefore they desire you to make known unto them the grounds you have of this report. They likewise disclaim any thought in them of bringing in any foreign forces; and do desire you to make strict enquiry into the occasion of these misinformations, that they may be certified from what hands they come, so that the authors of such aspersions may be known and punished. They have no knowledge of any persons employed from them for the possessing of any places of strength; and as for the raising of any men, they hope there will be no occasion to alter the confidence they have of the army, in relation to their solemn engagements to preserve the honour and privileges of parliament, and safety and peace of the kingdom;

therefore they do fully and freely declare the falseness of those informations to you, and do expect your endeavours for preventing any such causeless jealousies; and, in regard of the inconveniences that do and may come to the city of London and parts near adjacent, by the army's being so near, they still insist upon their former Vote for your quartering your army no nearer than 40 miles off London. Your &c."

*Ordinance for a monthly Assessment of 60,000*l.] June 23. The lords passed an Ordinance, sent up by the commons, for raising monies for the service of England and Ireland. This was laying a tax of 60,000*l.* a month, to continue for one year, viz. from the 25th of March then past, to the 25th of March ensuing.

A second Remonstrance from the Army to the Parliament.] June 24. A packet was presented to the house of lords, from the earl of Nottingham, one of their commissioners residing with the Army, addressed to the earl of Manchester, containing,

"St. Alban's June 23, 1647.

Our Desires, as soldiers, in behalf of ourselves and other soldiers that have faithfully served the parliament in this kingdom; as also our remaining dissatisfactions, in relation thereunto, may be clearly collected out of our several Papers that have formerly been presented to the parliament concerning the same, to which particulars we have not yet received any further satisfaction.—In our late Representation† it may appear what our Desires are, as members of the commonwealth, in behalf of ourselves and all others, for the clearing, settling, and securing of the Rights, Liberties, and Peace of the kingdom; for the justness, reasonableness, necessity, and common concernment whereof unto all, we dare appeal to the whole kingdom and the world; yet we have hitherto received no Answer thereunto, nor can we hear of any consideration taken thereupon, to put the things contained therein into any way of resolution or dispatch.—We have since that, in pursuance of the first and second Heads of our Desires in the said Representation, delivered in a Charge against divers persons, members of the house of commons, for divers designs and practices to the abuse and dishonour of the parliament, the unsufferable injury of the army, the infringement of the rights and liberties both of soldiers and subjects, the breach or hazard of the peace of this kingdom, and the hindering of the Relief of Ireland, &c. Upon which, though the main things charged, with the mischievous effects and further dangerous consequences of them, as also the constant and continued activity of all or most of the persons charged, in relation to those things, for the most part are sufficiently and notoriously known, especially to the parliament itself; yet we find neither any thing done upon what is so known, nor any way resolved on or admitted by the parliament, for the examination or discovery of what is less evident unto them; but rather (as if neither the things charged, nor the present sad effects, nor future ill consequences thereof, were at all considerable) the whole business seems to be slightly passed over, or set aside.— Lastly, We did, with these, deliver in another Paper,* whereof here is a Copy annexed, containing divers just and necessary things, which we did desire might be provided for and done for the better proceeding in the premisses, with more safety to ourselves and the kingdom, and with more assurance or hopes of a timely and happy issue: to which things desired (which we think all men will judge reasonable, just, and necessary) we have yet received no Answer or Resolution; nor can find any consideration at all had of them, save that a month's pay is sent down for the army; whilst those that have deserted the army receive, at London, much more; and that some Votes have been passed for annulling the Orders of the pretended Committee of Safety about listing men and drawing of forces together; which votes we find rendered but vain and delusive by the continued under-hand practices of those whom we have charged, and their accomplices, in listing and engaging men for a new war; and, by a later day's votes, not admitting that the forces so listed or engaged should, by publick order, be dismissed or discharged; which with other things, we cannot but attribute chiefly to the prevalent influence of the same persons.— Now, whereas we find that our first Desire in the Paper last mentioned, for present suspending the persons impeached from sitting in the house, is judged, by some, to be against the course and privilege of parliament; or of ill consequence in the precedent of it, the Charge being but general, and no particular proofs as yet produced to render the proceeding legal; we cannot but remind the parliament, 1. That as the most and main things charged, with the sad effects and consequences of them, so the constant and continued activity of all, or most of the persons charged, in relation thereunto, in misinforming, deluding, abusing, or surprizing the house, and otherwise, are sufficiently known to the parliament itself; so as the house might, upon their past and present cognizance of the same, most justly proceed to suspend them; as in many other cases, upon far less occasions, which never could have produced such sad effects to the kingdom, they have done many other of their members, ineerly for words spoken, or things moved in the house, alledged to be but against order or custom of the house; and this without any trial, proof, or charge, but merely upon the houses own cognizance of the things, as we could instance in many cases since this parliament began. 2. Whereas many of the things to which the Charge relates, are things spoke, moved, or done in the house, so as we have yet no clear way opened particularly to charge or mention them, or produce proofs to them, without some pretence against us of breach of privilege; and therefore (though we think no privilege ought to protect evil men in doing wrong to particulars or mischief to the public, yet) we have been hitherto so tender of parliament privileges, as that we have only remonstrated the evil of such things done; and supposing the house to have been (as we did and do believe, and if the way were open without breach of privilege, should not doubt to prove it was) some ways misinformed, deluded, surprized, or otherwise abused in those things by evil members, we have frequently, in former Papers before the Charge, put the parliament upon it, who, without colour of breach of privilege, might do it, to find out and discover who they were that had so abused them, and to disengage the honour of parliament from the evil practices and designs of such incendiaries. Now since the same difficulties or prejudices be yet in our way, as to the particular Charge or proof of those things against the members; and the parliament (though so often put upon it in our former papers, yet through the powerful interest of the persons guilty) hath not taken any cognizance what members or others have so abused them, to draw the parliament to such dishonour and inconveniences; we cannot but again more fully and clearly assert, (as we have in former Papers, and shall yet more particularly, if need be, remonstrate) that divers things lately done and passed from the parliament against this Army (as particularly the Order for suppressing the Petition,* that high Declaration against it, and against all that should proceed in it, putting the faithful servants of the parliament and kingdom out of the protection of law, and exposing them as enemies to the state, &c. to the forfeitures of the estates, liberties, life and all, but for going about in an humble, peaceable, and inoffensive way to desire what was undeniably their due and dearly earned, and many other such like proceedings, both against the army and others) do carry with them such a face of injustice, oppression, arbitrariness, and tyranny, as, we think, is not to be paralleled in any former proceedings of the most arbitrary courts against any private men; but have brought in insufferable dishonour upon the parliamentary authority and proceedings (which we are, and others ought to be, deeply sensible of); hath tended to disoblige all men, especially soldiers, from the same; to destroy all just freedom either of soldiers or subjects, and hath conduced to all other the sad effects and worse consequences expressed in the Charge; and gives us and others cause to conclude that those worthies who have formerly acted and carried on things in parliament for public good, right, and freedom, are now awed or overborne by a prevailing party of men of other private interests crept in; and that neither we nor any other can reasonably expect right, freedom, or safety, as private men, or to have things acted in parliament for public good, while the same persons continue there in the same power to abuse the name and authority of parliament, to serve and prosecute their private interests and passions; and, under the privilege of parliament, to shelter themselves under the worst of evils or mischiefs they can do, though to the ruin of the kingdom.—We are in this case forced, to our great grief of heart, thus plainly to assert the present evil and mischief, together with the future worse consequences of the things lately done, even in the parliament itself, which are too evident and visible to all; and so, in their proper colours, to lay the same at the parliament's doors, until the parliament shall be pleased, either of themselves to take notice and rid the houses of those who have any ways misinformed, deluded, surprized, or otherwise abused the parliament, to the vehement pressing and passing of such foul things there; or shall open to us and others some way how we may regularly, and without the scandal of breaking privileges, come to charge and prosecute those particular persons that, in truth, have so abused the parliament, as well as ourselves, even for those misinformations and other evil and indirect practices or proceedings in parliament, whereby they have so abused the same, as in our said Charge and former Papers is set forth.—And here, if we may, we should humbly offer to consideration, whether it were not a necessary expedient for prevention or remedy of such evils in future, that, in things so clearly destructive to the common Rights and Liberties of the people and Safety of the kingdom, there be a liberty for dissenting members in the house of commons, as it is allowed in the house of peers, to enter their dissent, and thereby acquit themselves from the guilt or blame of what evils may ensue; that so the kingdom may regularly come to know who they are that perform their trust faithfully, and who not: and this provision for the future, as also our Desires for Remedy in the present cases, as it were clearly good and necessary in the respects premised, so, we think, the same may well be without future prejudice or discouragement, in any other respects, to succeeding members of parliament; provided always, that no man shall be questioned or censured for any thing said or done in parliament, any further than to exclusion from that trust, which is all that in the present case we should desire upon any such grounds. And that future liberty of entering Dissents we do not here propose as a thing we any way insist on to the prejudice of parliament privileges; we only offer it to consideration, and that from good wishes to the privileges of parliament, to render them more lasting by being less no-cent. And, indeed, whoever most adores or tenders those privileges will best express his zeal towards them in taking care they be not abused, or extended, to private wrongs or public mischiefs; for we clearly find, and all wise men may see it, that parliament privileges, as well as royal prerogative, may be perverted and abused, or extended to the destruction of those greater ends for whose protection and preservation they were admitted or intended, viz. the rights and privileges of the people, and safety of the whole; and in case it be so, the abuse, evil, or danger of them is no less to be contended against, and a remedy thereof no less to be endeavoured, than of the other.—And whereas the injustice in that particular of the Declaration against the Army, for their just and innocent Petition, may seem to have been recompenced in the late Expunging thereof out of the Journal Books, we confess it hath been so in great measure, as to the particular or present injury done the army therein; and we cannot but acknowledge, so far, the justice that lies in those Votes for expunging thereof; but for our own or the Army's particular reparation, we should never wish more, nor scarce have insisted on so much, to any dishonour of parliament in future; we should rather have been satisfied with the parliament's declaring how, and by whom, they have been misinformed, surprized, or otherwise abused in framing the proposal, or passing thereof, as it was: but as to that particular, or any other of that nature, we say as followeth: 1. We never did, nor do, value or regard our own injury or reparation in any comparison to the consequence of the one, or the prejudice of the other, but to the future security of the common Right and Freedom of this nation; and accordingly we do not account any reparation considerable that extends but to ourselves in the present case, and does not, in some sort, secure ourselves and all others from danger of the same or worse injuries or oppressions, as private men, from the wills or passions of the same persons that have offered and acted such things against us while an army. 2. We cannot but imagine and consider, according to general report, how the Expunging of that Declaration was carried and obtained; and upon what grounds and intentions it was given way to; but had those that procured it been all for expunging it, and that freely, yet how can we expect better but that the same men, who at one time carried such a Declaration, and another time expunged it, may the next day obtain the like or worse, upon any occasion wherein it may serve their private ends or interests, if they continue in the same power and sway, and be let pass in deluding and surprizing the parliament, as they have done in the past particulars? 3. The apparent dishonour and prejudice brought upon the parliament, in having such a Declaration so passed, as that they should soon after, without any alteration in the pretended ground of it, find cause, for shame of the world, to expunge, we think should engage those members that love parliaments, in point of honour, to find out and discover how, and by whom, the parliament had been abused or otherwise brought into such an inconveniency. And the parliament may in this see the temper, as by-standers do the prevalence, of those members that abused the parliament in that Declaration, who will and can make the authority of parliament still lie under the dishonour of it, in a bare expunging or retracting, rather than admit of any consideration to acquit the authority of parliament, that would tend to fix the blame on those particular members that had deserved it: and this certainly would be admitted and done, rather than to slight it over with a bare expunging, were not some men more tender of, and more swayed with, such considerations and consequences as may tend to the prejudice of persons, than such as tend to the general prejudice and dishonour of parliaments.—As to those particulars included in our Charge, which do depend upon things done without the parliament, we are ready, and should most willingly proceed in the particular charging and proving thereof, if first (from the justice of the house in a present proceeding against the persons charged for the things that are already known to the house to have been done in it) we could find encouragement to expect any good issue upon those other things; and did we not, on the contrary, find that, notwithstanding what is so known to the house, as before expressed, the same persons continue in such power and prevalence, both in the house and in all committees of the highest trust, as leaves little hope of right or satisfaction to the army or kingdom in other things, and much less in any just proceedings against themselves, while they continue judges of their own and our concernments; so as we cannot, while they remain in the same power, expect any thing but a continued perverting and making advantage of all things, (and especially of those delays which a regular proceeding against them would necessarily induce) altogether to our own and the kingdom's prejudice and danger, to disable or weaken us for those things which the safety and settling of the Rights, Liberties, and Peace of the kingdom requires: and to strengthen themselves, by under-hand practices and preparations both at home and abroad, the better to oppose us and engage the kingdom in a new war; thereby to accomplish their designs, or at least to save themselves from justice in a common confusion: we say, were it not for these and such other considerations, that leave little hopes of justice to ourselves or the kingdom, while they continue in the same power, and render all delays dangerous and destructive to ourselves and the peace of the kingdom, we should be contented that the business concerning the members we have charged should be laid aside till those other things were first settled, which our Declaration does propound for the common Rights and Liberties of the kingdom.—But finding things still so carried as they are, and as we have before expressed, and that while they are judges in their own causes they, with that party which they make, will do what they please, and yet render it a breach of privilege to be accused for it; we cannot but, upon all these considerations, and for all the reasons before expressed, insist upon it that the members charged may first be forthwith suspended from sitting in the house; otherwise we cannot expect any fair proceedings against them upon a more particular Charge, nor think there is any good intended to ourselves or the kingdom.—As to our Desires of having the Army presently paid up equally with those that have deserted it, we appeal to all men for the Justice, Reasonableness, and Necessity thereof. The Justice; in that the former service, for which these arrears are due, hath been, at least, as faithfully and diligently performed by the army as by those late deserters of it; and in our present posture, though they have appeared indeed more officious and serviceable to the interest and will of particular men than we, yet we are sure the army is, and we hope will at last appear to be, more faithful to the true Interest of parliaments and the kingdom, which we were at first called out and engaged for, than they in deserting the Army have hitherto appeared. For the Reasonableness of our Desires; though we have ground to claim more than they, or rather that they, or some of them, should forfeit their arrears, yet we ask, for present, but equal; nor should we at present insist on that so much, as to our officers, if our soldiers were but first paid up. Our Necessity to insist on that is obvious to every man: and therefore, unless we should betray our own and the kingdom's cause, we cannot but positively insist upon it that the Army should forthwith be paid up, at least equally to those deserters of it; which, if denied or delayed, we shall be thereby enforced upon present ways of Remedy and Right to the Army therein.—And whereas the parliament hath lately ordered and publicly declared, that all that shall desert the Army shall have present satisfaction in their arrears, (the officers 3 months pay, the soldiers all their arrears, deducting for free quarter) which still continues unrecalled; we cannot but look upon it as a most clear evidence of the continuing malice and prevalence of our and the kingdom's enemies. And we must and do insist upon it, that that Order or Declaration may forthwith be publicly recalled; otherwise we cannot believe that any thing but ruin and destruction is designed to ourselves and all others in the kingdom, who every where call upon us not to disband till we see the Rights, Liberties, and Peace of the kingdom settled, according to the many Declarations by which we were first called forth, and invited to engage in the late war. Next we cannot but take notice, (instead of granting or answering our Desires in the last Paper) in order to the better and more safe proceeding to a composure and settlement of all things for the good and peace of the kingdom, and for the prevention of a new war, the army being first commanded to 40 miles distance from London, his majesty's person is demanded immediately to Richmond house within 8 miles of London; which, as we cannot but impute it to the prevailing interest of the same enemies to our and the kingdom's peace, so all men may easily discern, with us, how directly it tends (in pursuance of their former private designs upon the king e'er he came from Holdenby) to put his majesty within reach of those men's power, who have already under-hand listed about London a very considerable number both of horse and foot, and are daily listing and engaging more, both there and in many parts of the kingdom, to serve their designs; and therefore we appeal to all unengaged men, whether we can in this give way to have the king put so far within those men's power, without giving them the long-sought-for advantage of his majesty's person; thereby to embroil the kingdom in a new and bloody war, and to strengthen themselves in their mischievous designs, the better to uphold and establish their faction and intended domination; so that, in this case, we cannot but importune the parliament, (as they tender the peace and quiet of the kingdom, and the avoiding of jealousies or worse inconveniencies in the army) that they would resume the consideration of that business concerning the Person of the King, and not propose any place for him nearer to London than they would have the quarters of the Army to be. And whereas (by procurement of the same persons, or others of their party) there hath been scandalous informations presented to the houses, and industriously published in print, importing as if his majesty were kept as a prisoner amongst us, and barbarously and uncivilly used; we cannot but declare that the same, and all other suggestions of that sort, are most false and scandalous, and absolutely contrary, not only to our declared Desires, but also to our principles, which are most clearly for a general Right and just freedom to all Men: And therefore, upon this occasion, we cannot but declare particularly, that we desire the same for the king and others of his party, so far as can consist with common Right or Freedom, and with the security of the same for the future: And we farther clearly profess we do not see how there can be any firm or lasting peace to this kingdom, without a due consideration of and provision for the rights, quiet, and immunity of his majesty, his royal family, and his late partakers; and herein we think that tender and equitable dealing, (as supposing their Cases had been ours) and a spirit of common love and justice, diffusing itself to the good and preservation of all, will make up the most glorious conquests over their hearts, if God in his mercy see it good, to make them and the whole people of the land lasting friends. —Now to draw to a conclusion: Since we can yet obtain no Satisfaction or Answer to the things desired as before, but, contrarywise, find all things carried on by the prevailing interest of those our enemies, to the prejudice and danger of ourselves and the kingdom; since (notwithstanding some Votes of parliament against the late Orders of the Committee of Safety for listing of forces, and notwithstanding the earnest desires and endeavours of the city, concurrent with our own, to have the same prevented or remedied, yet the committee of safety being still continued in the same power) we find that, by the appointment or contrivance, and under the protection or countenance, of the same persons whom we have charged and their accomplices, there are still manifold practices under-hand, to list and raise new forces; and, notwithstanding the discovery thereof to the parliament from the city, yet the same persons have prevailed so far in the house as not to admit the question for discharging of them, but the same practices still continue, and with double diligence are enforced; since also divers forces, pretended to have been engaged for Ireland, are, by the same persons, ordered to rendezvous about Worcester, there to lay the foundation of a new Army; and to that purpose their emissaries and correspondents in all counties are busy and active to raise forces for them. And though for these things the actors of them have no present public authority, yet they have some way such countenance and assurance to be justified in parliament, if questioned for it, as that they have the confidence to act openly: since they have likewise their emissaries or agents abroad in Scotland, France, and other countries, very active to draw in foreign forces for their assistance: since, in the mean time, they are endeavouring, by spies and secret agents in all our quarters, to inveigle and invite the soldiers of this army to desert their officers and come to London; and, for that purpose, do improve the advantage of the Order or Declaration of parliament afore-mentioned, for satisfaction of arrears, to such as shall desert the army: and we find they have the public purse so much at their disposal, as to make good that and other their undertakings of that nature; and yet such as have so deserted the army and received their arrears, are not discharged or dispersed, but continued together in bodies, and under command, in and near the city, as in particular, some of sir Robert Pye's men, col. Greaves's, capt. Farmer's, and others still quartered upon Kent: Since, likewise, they have their agents and correspondents labouring with the king to make contracts with him to draw his majesty to engage and declare for them, or at least to declare himself a prisoner amongst us, thereby to stir up and engage his party against us: since, in all these respects, we find all dilatory ways, which they industriously devise, to be designed and made use of only to our disadvantage, weakening, and ruin; to the kingdom's prejudice, and to their own advantage and strengthening their designs: the better to prepare for a new war.—And, lastly, considering the multitudes of Reformadoes and other Soldiers swarming about the city, whom the persons we have charged, and their accomplices, have at their beck to bring up to Westminster when they please: and that, by their frequent tumultuous confluences thither (besetting, and sometimes blocking up, the parliament's doors, threatening and offering violence to the persons of the most faithful parliament-men) the just freedom of parliament seems to be taken away, or at least, for the present, abridged: insomuch that those members who have served the kingdom hitherto with most faithfulness, diligence, and integrity for the public good, many of them dare scarce come to the house; or, if they do, they come in fear and peril of their lives; and, when they are there, are awed, discouraged, or disabled from discharging their consciences, or doing their duties to the kingdom.—Upon all these considerations, we are clearly convinced and satisfied that both our duty and trust for the parliament and kingdom calls upon us and warrants us, and an imminent necessity (for our own and the kingdom's safety, and prevention of a new war) enforceth us, to make or admit of no longer delays; but, upon those foundations God hath given us, with vigour and speed to endeavour, in some extraordinary way, the vindicating of parliament freedom from tumultuous violence, the breaking of those designs and preparations that otherwise threaten a present embroilment of the kingdom in more blood and war, and a future perpetual enslaving of it under faction and tyranny: And so, if God see it good, to put the parliament into a freedom and capacity, with his majesty's wished and hoped-for Concurrence, to settle the Rights, Liberties, and Peace of the Kingdom.—Upon all these Grounds, and for all these ends premised, we shall be enforced to take such courses extraordinary as God shall enable and direct us unto, to put things to a speedy issue; unless, by Thursday night next, we receive assurance and security to ourselves and the kingdom, for a more safe and hopeful proceeding in an ordinary way, by having those things granted which, in order thereunto, we have before insisted on; and shall here, for more brevity and clearness, repeat as followeth: 1. That the Declaration, inviting men to desert the Army, and promising their Arrears in case they do so, may be annulled. 2. That the Army may be presently paid up equally to those that have deserted it. 3. That his majesty's coming to Richmond may be suspended until affairs be better settled and composed; and, in the mean time, no place may be appointed for his majesty's residence that may be any nearer to London than the parliament will allow the quarters of the Army to be. 4. That the Members charged may be forthwith suspended or sequestered the house. 5. That those that have deserted the Army may be instantly discharged and dispersed, and receive no more of their Arrears till the Army be first satisfied. 6. That both parliament and city may be, speedily and effectually, freed from those multitudes of Reformadoes and other soldiers before-mentioned, that flock together about London, by a speedy dispatch and discharging of them from the city. 7. That all such listings or raisings of new forces, or drawing together of any, as is before-mentioned, and all preparations towards a new war, may be effectually declared against and suppressed; as also all invitations or endeavours to draw in foreign forces. 8. That the present perplexed affairs of the kingdom and those concerning the Army, as also all the things desired in our late Representation in behalf of the kingdom, may be put into some speedy way of settlement and composure. By the Appointment of his Excellency sir Tho. Fairfax and the Council of War. John Rushworth, Secretary.*

The Lords desire the King not to come towards Richmond.] The same day that the foregoing Representation from the Army was presented to the lords, a Letter from the lord Montague was also read, with several Papers inclosed. After which the lords resolved themselves into a committee, to read the Representation from the Army again; and the house being resumed, a motion was made, "That a letter be sent to his majesty, to desire him for some time to make a stay at Royston, or to go to Newmarket, as he shall think fit, in regard of some things that are lately fallen out;" which was resolved in the affirmative.

Next the lords ordered a Letter to be written to the General from both houses, and their Speaker to prepare it; which was done accordingly, in hæc verba:

"Sir, The lords and commons have written a Letter unto his majesty, to desire him that he would be pleased to stay at Royston, or to return to Newmarket; and they have commanded us to give you this notice, and to send you here inclosed a copy thereof. This being all we have in command, we remain, your, &c."

* It may be matter of surprize who were the principal penmen that drew up and wrote all these Remonstrances, &c. from the Army, since they are put in much better dress and form than could be expected from a body of men, mostly mechanicks, and more accustomed to the sword than the pen: But Mr. Whitlocke informs us, "That it was colonel Ireton who was chiefly employed and took on him this business: that he had been bred in the Middle-Temple, and had learned some grounds of the law; and being of a working laborious brain and fancy, he set himself much upon these affairs, and was therein encouraged by lieut. gen. Cromwell, his father-in-law; and by colonel Lambert, who had likewise studied in the Inns of Court, and was also of a subtle and working brain."

The Letter to be sent to the King:

"May it please your majesty; Your majesty's loyal subjects, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, in respect of some occurrences lately fallen out, do humbly desire your majesty that you would be pleased to stay at Royston, or to return to Newmarket for some time; and they hope that this delay of your majesty's coming to your house at Richmond will be no ways prejudicial to your majesty, or make any retardment of the present settling of the Peace of your kingdoms, which is the desire of, Your, &c."

Then the foregoing Vote of the lords relating to the King, the Letter to his majesty, and to sir Tho. Fairfax, being communicated to the commons, they agreed to them all immediately.

Letter from Sir Thomas Fairfax to the Citizens of London, enforcing their late Remonstrance to the Parliament.] June 24. Alderman Fowke and others, from the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London, presented to both houses copies of two Letters which they had received from sir Tho. Fairfax.

To the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council, of the City of London.

"Right Honourable: We received yours of the 18th of this instant, whereof, tho' all passages are not so answerable to our expectation as we hoped, yet we apprehend the same good affection in you towards this army as was expressed in your former letter, that (not only from the assurance of the worthy gentlemen your commissioners, again sent to us, but also from that information we have received of your extraordinary endeavours to procure money for the army, to prevent further raising or listing of soldiers, and to procure those already listed to be disbanded) some persons of your militia only have been active for the raising of them without your privity; as likewise from that letter fill'd with respect, which you prepared and intended to send to us; but being sent to the parliament, was obstructed by some persons, who labouring to embroil the kingdom in a new war, would not have the forces already raised to be disbanded; who excepted against your discovery to the house that some persons only of the militia had joined in the raising of the new forces; who also would prevent a right understanding between your city and this army, knowing a firm correspondence between them would make the designs of all such men hopeless: And though our taking notice of these things seems not regular, yet being so publickly done, we thought fit to mind you of them. Now, although the confidence we have of the real and clear intentions of your lordship, and the aldermen and commons of your city of London, to promote the peace of this kingdom and just Desires of this Army; also to prevent all tendencies to a new war, or any further blood; and therefore hold ourselves obliged to yield all possible compliance to what you desire of us; yet adding to the former grounds the many informations which daily come to us of the
